TO VOL. VI.

WE present to our readers another Volume. These recurrences of pleasant and congratulatory feeling are becoming familiar to us; but the cordiality of our half-annual greeting to our kind and welcome friends does not fade or flicker with the repetition of the happy ceremony by which it is made known. The light of Hope first cheered us onward to our task; and now—for that a patronage at once Regal and Popular, of the People and of the Throne, has refreshed us through several summers—like the soft breath of this genial July; and warmed us through as many winters—like the spice of the foaming tankard, and the comfort of the blazing hearth—that other light—next to Hope in beauty, and in spirit even purer—the Light of Gratitude—burns steadily within us, and is as much a part of our prosperity as the friendships and the kindness that have called it forth.

This Midsummer offering of ours comes forth in warm season; and why should it be less sunny in its spirit—less cordial in its fruit? And may we not, without immodesty, liken it to a Summer emblem in another sense—a tree in full bearing, with golden apples, like those of the Hesperides, clustering thickly upon its branches, with the glossy coating and the juicy heart—to be gathered eagerly by the tempted public, and eaten with the appetite of thirst—until the palate is moistened and the mind refreshed? These succulent edibles of Art and Knowledge are in full flavour in the summer times of a Nation's Civilization, and we rejoice that we have planted so wide an orchard, and grown so prolific a store.

To fall out of the car of metaphor into the the lap of stern reality—without, we hope, being at all injured by the tumble, or by the change of locality from Simile to Truth—we may appeal to our world of readers, whether there is not a rich harvest of Variety in the pages which we here unfold, and whether the Art and Literature, as well as the Christian Policy, and Concentrated General Intelligence, and Universal History which we have sought to focus within them—(as to a point of brilliancy that must yet radiate over wider and wider circles with every half-year's growth of popularity)—have not preserved the influence and sustained the character of this journal with a progressive spirit and a persevering will?

In glancing over the present Volume of the Illustrated London News we still find the original purpose of the Paper—as put forth in its first Address to the British People—to the letter carried out;—and we feel a loyal pride in the assurance that, in encouragement of our conduct, the approval of the Sovereign and the subject have gone—are going—hand in hand.

The topics of the last half year have not been altogether so eventful as those of the six months which preceded it; but they have, nevertheless, been full of spirit and interest—of prismatic variance—and changing like the forms of that inanimate Proteus to which science has given kaleidescopian renown.

The Amusements of the People present a strong and healthy feature in the Illustrations of the present Volume. The spirit of holiday has been abroad, and it is one of kindliness and good omen. Fairs and Races—Yachting—Excursionizing—Pleasuring—as it is called emphatically by those intelligent masses who mean what they say, and always give characteristic names alike to their wrongs and their enjoyments;—all these shine thick upon our summer page, and they wear a gladdening aspect. With regard to Sporting, it will be seen that we have made honourable cause with those who seek to banish roguery and insincerity, and to elevate the turf.

Royal Visits have not been altogether so important as when France and Russia crowned, upon the soil of England, the assurance of European peace; but Belgium is here now—Holland within a week will be with us; and some of her Majesty's most brilliant hours of recent festivity have been passed in the kindred society of the Duke and Duchess of Nemours. These events have not been—will not be—forgotten in the pages of the Illustrated News.

The memorable "Ball of Costume" originated with generous impulse by our Royal Mistress, to quicken the flowing of the gold of the rich into the hives of poore industry—to stimulate trade—stir the Peerage into activity for the benefit of the people—to present, moreover, in unrivalled splendour the stateliness of a former period reflecting back its brilliancy in the magnificence of a Modern Court;—these were facts that have become history through our columns, and have found upon our page a reflex worthy of the grandeur of the subject, and of the motives of benevolence which first called it into life.

A Grand National Review at Sea—an inspection, by the adopted child of Britannia, of her wooden walls—by the Isle-throned Lady of her Ocean-defenders—is another gratifying memorial we have been happy to record; and, even while we write, the echoes of our soldiers' muskets are ringing in our ears from where Victoria and Wellington are fronted by the troops of victory. Another pleasing incident for our page!

Science has had from us its full quota of liberal Illustration. And the Galleries of Art are almost mirrored in our Volume.

A few dismal accidents by flood and fire—the melancholy warnings of the world—point to the great solemn truth of life in some of the darker passages of the book's art; and give that impetus to prevention and rebuke to carelessness which must work for the world's good.

The half-year discloses also a vast Obituary of Statesmen, Senators, Lawyers, Divines, and Men of Letters. Our page has recorded sadly the dear memorials of the many mighty spirits that have past away. The portraiture of departed genius is thick upon it.

The bright side of the world's picture has been stirring enough, and art has flourished over the displays of the Muses, in the Temples of Opera, the Drama, the Concert, and the Festive Hall. Great improvement has taken place in the prosperity of theatres and places of evening amusement, and our columns are starred from their galaxy of talent, and illumined by the scenes of their success.

In a word, this Volume of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, is a casket FULL! No space for another gem! No gleam-room for another sparkle! The fresh path must be Winterward from the hot July to the hoary December; and we shall have to gather our next harvest in the snow! Still we will endeavour not less to win the smile of our readers upon our Christmas obeisance, than we now win it—as we take a Midsummer Congé, making our own farewell only for a fresh voyage on their behalf, and sure that our Volume—like a well freighted vessel—is happy in being homeward BOUND.

THE NEW YEAR.

EVERY moment is a point standing between the Present and the Past, but not thus can every moment be regarded; they vanish too swiftly to be seized by reflection. Days elapse with almost as little note; even weeks and months depart, and leave but dim and vague impressions. It is not till we stand on the limits of the arger portions of time that we note them "by their loss." Thus, though the passing Hour may not awaken a thought, it is not so with the passing Year. It is impossible, when that which has witnessed so much of human chance, change, and passion, is joining "the years beyond the Flood," not to pause, and, looking back on the Past through Memory, and on the Future through Hope, reflect awhile on all the old year has left us, and all the new one is likely to bring.

Such reflections are by no means altogether mournful, for we find the New Year is generally welcomed among us with gladness, as if men were "not unrejoiced" to see the other face of old Janus. Twelve months have made us familiar enough with the departing guest; we hasten his going, and speed the farewell we take of him; we are not ungrateful for his good, nor peevish with him for his evil; it is not in anger we part, though, perhaps, with something of weariness; he is "a tale that is told;" he is exhausted; he has run through his changes, and we begin to say, "Friend, thou art tedious." So as he sits with us in his last hours, we make them cheerful ones, and dismiss him from our hearth as we received him to it—with festivity. He hears his last song, drinks his last cup, and, as the foot of his successor crosses the threshold, he vanishes into the darkness of the Abyss of the Past, and we meet him no more for ever.

He leaves with us varied memories, dark or bright according to our own deeds in his presence; he leaves many tokens of his course, which, sad or pleasant, none can escape. But all this only makes the New Year more welcome. It awakens new hopes, fresh energies, and often better resolves; and, however vain the year as it becomes old may prove them to be, they give a charm to the time and a character to the season, of which it were a pity to see it deprived. At this time, too, we look back, and sum up all that the past year has borne to us; it were well if it could always be done in a kindly spirit—if the good alone could be retained, and the evil the old year saw among us be passed over, and like the faults of a departed friend, be "not remembered in his epitaph."

A History of 1844—though we cannot indulge in such a retrospect with sufficient minuteness—will be neither uninteresting nor unsatisfactory. As a nation we have been prosperous; peace and plenty have blessed the land, and beneath their happy influence commerce has flourished. Nearly every branch of industry has been employed; the revenue has increased; the interest of our enormous debt has been raised with more facility; the abundance of capital seeking for investment created a competition that enabled the Chancellor of the Exchequer to dictate terms to the public creditor; even the Income-tax has been borne with far less dissatisfaction than could have been expected. The reverse of all this would have been painfully manifest in a year of dearth, of commercial embarrassment, or of disturbed and uneasy relations with Foreign States. But, luckily, England and France, the two great nations of Europe, are ruled by men, who, knowing well what war is, do their best to avoid it; they do not deem it a point of honour "greatly to find quarrel in a straw," and do not draw the sword to do what can be better done by explanation. Offences will come, but the folly and rashness of badly chosen subordinates are not permitted to set the world in a blaze.

Peace and plenty are much, but they are not all; and, examining more closely, the brightness of the picture is not without shadows, and dark ones too. The external peace is not internal content; in the prosperity all do not share; in the plenty all do not participate; and far down in the depths of society lie restless, unquiet, and dangerous elements. To deal with these is becoming more and more the engrossing question. The proof of this is the attention now paid to subjects with which politics are only indirectly connected. Parks and gardens, in the vicinity of populous towns; better habitations for the working classes; more perfect drainage to remove a constant source of disease; baths and washing houses, to place cleanliness of clothes and person within the reach of all;—all these plans for social improvement have taken, during the past year, a more definite form, and some of them have been actually commenced. The brilliant achievements of war, and the noisy triumphs of party and policy, rarely have such beneficial results. These alone are sufficient to make 1844 a year worthy of remembrance.

Nor has it been wanting in a more extrinsic interest. Three monarchs have been the guests of the Queen of England; the stern Autocrat of Russia, who acknowledges no law but his own will; the sagacious and clear-headed King of the French; and the mild, unobtrusive, and science-loving ruler of Soxony, have all sojourned for a space at the English Court. The etiquette that separates Sovereigns from their subjects, keeps them equally apart from each other, but we have seen the conventional barrier broken through. Monarchs are putting off their state; let us hope their people will divest themselves gradually of their mutual prejudices. Steam is smoothing the path over oceans; wealth and skill are covering the earth with those iron marvels on which the same wonder-working power traverses with almost the speed of wind; and will yet bring the capitals of the world into easy communication with each other. It will take years, perhaps ages, to develop all the results of these changes, but it is evident the past year and the one on which we have just entered, will have had their full share in producing them.

Of all that is passing around us, our pages, we trust, abundantly prove we are no idle or unobservant spectators. Not a word should we say of ourselves, but that on the opening of a New Year, we may do so neither unfitly nor ungracefully, combined as it must be with a hearty and unreserved acknowledgment of the appreciation our labours have received from the people of England. Nor is it confined to our native clime and country. The language of art is universally comprehended, and by it we have the satisfaction of knowing we address a continental and European public as well as our own. The greatest share of our attention is, of course, given to home occurrences, but the scenes and events of other lands contribute their interest to our pages.

The Pollings and Processions of an American President's Election, and the Storming of a Hill Fort in India, are alike observed and sketched for us. From the extreme east to the extreme west, wherever the actions of men are awakening man's curiosity—

> We have our eyes upon them, and their deeds
> Come to us on the wind.

The opening of a new year is generally a period of resolve, of promise, and of profession. We have them not to make; we have only to give our readers the assurance, that, with energy, not only unabated, but increased, we shall pursue our course, hoping to preserve our popularity by the same means that gained it. And with this assurance, we lay before them our first number for 1845.

GALLANT CAPTURE OF A SLAVER, OFF FISH BAY, WEST COAST OF AFRICA.

GALLANT CAPTURE OF A SLAVER.

By the Gazette of Friday, the 27th ult., the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have received from Commodore Jones, the Senior Officer of Her Majesty's squadron on the west coast of Africa, a letter, inclosing one from Commander Scott, of the Hyacinth, detailing the following account of the gallant and dashing behaviour of Mr. John Francis Tottenham, mate of the Hyacinth. On the 12th of August, in or about lat. 15 deg. south, long. 11 deg. 30 min. east, when off Fish-bay, Commander Scott sent Mr. Tottenham, in a four-oared gig, with one spare hand, to communicate with the Portuguese Governor.

The weather became thick, and he missed his port, but knowing that this ship was working along the coast, anchored for the night, and pulled to the southward. On the morning of the 13th, he discovered a brig at anchor, without colours, and saw her slip and make sail, on which he gave chase; being to windward, and the breeze light, he was enabled to approach her weather beam, and fire a musket a-head to induce her to heave to and show her colours; this and a second were disregarded, but a port was opened and a gun run out and brought to bear on the boat, which caused the officer to pull into her wake, when part of the crew of the brig commenced firing musketry, while the others got the gun on the poop, and pointed it at the boat. Mr. Tottenham now commenced firing, as fast as the spare hand could load for him, being just able to keep way with the brig; having hit four of the men on board, they left the gun, and, after firing muskets for 20 minutes, finding they were unable to weather the land or tack without being boarded by the boat, they ran the brig on shore, and abandoned her to the number of 18, including 3 wounded men, bearing another mortally wounded (since dead), on board.

In the course of the afternoon the brig was discovered on shore from the mast-head of the Hyacinth, which stood in and anchored, and hove her off, when she proved to be of 200 tons, without papers, a Brazilian ensign in the cabin, fully equipped for conveying about 1000 slaves, two guns of four pounds calibre loaded, a barrel of powder, and a quantity of langridge shot, a number of muskets, swords, and bayonets on the deck. Almost every bullet expended in the gig was traced to the gun-carriage, or its immediate vicinity on the poop.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have, we are happy to add, promoted Mr. John Francis Tottenham, mate of the Hyacinth, to the rank of lieutenant.

A correspondent has favoured us with the following Impromptu, on reading an account of the single-handed attack upon a slave-ship:—

"Alone I did it."—SHAKSPEARE.

Oh! ne'er had Honour in the cause of Glory,
A brighter wreath of evergreen to twine—
Oh! ne'er had Muse to consecrate in story
A worthier name, brave Tottenham, than thine!
With single-handed bravery,
Against a host of Slavery,
Thou stood'st the fight
In dauntless might,

To prove how nerv'd the arm can be
That's rais'd in cause of Liberty!
The Hero of a Hundred Fights
Can never taste the pure delights
Of thy good generous heart—
His calling is to make untimely graves—
Thine to emancipate, not make men slaves,—
Which takes the better part?

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

No sober Englishman can imagine what Paris is from 12 o'clock on the last day of December for 24 hours afterwards. It is no slight task to collect one's thoughts and reminiscences such a day as this, when all the combustible elements of the French character are alight. The whole population is running madly up and down, embracing at home, or careering for salutes in the streets. Porters, servants, maids, following their masters and mistresses about, all loaded with comfits, bouquets, and every form of knick-knackery and presents. In the meantime, the drums are beating to arms, and the messengers flying right and left, assembling every functionary from the simple garde nationale up to the counseller of state, or peer of France—all having to visit in ceremony some dozen or more of superiors, if not even the King himself: whilst in spite of indescribable hurry, speed is impossible, since on his journey from his own house to the place of rendezvous each man has to embrace at least a hundred friends or comrades. To procure an interval of peace, in order to write this letter, I began by kissing the whole house from the porter's wife to the old lady on the fifth floor, and then I barricaded the door against the battery of salutes levelled against my repose—but the noise is maddening. The scene presented by the streets of Paris at this moment is truly local and characteristic. The festivities of the jour de l'an are as yet unaffected by the increasing ascendancy of English fashion, which is visible in everything else, and has even tinged the atmosphere with its sombre hue. Last Thursday, a fog emulating any of those in your metropolis, enveloped all Paris as in the darkness of Erebus; such a scene was never presented to the eyes of any living Parisian. At half-past five o'clock the coachmen were obliged to descend from their seats, to lead the horses. The darkness became more intense as the evening advanced; policemen were running in all directions with torches to light the passengers; in addition to this, many speculators established directly a sale of lanterns and torches—but all in vain. Even with this assistance it was impossible to see a step before one. Many pleasure-seekers, leaving their houses for the theatre, remained several hours on the road, equally unable to advance or return home. The Duchesse de Cazes gave a brilliant concert that night. Numerous were the guests invited, but not above half of them appeared. The rest lost their way, in their endeavours to reach the Palais Luxembourg, which is at the further extremity of the town. Numerous were the accidents that night, and the insufficiency of the Paris police was more than ever felt. It is to be hoped that attention will be directed to this point, and that some provision may be made for the safety of night passengers.

Amongst the most brilliant balls given lately in high society, have been those of Mrs. G——d, at which the mazurka was danced with great success; and of the Prince Tufiakin, which was honoured by the presence of some of our most distinguished élégantes. Balls and fêtes are still rare; however, the pleasures of the season creep on but slowly. Even the gaiety attendant on a Royal marriage, and the addition of a young and lovely Princess as a centre of attraction, have failed to give to Paris its wonted animation. Many high families are in mourning, in others some sad event has taken away all inclination for gaiety.

You remember the sad affair of the young Count de Maupas, who killed, in a transport of anger, a workman who had insulted him. His acquittal by the jury only augmented the excess of his remorse, and he is now suffering under a severe ophthalmic disease, brought on by the incessant tears he had shed since that deplorable event. On the other hand, you see the daughter of a noble family, Mdlle. de Bourbon, granddaughter of Marshal Monieg, Duke of Conegliano, taking the veil at the Hospital of St. Jacques de Besançon.

The principal lion of Parisian society at this moment, is M. Felicien David, a new musical star, who in the enthusiasm he creates, is compared to Rossini, and certainly, if his genius be judged from what he has attempted, it is of a more original order than any composer who has yet appeared. The last performance of his musical ode, entitled "The Desert," was attended by the Arab Chiefs now in Paris; but they must have been strangely puzzled to discover the analogy betwixt the noisy instrumentation of an orchestra, and the scenery of their fatherland.

To the astonishment of the Parisians themselves, Mdlle. Rachel, the fair miracle of French tragedy, re-appeared for the first time at the Français the other night, for the benefit of a veteran of the Buskin, and the theatre was tolerably empty. The British tragedians are more fortunate—the ovations to Macready appear to have neither limit nor end to them. Mr. Mitchell will do well to make hay whilst the sun shines. If the rays of French favour are intense, they are transient indeed. Ojeda, the new Spanish tenor, made his debût at last at the Italian Opera, but failed. The lessee is successful, but it is in symphonic odes and in English tragedians.

PARIS FASHIONS.

January 1st., 1844.

For once our volatile Parisians, under the influence of a new fashion, have been like the punctilious lords of the ancien régime, freezing themselves at the doors, in a struggle of courtesy and precedence, and arresting the progress of general recreation. The superior vogue of the vie de chateau has prevented even those élégantes already long since returned, from giving signs of their presence, and the fashions of the season have remained buried in the magic recesses of the fair leader's brains, and in the sanctuaries of the high priestesses of la mode. But the number of princesses; young, gay, handsome blondes and brunettes, struggling for supremacy, who now fill the family court circle, have elicited fashion from its hiding places, in spite of all resistance, and it is in this quarter that its whole power is henceforward to reside.

For dresses, the materials decided upon under their fair control, as worthy of the highest vogue, are velvets and silks, brocaded in gold—trimmings of lace being essential to complete a toilette recherchée. The Duchess d'Aumale—the new court star—has introduced coral, so long since banished from the list of feminine resources. She has brought with her from Naples the most beautiful ornaments of this kind, and wears them in defiance of the prejudice which assigns to blondes only the paler colours for ornament. The youthful duchess wore on her fair hair at the last reception, a small ducal coronet in coral, which was placed round the knot of hair at the back of the head. The ball on the top of each leaf composed of fine pearls. Ribbons brocaded in gold are much worn. I saw a coiffure of this kind worn at the Italiens the other night, by Miss B., a young American lady, who has just made her début in society. It was composed of sky-blue ribbons embroidered in silver; with this she wore a dress of pink silk with white stripes. These decided contrasts are still in favour, and on this occasion produced a charming effect.

One of the most striking metamorphoses in dress, is the number of caps worn by élégantes of all ages. No longer confined to the dowagers and chaperones, every youthful belle now adopts a cap. The prettier, the more coquettish, the more eagerly does she fly to her marchande de mode, for one of those exquisitely light and becoming coiffures, dignified by the name of a cap, and known as Bonnets à la Paysanne, Bonnets à la Charlotte Corday; these last are made in guipure. Those trimmed with jet are also in favour.

The favourite colours for dresses for the promenade or morning visits, are black and dark green. Bonnets are often made in grenat velvet, with a bird of Paradise. Some of our élégantes have adopted the most brilliant colours for their bonnets. Amongst others, I may quote the Countess de V—— who wore the other day a satin bonnet, coleur de feu, with a rich trimming of black lace. An attempt has been made to revive capotes, but it has failed. The favourite dresses at this moment, are those laced in front, over a cambric corsage, the sleeves rounded at the edges, and rather short, only just large enough to allow for the passage of the under sleeve. Gimp is still used for trimmings. The number of Arabs now in Paris has brought back the Moorish fashions. Burnous have resumed their vogue as evening wrappers.

Amidst the numberless, and generally short-lived, caprices of the votaries of fashion, must be noticed one that has gained some ground amongst the most distinguished élégantes, that of wearing every article of dress of the same colour, from the coiffure even to the shoes. The Countess de B—— wore, the other night at the Opera, a dress of white cachemire, with white pieds d'alouette in her hair; and in a box further on, was seen the beautiful Duchess d'Istrie, in a black lace dress, trimmed with jet, and black gloves. This sombre costume was, however, relieved by a splendid diadem in gold, encircling the forehead. Velvets are only worn in very light colours for the evening, but materials brocaded in gold or silver have the highest vogue. This material is also used for turbans. That which cannot fail to strike all observers in the present fashions, is the increased and lavish use of every costly material; whilst the ruin that last season's career of fashion has produced in society, is marked by the absence of some of the best known and most brilliant of its former leaders.

FRANCE.

The intelligence from France this week is of peculiar importance. There has, very unexpectedly, been a Ministerial crisis, or, at least, a serious check, calculated to lead to one. The first indication of the decaying influence of the Cabinet, was observable in the small majority by which the election of M. Sauzet to the Presidency of the Chamber of Deputies was obtained. There were two ballots, and the numbers at the close of the second were—

For M. Sauzet	177
For M. Dupin	129
Majority	—48

It was said in the Chamber that only two Ministers (MM. Guizot and Duchatel) were favourable to M. Sauzet, and that he would have lost his election but for the hostility of M. Dupin to the Church, which threw into the scale in favour of his competitor the votes of the majority of the Legitimists.

The next indication was of a still more serious character. A ballot took place for the election of four Vice Presidents and the Secretaries; the result of which was that Messrs. Salvandy and Bignon, Ministerial candidates, were chosen, but M. Dufaure, the Opposition candidate, was also successful. The election of a fourth Vice President was postponed till a subsequent day, when the struggle was between M. De Belleyme, the Ministerial candidate, and M. Billault, who was supported by the Opposition. The result was as follows:—

For M. Billault	168

The secretaries appointed were the same as last year, namely, Messrs. Lacrosse, the Opposition candidate, who obtained 192 votes; De l'Espée, 189; Boissy d'Angla, 188; and Lascases, 176. The last three are Ministerialists. The second Opposition candidate, M. Havin, had 162 votes.

The selection of the Ministerial candidate as the other Vice President by a majority of four only created considerable excitement in the Chamber of Deputies, and out of the house it was everywhere considered in the light of a serious defeat. The Opposition papers are, of course, highly elated at this result, and even the Ministerial Débats admits the gravity of the circumstance, but affects to believe that the general supporters of the Government are yet sufficiently numerous to prevent a resignation. The Débats says—

"We must now wait for the discussion on the address. We do not endeavour to conceal what there is in the first proceeding of the Chamber to excite regret; but we are far from despairing of the majority—we have had too much reason to rely upon its intelligence and its devotedness to the policy of order and peace. We may be taken by surprise, and there may be intrigues concealed in the darkness of a ballot not preceded by a discussion; but the discussion of the tribune will throw a light upon these intrigues and render surprise impossible. We shall see whether the 168 persons who voted for M. Billault are really desirous of a change of policy, or merely wish for a change of Ministry. We are as firmly of opinion as before, that the majority will maintain its policy. If a change of Ministry is desired, France will be curious to learn who its representatives are who wish to substitute M. Billault for M. Guizot."

On the other hand, there are reports that the Ministry of M. Guizot will not survive the debate on the address. M. Guizot is said to have used the most extraordinary exertions to avert what has taken place. He is reported to have spent the whole of Sunday driving from the hotel of the British Embassy to the Tuileries, from the Tuileries to the Ministry of War, to M. Fulchiron's house, and other influential members of the Chamber, recruiting votes for the election. The King is said to have affected the greatest indifference respecting the result of the ballot between MM. Billault and De Belleyme, and the fate of the Ministry. His Majesty had a long conference with Count Molé, and the next morning with Count de Montalivet. The Duke Pasquier, whom the King is in the habit of consulting since the death of Prince Talleyrand, was also of late a constant visitor at the Tuileries. A courier had been despatched to hasten the return of Marshal Bugeaud, and Marshal Vallee has of late frequently transacted business with the Duke de Nemours.

Another event of a melancholy character has occurred, calculated very seriously to augment the difficulties of the Ministry. M. Villemain, so distinguished as a scholar, and for his attainments as a philosopher and a statesman, has been seized with alarming illness, and has become insane.

The Moniteur announces that the King has signified to M. Villemain his deep regret at seeing him retire from office, and publishes a royal ordonnance accepting his resignation, and charging M. Dumon, the Minister of Public Works, with the department of Public Instruction ad interim.

The Courrier Français and the Jenemies of M. Guizot generally ascribe the alleged indifference of Louis Philippe to his dissatisfaction at the coldness with which he was received at the opening of the Chambers. His Majesty is reported to have said, "Notwithstanding the services rendered me by poor Guizot, I must have a Ministry under whom Vive le Roi! shall be cried, and I may review the National Guard."

Another untoward circumstance, just at this moment, is the arrival of M. Dupetit-Thouars from Tahiti.

The Chamber of Deputies met on Tuesday, to instal its President and Secretaries for the session.

M. Sapey, before vacating the Presidential chair, paid a tribute of regret to the memory of M. Lafitte, who had last year occupied it by right of seniority.

M. Sauzet, the new President, then embraced M. Sapey, and having taken possession of the chair, thanked the Assembly for the honour it had conferred upon him, in choosing him for its President.

The Minister of Finance afterwards ascended the tribune, and deposited on the table the budget of receipts and expenditures for 1846.

The Minister justified the mode he had adopted for effecting the issue of the remaining portion of the loan, and spoke of the floating debt, and of the measures taken to lessen the burdens occasioned to the State by the investments in the savings-banks. Notwithstanding an increase in the number and salaries of officers of several departments, the creation of several new post offices, and other improvements, provided for in the estimates, the Minister announced that the expenditures and receipts would, nevertheless, be equally balanced, thanks to the increase in the latter, and the general prosperity of the country. The Minister next presented a project of law relative to the savings-banks; and the Chamber having decided that the twenty-eight projects of law lying over since last year should be discussed this session, adjourned to Thursday.

SPAIN.

We learn from Madrid that the Minister for Foreign Affairs has presented to the Senate a most important bill relative to the treaty concluded between Great Britain and Spain in 1835, for the abolition of the slave trade. By this measure offences connected with the slave trade are rendered penal—a point which, ever since the signature of the treaty, it has been the constant object of English Ministers to obtain from Spain. The President of the Council was slightly indisposed.

A letter from Madrid, of the 23rd ult., states that the marriage of the Queen with Count Trapani was no longer probable, although advocated by the Queen-Mother. Queen Isabella and her sister would, it was believed, wed their cousins, the sons of Don Francisco de Paula.

TURKEY.

Letters from Constantinople to the 17th ult., state that Sir Stratford Canning is determined to obtain satisfaction for the outrage committed by the Pasha of Trebisond. This circumstance had created some sensation in diplomatic quarters.

The Porte has at length reluctantly consented to liquidate the indemnity due to Sir Baldwin Walker, whose retirement from the Turkish service has been officially noticed.

Preparations were making at Constantinople for the execution of the plan which has been adopted for the fortification of the Dardanelles, the Government of which has just been added to the other employments of Mehemet Ali, Pasha of Topkhana, who has appointed as his lieutenant a certain Ibrahim Pasha.

UNITED STATES.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The Caledonia has arrived in 13 days from Boston, and brings New York papers to the 15th Dec. They contain the Message of the President to Congress. This document is, as usual, a very lengthy one, but our readers will no doubt prefer an analysis of the most essential points of it, rather than extended extracts, the perusal of which would be wearisome and profitless. Mr. Tyler begins by expressing gratitude to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe for the continuance of general peace, and that nothing has occurred to derange the harmony of the political system. He recognises in the general obedience to the laws, the devoted attachment of the American people to the institutions under which they live. Mr. Tyler eulogises the confederacy of the 26 States, and dwells upon the advantages of the confederacy.

Passing from this panegyric upon the confederation, Mr. Tyler expresses gratification at the friendly terms with which the United States continue in regard to foreign powers:—

"The conviction that peace is the true policy of nations would seem to be growing and becoming deeper among the enlightened everywhere; and there is no people who have a stronger interest in cherishing the sentiment, and adopting the means of preserving and giving it permanence, than those of the United States. Among these, the first and most effective are, no doubt, the strict observance of justice, and the honest and punctual fulfilment of all engagements. But it is not to be forgotten that, in the present state of the world, it is no less necessary to be ready to enforce their observance and fulfilment in reference to ourselves, than to observe and fulfil them, on our part, in regard to others."

The President alludes to the negotiations with this country relative to the Oregon boundary question, and says the best efforts of the Government will be directed to insure a favourable termination of them; but at the same time he intimates the necessity of providing against the acts of the viciously disposed and lawless. He regrets that there has not been an entire settlement of the matters in difference between the two countries, and alludes particularly to the right of search, expressing an anxiety for an arrangement. Mr. Tyler then again remarks on the pacific aspect of affairs all over the world:—

"We continue to receive assurances of the most friendly feelings on the part of all the other European powers, with each and all of whom it is obviously our interest to cultivate the most amicable relations. Nor can I anticipate the occurrence of any event which would be likely, in any degree, to disturb those relations. Russia, the great northern power, under the judicious sway of her Emperor, is constantly advancing in the road of science and improvement; while France, guarded by the counsels of her wise Sove reign, pursues a course calculated to consolidate the general peace. Spain has obtained a breathing spell of some duration from the internal convulsions which have through so many years marred her prosperity; while Austria, the Netherlands, Prussia, Belgium, and the other powers of Europe, reap a rich harvest of blessings from the prevailing peace."

The next important allusion is to Mexico and Texas. He vindicates the conduct of the United States in regard to Mexico, and after contending that no intrigue has been resorted to in order to accomplish the annexation of Texas, intimates pretty plainly that the Government is determined to abide by it.

The President then felicitates the country upon the improvement in trade, and upon its present financial condition, and suggests the very desirable course of taking steps to maintain the credit of the Government. Such a proceeding, he says,

"Would serve to maintain its credit at the highest point, and prevent, to a great extent, those fluctuations in the prices of the securities which might, under other circumstances, affect its credit. No apprehension of this sort is, at this moment, entertained; since the stocks of the Government, which, but two years ago, were offered for sale to capitalists, at home and abroad, at a depreciation, and could find no purchasers, are now greatly above par in the hands of the holders; but a wise and prudent forecast admonishes us to place beyond the reach of contingency the public credit."

In spite of the pacific anticipations at the outset of his speech, however, Mr. President Tyler, at its conclusion, adverts to the necessity of keeping both army and navy in an effective condition. He also says:—

"I cannot too strongly urge the policy of authorizing the establishment of a line of steamships regularly to ply between this country and foreign ports, and upon our own waters, for the transportation of the mail."

After dwelling upon the improved aspect of the country generally, Mr. Tyler concludes his message in these terms:—

"Under these circumstances, and with these anticipations, I shall most gladly leave to others more able than myself the noble and pleasing task of sustaining the public prosperity. I shall carry with me into retirement the gratifying recollection that, as my sole object throughout has been to advance the public good, I may not entirely have failed in accomplishing it, and this gratification is heightened in no small degree by the fact that when, under a deep and abiding sense of duty, I have found myself constrained to resort to the qualified veto, it has neither been followed by disapproval on the part of the people, nor weakened in any degree their attachment to that great conservative feature of our Government."

The message was delivered on the 3rd of December, and the subsequent proceedings of Congress were important. In the Senate on the 3rd, Mr. M'Dufie introduced a joint resolution for the annexation of Texas to the United States. The resolution provides that the first eight articles of the treaty rejected by the Senate last Session, shall be the fundamental law of union betwen the United States and Texas, so soon as the supreme authorities of that Republic shall agree to the same; and, also, that whatever was stipulated to be done immediately, or at a fixed period after the ratification of the treaty compact, shall be done immediately, or in a like period after the authorities of Texas shall have formally agreed to the resolution. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. A similar joint resolution was also reported in the House. On the following day Mr. Benton introduced his bill of last Session, providing for the "re-annexation of Texas;" and this was also referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

It appears by these papers that an angry and of course lengthy correspondence has taken place between the United States, Mexico, Texas, France, and England, with respect to annexation; the most important facts disclosed in which are, that in pursuance of instructions received from Mr. Calhoun, to "use strong language," Mr. Shannon, the United States Minister to Mexico, at once proceeded to do so, by protesting, "in the most solemn form," against the invasion of Texas, and against the manner in which Mexico was acting towards that country.

It was even reported that Mr. Shannon had suspended diplomatic relations with Mexico. The remainder of the correspondence shows that Texas, alarmed by the threats of an invasion by Mexico, applied to the United States Government for the fulfilment of Mr. Murphy's pledge of military assistance and protection. This fact was adverted to in the reply to the application, which declined rendering the assistance on the ground that the promise was to be in force only while the treaty was pending; and as the treaty had fallen through, by the refusal of the Senate to ratify, the promise had fallen with it. The Mexican Congress had unanimously voted an approval of the replies of the Mexican Minister (M. Rejou) to Mr. Shannon.

REPORTED REVOLUTION IN MEXICO.—The New York Sun, of the 14th Dec. has the following:—"The southern mail of this afternoon brings us startling intelligence from Vera Cruz, under date 21st of November. The Legislatures of the departments of Aguas-Calientes, Querétaro, San Luis Potosi, and Zacatecas have united with the Legislature of Jalisco in declaring against the Government of Santa Anna, and in favour of the revolution. Vera Cruz is said to have also declared for the revolutionists, but this is contradicted. Santa Anna is reported to have taken flight, and was daily expected at Vera Cruz, en route for the island of Cuba, where it is said he intends to seek refuge for the present.

COMMERCIAL—NEW YORK PRICES.—There is no change of any moment in the price of the dividend-paying stocks since the last packet, but the market is feverish. Bills on London from 110 to 109½. No material change in the cotton market.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 15.—The recent extraordinary and sudden rise in Pennsylvania State, Fives has excited much attention, and may induce many to speculate in them, whereas there never was a time when speculators should be more cautious, particularly as the views of Mr. Shunk, the new Governor of the State, are not yet known. The Fives rose in a few days from 68 to 73. They are now 72.

CANADA.

The Canadian Parliament met, as appointed, on the 28th ult.; and the House of Assembly having chosen a speaker in the person of Sir Allan M'Nab, who was opposed for that office by Augustin M. Morin, his excellency the Governor-General delivered on the succeeding day a speech, in which he gave a favourable account of the condition of the country. His excellency announced that many subjects in which the welfare of the country was deeply interested, would be submitted for consideration. Among others the improvement of the education of the people.

Lower Canada, Montreal in particular, has again been the scene of fatal and disgraceful rioting, immediately ensuing on the elections, and originally springing from the lamentably malignant animosity existing between the contending parties. Two men have been killed, a number wounded, and verdicts of wilful murder returned against several individuals implicated in the disturbances.

THE ISLAND OF TAHITI.

The Reine Blanche has arrived at Brest with several numbers of the Océanie Française. They contain news from the island to the 14th of July, comprising long details of its present condition and of events already known. Of course, these accounts may be supposed to have a French colouring.

The last number of the Océanie has the following:—

"At the moment of going to press her Britannic Majesty's sloop of war Carysfort, Captain Lord Paulet, appeared off the ridge which closes in the roadstead of Papeete, and, without entering, saluted the flag of our commander, which was returned by the Uranie. At the same time the Governor received a visit from Lord Paulet.

"The Carysfort brings private letters from France, which come viâ Panama, with dates up to the 26th of February, but no despatch for the Governor, nor a single journal. The Governor has only received a letter from an officer who commands one of King Louis Philippe's ships in the South Seas, announcing that a French journal, which had reached Valparaiso, gave intelligence that the whaler Elizabeth, which left Tahiti within the first fortnight of November in last year, carrying despatches, informing the Government of the motives which forced Admiral Dupetit Thouars to convert the Protectorate of Tahiti into an absolute possession of the island, had made her passage to Havre in ninety-five days.

"The same journal, of the date 29th of February, says, that after the reception of the despatches we have mentioned, his Majesty declared that he could not accept the full possession, but must adhere to the Protectorate. We repeat, that the Governor has not received any official despatches, but nevertheless, on reading the letter sent to him from Valparaiso, he hastened to send the chief of his staff on board the Basilisk, with a letter to Queen Pomare, acquainting her with the state of affairs, and inviting her to come on shore. This letter was interpreted to Queen Pomare in the presence of the bearer and of the captains of the Carysfort and Basilisk. Pomare replied that she had determined not to land, but would go to Borabora, and there wait the conclusion of the affair."

The Océanie of July 7th, contains a long summary of the recent expeditions against the insurgents, and then gives textually the report of Captain

Bonard, of the Uranie, stating minutely the whole of his proceedings in the affair of Ponnavia.

A letter from Papeiti, July the 8th, written by a Frenchman, and addressed to the Débats, contains the following:—

"The insurgents have become remarkably bold; to say the truth, the entire population of the island, with the exception of two or three districts, have risen against us, encouraged by foreign instigation, and furnished with arms and ammunition of every kind. Fire has played a great part in this war; the natives have too frequently recourse to it. The captain of the Uranie had contracted for some supplies with a colonist who had a property at some distance from Papeiti, but who had not hands enough to cultivate it. Our sailors performed the labour, and received two-thirds of the produce. The property has just been ravaged, and the house burned down. Our missionaries have also been victims. Their residence, which was a perfect palace for this country, has experienced the same fate, and everything indicates that the mischief will not stop here. We must not, however, despair. The presence in our roads of the English steamer Salamander will, without doubt, change the nature of events, the captain observing an opposite line of conduct to that of his predecessors. Far from seconding the insurgents, he has written to them to state the true position of England as regards France, and has threatened to join with us if they should attack Papeiti. This step is probably only the prelude of an entirely new policy on the part of the representatives of England at Tahiti."

One of the reports to the French Governor announces the death of an English missionary, whose name is given in a private letter as Makinn. This unfortunate gentleman was, it is said, standing on a balcony looking at the troops when the natives opened their fire upon the French, and he received a ball, which killed him immediately.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA.

By the arrival of the Bentinck steamer at Suez, news has been received from Calcutta to the 16th of November, and from China to the 31st of October. The most important fact received from India is the information of thesuppression of the insurrection at Kolapore. Considerable sensation had been created by the murder of Capt. Alcock, of the 46th N. I., on his way to Neemuch. We learn from Egypt that the postal treaty between this country and the Pacha has received Mehemet Ali's signature and has been sent home for ratification. Although the particulars of the agreement have not been made public, it is believed that it is based on the same principles as the one made with the French Government for the India mails proceeding through France, and that Mehemet Ali will receive an amount of ppstage on the mails passing through Egypt to and from India, at the rate of 6s. per lb. on letters, and 1s. per lb. en newspapers. the term is for five years. The mails will be conveyed through the country by the Viceroy at his own expense, and will be accompanied by an English messenger. The following is a general summary of the events of the previous month from the Bengal Hurkaru, of the 16th November.

"The past month has not been prolific in events of a very stirring character. The insurrection in the Kolapore country, which proved to be of a more serious character than we supposed when last we wrote, has been put down, and the disturbed districts seem to be tolerably quiet. In this Presidency nothing of a very important character has occurred. The Governor General is still at the Presidency, and rumour is silent on the subject of any intended move from the seat of government. He appears to be quietly perfecting himself in the business of his administration; and such indications as have yet been manifested seem to point to a tranquil and pacific government, pregnant with good to the people of the soil. There is no talk of a war in the Punjaub, or any other immediate employment of our troops. Even the civil war, which many anticipated, in that long-agitated country, seems to be no longer imminent. There was a deal of vapouring between the two chiefs, Heera and Golab Singh, but they were not in earnest, and nothing came of all their menaces. They have now come to a pacific understanding, and matters will speedily be settled, though, probably, only to be disturbed again. In the meanwhile, Sawun Mull, the Governor of Moultan, one of the most able and energetic, and, at the same time, the most moderate and respectable of the Seikh Chiefs, has been gathered to his fathers. He was shot by a malefactor, whilst sitting on the judgment seat, and after lingering for a few days died of his wound. He has been succeeded by his son, Mool Raj. The intelligence from Affghanistan is, as usual, not very clear and reliable; but it would seem that the dangers which Dost Mahomed apprehended from the designs of the Usbegs and Tartars have blown over; that his successes on the Hindoe Koosh have rolled back the tide of invasion, and that the intrigues of Bokhara have been defeated. From the latter place Dr. Wolff has emerged in safety."

We subjoin the particulars of the murder of Captain Alcock:—The Deputy Quartermaster-General, Captain Alcock, left Cawnpore by palkee dawk for Agra, from whence he intended to march to Nusseerabad. He took an early dinner at Mrs. Clarkson's house, at Mynpooree, and left in high health and spirits towards evening. At Bhooreah Tallao, he was attacked by a dacoitee gang; he got out of his palkee, and defended himself with his sword, until they cut him across his wrists, when he ran towards the village calling for assistance, and one of the dacoits then shot him dead. He was mistaken for the magistrate, Mr. Unwin, who had been hunting after this gang, and he (Mr. Unwin) also left Mynpoore by dawk, and, alone, that evening arrived at the village two hours after, to find Captain Alcock sacrificed to the vengeance of these wretches for him. He returned with the body to Mynpooree, which was buried with all due honours. The same leader of this dacoitee attempted Captain Tudor's life last year!

SUICIDE OF THE RAJAH OF BERHAMPORE.—Rajah Kissenhat Roy, of Berhampore, shot himself in the early part of November. According to the Bengal Hurkaru, the man whom he was accused of having caused to be cruelly tortured, died from the injury he had received, and the young Rajah, under apprehension of the consequences to himself, was driven to the dreadful act of self-murder. He was living at his mother's house, in Chitpore Road, where, on the day in question, he invited Mr. Strettell and Mr. Herklots, and asked them to witness the execution of a folded document, which he himself signed, and told them it was his last will and testament. Very shortly after these gentlemen had left him, he locked himself within a room, and, loading one barrel of a double-barrelled percussion gun, bent his head over the muzzle and drew the lock with his foot. He fell dead instantly. The will left behind is said to be a very lengthy one, but regularly drawn up. In it several handsome legacies are mentioned, while a very munificent portion of the estate has been willed away towards the beneficent object of founding a college, or, as the will expresses it, a "university," at Berhampore, with an hospital attached. The young Rajah has, likewise, bequeathed a handsome legacy to one of his favourite domestic servants; and likewise the interest of a sufficient sum to be given for the subsistence of the widow and orphans of the man who was tortured.

At the inquest held upon the body of the late Rajah, a verdict of "Felo de se" was returned.

The notorious Aloo Paroo, together with Lewjee Amal, and Hajee Bhogaboy, have been duly convicted at Bombay, after a trial which lasted three days. The sentence of the court was, that Aloo Paroo be transported for life, Lewjee Amal for 10 years, and Hajee 18 months' imprisonment and hard labour.

COMMERCIAL NEWS.—The papers brought by the mail give rather more favourable accounts of the state of the markets in Bengal, than was expected. The abundance of money, and the low rate of exchange, is operating in favour of the country produce, and prices being thereby supported, it, to a certain extent, re-acts in favour of imported commodities. This is very evidently the case with indigo, which, for want of something more promising in point of return, has been purchased to a greater extent than could have been anticipated, for the purpose of remittance. The crop, it is said, is certain to amount to 150,000 maunds

From the Hong-Kong General Price Current we perceive that freights have suddenly advanced from £3 to £4 per ton, supposed to have been occasioned by the eagerness of purchasers of the new congous.

There has been considerable improvement in British Cotton Piece Goods, and Long Cloths, and Shirtings.

CHINA.

The dates from China is to the 31st of October, but no news of importance is given in addition to the last received.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SUDDEN DEATH OF MRS. HODSON, OF THE BOWER SALOON.—On Monday Mr. Carter held an inquest at the Bower Saloon, Lambeth, on the body of Mrs. Catherine Mary Hodson, landlady of the above house, whose death was awfully sudden. Miss Eleanor Hodson, a daughter of deceased, said that on Christmas day last, between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, she went into the deceased's bedroom, and found her mother apparently asleep. A short time previously witness had assisted to get the deceased into bed, in consequence of her being too ill to get in herself. She then complained of being very nervous, and shook as if she was cold. Mr. Berrell, a surgeon, had seen her that morning, and had sent her some medicine. A little after three o'clock, on witness going again to see how deceased was, she found her dead. She went out with her husband the previous evening to Mr. Farebrother's printing-office, in Bow-street, to arrange about the playbills for the following week, and on her return home she complained of sickness and feeling unwell. After hearing medical evidence, the jury returned a verdict of "Natural death, arising from a rupture of the brain."

ACCIDENT TO A CLERGYMAN.—On Tuesday evening, as the Rev. Valentine Brennin, of Hammersmith, was proceeding along the High street, his foot slipped from under him in consequence of his stepping upon a piece of orange peel, and he fell heavily into the road, and sustained a fracture of the right leg immediately below the knee; at his own desire he was conveyed to St. George's Hospital, where the limb was promptly set by Mr. Tatum, one of the house surgeons, and he is considered in a fair way of recovery.

LAMENTABLE EFFECTS OF DRINKING.—On Wednesday afternoon, Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest, at the Flag and Lamb, Clerkenwell-green, on the body of Frances Gardiner. It appeared that the deceased was greatly addicted to drink, and that she frequently almost deprived herself of the commonest necessaries in order that she might fully indulge her propensity for ardent liquors. Her husband, who is a most abstemious man, returned home on the night of the 28th of last month, when he found her drunk, and craving for more drink. In order to get her to bed he gave her rum. Upon awaking in the morning he found her a corpse at his side. Verdict, "Natural death." Mr. Wakley said that he lately held an inquest upon a lady inordinately given to drink. Her medical attendants informed her husband that she could not live without drink, but that drink would kill her. The husband, of the two evils, chose what to him appeared the lesser, as it secured him peace, and gave her what drink she desired. In two months she drank 137 bottles of port wine and brandy, exclusive of malt liquors. She shortly afterwards was seized with mortal sickness, and such was her craving for drink, even in the agonies of death, that her attendants were compelled to keep constantly in her mouth a rag saturated with brandy.

SHOCKING SUICIDE OF AN INSANE LADY.—On Wednesday evening Mr. Higgs held an inquest on the body of Mrs. Renton. It presented a shocking appearance, the throat being cut nearly from ear to ear. Mrs. Fanny Enoch had known the deceased for the last nine years, and attended on her. She arrived with her husband in England from Madeira on Christmas-day last, and took apartments at Osborne's Adelphi Hotel. Dr. Renton brought her from Madeira on account of insanity having manifested itself there. Whilst in Madeira she several times attempted her life by strangulation, and also did so on the passage. About half-past twelve o'clock that morning (Wednesday) witness begged of deceased to go to bed, to which she answered, she must wait a little while. She then went to another apartment, and in less than a minute witness followed her, and found the door fastened. On looking through the hole of the door witnessed observed by the light Mrs. Renton had with her, that she was on her knees, and heard the blood running into the basin. She instantly gave an alarm, and the door was burst open. The deceased was then found with the blood pouring from her throat. She was under restraint in Madeira; but had not been so since her arrival in England, as she appeared much better. The razor produced, covered with blood, was found by her side, and belonged to Dr. Renton; but witness could not say how she became possessed of it. Her insanity did not exhibit itself until October last. On Tuesday she appeared better than usual; but must have concealed the razor in her clothes for the purpose of destroying herself, as everything of danger was studiously kept out of her reach. She was a most amiable woman, and had every comfort that life could wish for. Sir James Clark and other medical gentlemen had seen her since her arrival in England. Verdict—"That the deceased destroyed herself by cutting her throat whilst in a state of insanity."

FIRE AT CROYDON.—On Wednesday morning between two and three o'clock, an alarming fire, which was not extinguished until property to a serious amount had been destroyed, broke out in the premises in the occupancy of Mr. R. S. M'Leod, maltster, at Thornton's Heath, Croydon. When first discovered, the flames had reached the kiln and stove room. From that part of the premises the flames extended to two malt floors stored with grain, one 110 feet long by 30 wide; the other upwards of 60 feet long by 32 wide. Before any of the stock contained in the loft could be rescued, the fire reached it, and broke through the roofs of both buildings. A spacious coach-house and a two-stall stable, belonging to a Mr. Maud, next became ignited, and, in spite of every effort to save them, they were speedily burned down. The two malt floors have their contents and roofs destroyed, and about 300 quarters of barley are damaged by fire and water. The fire originated from the overheat of the kiln. Fortunately a portion of Mr. M'Leod's loss will be made good by an insurance in the Guardian Office, but Mr. Maud's premises were wholly uninsured.

SUICIDE AND ATTEMPT AT MURDER.—A bookseller and newsvender named Flood, residing in Whitecross-street, last Saturday attempted to poison his daughter with laudanum, and afterwards committed suicide himself. The circumstances are as follow:—In the morning of the above day some of the neighbours were rather astonished at not finding the shop open at the usual time, and several hours having worn away, and the house still remaining closed, a lodger in the place of the name of Hodge, knocked at the door, and was answered by his daughter Catherine, a little girl about eight years of age. Mrs. Hodge inquired why she did not get up and open the shop; to which she replied that she could not get out of bed. She was then asked if she knew where her father had gone to. She answered that he was in bed and she was unable to wake him. Mrs. Hodge thought that all was not right, and the door being forced open, Mr. Flood was found lying upon the bed apparently dead, and near him was his daughter suffering from the effects of some deleterious matter. Flood was taken to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, but he expired soon after his admission. Emetics and other antidotes having been given to the girl, she rallied a little, and has since been sent to the workhouse. The deceased contemplated the destruction of his daughter's life, as well as his own, and upon a table was found a letter, in which he expressed a desire that his property should be given to a person named Scott, and that he might be laid alongside his wife and child. It appears that his wife has recently died, and was buried on the previous Tuesday. An inquest was held on Tuesday evening on the body of Flood, and after a long inquiry, the jury returned a verdict that "The deceased destroyed himself, being in an unsound state of mind."

TWO BOYS CHARGED WITH SHOOTING THEIR COMPANION.—At Rochester, on Monday, two boys named George Blake, aged twelve years, and Charles Rand, aged fifteen years, were charged with an attempt to murder William White, a lad thirteen years of age, son of a market gardener residing at Chalk, by firing a loaded gun at him. On the 25th instant Blake, in the employ of Mr. William Brown, farmer, was engaged to keep the crows from a piece of land, and was provided with a gun. Rand was also employed on some ground belonging to a market gardener close by, and White was on his father's ground. In the afternoon the three boys got together, and commenced quarrelling and fighting, when White kicked Blake in the groin. Rand seeing this told Blake to shoot White; Blake without hesitation took up his gu) and immediately shot White in the head. The gun was loaded with a strong charge of No 3 shot. The shots entered the head, which contains three-and-twenty shot wounds, the shots still remaining in the skull; the boy also received five shot wounds in his left arm. The father of the wounded boy said he was fearful the wounds would be fatal to his son. The magistrates remanded the two prisoners until the fate of the boy White is known.

POLICE.

BURGLARY IN SOUTHAMPTON-STREET. — At Bow-street on Tuesday, Richard Elliot, described on the police-sheet as a tobacconist, residing at No. 20, Bell-street, Paddington, and Richard Vincent, 19, Carlisle-street, Portman-market, an omnibus-driver, were charged with burglariously entering the dwelling-house of Mr. Thomas Cox, clerical tailor and robe maker, 29, Southampton-street, Strand, on the 26th December, and stealing therein various pieces of silk, linen, &c., to a considerable amount. The prisoner Elliot is the same person who was tried and acquitted, about nine months ago, at the Oxford Assizes, on a charge of having been concerned in stealing the sum of £800 from the boot of the Cheltenham coach. Mr. Clarkson appeared for the defence. The prosecutor said that shortly after ten o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, 24th December, he left home for the purpose of going to Tunbridge Wells, from whence he returned on the Thursday following, when he found that his premises had been broken open, and property amounting to nearly £200 had been taken away. The articles produced formed a portion of it, consisting of 400 yards of silk, value £130, together with eighteen pieces of linen, worth £20, and a great coat, the price of which was £4, which were taken from the stand in the shop. There were also 146 yards of linen, being eight pieces, with some remnants, and eighty-two yards of lavender-coloured silk, all of which bore his private mark. Inspector Shackell, of the detective force, proved that he made inquiries about the robbery up to Saturday last, when he received information that Elliot had gone into a public-house in the Coalyard in Drury-lane, and, having watched, saw him come out about four o'clock in the afternoon with a tall man, and after following them into Lincoln's-inn-fields he lost sight of them. He then returned to the public-house, and received the piece of lavender-coloured silk, consisting of seventeen yards, from Mrs. Dismore, the landlady, and on Monday, having gone to the prisoner's house, he saw Vincent come out, carrying a bundle, and as he passed into the Edgeware-road he was stopped by another officer, when he said he would convey them to the place and person from whom he had purchased the contents. They accordingly went into the Key public-house in Bell-street, when the prisoner said "That is the person (pointing to Elliot) from whom I got the property," which he denied. He then took Elliot into custody, and found upon him the halves of six £5 Bank of England notes joined together, but with different numbers and dates, two notes of the Buffalo Bank, with patterns of silk that had been cut off the piece produced. There was also a piece of silk found in the first floor of Elliot's house, with some duplicates and half notes of part of £800 that had been stolen from the Leicester Bank. On entering the house, the prisoner desired witness and the other officer to search, and take what they liked from the premises. Witness then produced a list of the articles found.—Cross-examined: There were also two gold watches, with a chain and some plate, which he had reason for detaining.—Mrs. Dismore, landlady of the King's Arms, in the Coalyard, declared she could not swear to the man she had bought the silk from on Saturday for £1 5s. 6d., as it was handed to her through a window by another person. There were several persons in front of the bar at the time, but the silk was in the possession of only one person, of whom she had no recollection.—Inspector Haynes after corroborating the greater part of the other inspector's statement, said that when the prisoners were confronted in the public-house, Elliot at first denied but then admitted the other had the linen from him. There were memorandums found on Vincent, mentioning the number of yards in two pieces of the linen, some duplicates relating to valuable property, and other articles. On searching Elliot's house, they found a piece of violet-coloured silk, containing forty-seven yards and upwards, folded up, from which the patterns had been cut, and another piece of the same colour between the bed and mattress, and in the parlour two pieces of linen; also a third in a bedroom, with others bearing the prosecutor's private mark. There were also six notes of the Bath Bank, and three halves of the Bank of England, not relating to the charge, found on the mantel-piece, with other property.—Mr. Jardine ordered the prisoners to be remanded.

SERIOUS CHARGE OF STABBING.—At the same office, on Wednesday, Laurence Wright, a shoemaker, was charged with stabbing Joseph John Cornwall, his landlord, in the temple, with a case knife. The complainant stated that the prisoner was his lodger, in Ship-yard, for about two months, and occasionally worked for him. On Tuesday morning his wife went into the room for the purpose of cleaning it, which the defendant objected to in such terms as to compel her to leave the place. In the course of the day, understanding some articles of furniture had been removed, he went to the room, thinking the defendant was out, to ascertain if such was the case, and finding him there he told him as he had conducted himself in such a manner towards his wife he should in future cease to occupy the room, when the prisoner instantly seized a knife, similar to that produced, from the table, and rushing at him, drove it into his temple, within the eighth of an inch of his left eye. From the effects of the blow the complainant instantly fell down stairs, and was conveyed in an exhausted state to the King's College Hospital.—Mr. Cannon, house surgeon of the hospital, stated that shortly before nine o'clock the complainant was brought in, having a punctured wound about an inch deep near the orbit of the left eye, and as it was of a dangerous character, he considered it necessary he should remain in the house under medical care.—The defendant accounted for his conduct by saying that the complainant struck him on the previous night, because he refused to allow his wife to dash a quantity of water on the floor, as he was in a delicate state of health. When the complainant entered the room, he put himself in a fighting attitude, threatening to throw him out of the house, although he owed no rent; and upon putting his threat into execution, he seized a weapon which he used in his trade, and defended himself in the best manner he could.—Mr. Twyford said the charge was of too serious a nature for him to deal with in a summary manner, and in order to enable the surgeon to give a decisive opinion on a future day, he should order the defendant to be remanded

BARBAROUS TREATMENT OF A CHILD.—At Lambeth New Police-office, on Wednesday, Robert Pratt was placed at the bar, on a charge of grossly ill-treating his son, Richard Pratt, a child five years and a half old.—Elizabeth Kingate, who lives next door to the prisoner, in Hooper-street, Westminster-road, said that the first time she had observed the child was about eight weeks ago, when he was crying bitterly at his father's door. On Tuesday morning, about half-past two o'clock, she was awoke by the violent screams of the child, and distinctly heard him cry out to his father for mercy, while the latter was evidently severely ill-using him. She knocked at the wainscot, and also threw up her window, and upon her doing so the prisoner ceased. Between ten and eleven o'clock she saw the child with his head through a broken pane of glass in the bedroom, and he then complained of being fastened in, and being very cold and hungry. Some of the neighbours had resolved upon taking him out of the room. A young man named Cronin, succeeded in doing so, but he was found to be in so shocking a state that they put him into the room again, until the police or parish officers arrived. In reply to the magistrate's question, the witness said she had never heard the child's mother ill-use him. Four other witnesses corroborated the evidence of the last witness in many particulars. One of them, a tradesman, who lived opposite the prisoner, added, that one day he heard a violent screaming issue from Pratt's house, and on hurrying across and looking through the window, he saw the child hanging from the top bannister by a rope, with a noose round his neck, and his feet about six inches from the ground. He instantly forced open the window sufficiently to put in a lad who was in his employment, and who cut the child down.—The prisoner, in reply to the charge, declared that the greater part of what the witnesses had stated was false, and wished to have the child examined.—Mr. Henry observed that the witnesses had given their evidence in such a way as must convince every person of their truthfulness. Mr. Henry, addressing Dunn, one of the beadles of Lambeth, said the case was one which should be prosecuted by the parish, and he should therefore request that the vestry clerk should be informed of the particulars, with the view of prosecuting the prisoner at the sessions. To afford the necessary time for this he should remand the prisoner until Monday next.

PUTTING DOWN SUICIDE.—At the Mansion-house, on Wednesday, a female of respectable appearance, but appearing to labour under much mental distress, who stated her name to be Hannah Haines, was charged with having contemplated self-destruction.—One of the City police stated that he found the prisoner in the neighbourhood of the river Thames, in a deplorable state of mind, and when he inquired the cause of her distress, she stated that her husband had deserted her, robbed her of all her clothes, and taken away with him the servant maid; that she had struggled with adversity, and actually with starvation, until that day, when her landlord threatened to seize what trifling matters of furniture she had for rent, amounting to 3s. 9d., and that she had come to the place in which she was apprehended for the purpose of putting an end to her existence. The witness added that she had given the names of some very respectable relatives of her husband, and their addresses, and seemed desirous, upon his suggestion, to seek the humane interposition of the Lord Mayor.—Lord Mayor: What do you say, prisoner?—The Prisoner: I am plunged, my lord, into the deepest poverty and distress by the conduct of my husband. He sold the business he had been carrying on, and abandoned me twelve months ago, taking with him and his paramour everything of the least value. He had commenced the world with property and good expectations, equal, I believe, to those of the rest of his family, but his prodigality destroyed all.—The Lord Mayor: I perceive that the names to which you have referred are respectable, and I am surprised that you should contemplate so awful a crime as self-murder. Do you suppose that any of those individuals will be willing to serve you?—The Prisoner: I think they would not refuse, my Lord. Those of my own family who are within my reach are poor, with large families.—The Lord Mayor: You shall be taken care of by the matron at the Compter until Friday, and in the meantime I shall cause inquiries to be made into the particulars of your statement.—The prisoner expressed her gratitude in a few broken but intelligible phrases.

TEXAS.

The State of Texas, previous to its independence, formed one of the provinces of Mexico. On its organization as a republic, it was recognised as an independent power by the United States; but it would appear that the acknowledgment was made with an ill grace, for ever since, at intervals, the slave-holding—and we may add the slave-bound—Congress has shown a strong desire to take it into the Union. France acknowledged Texas, and concluded a treaty with it 25th September, 1839. A treaty of amity and commerce between England and Texas was signed in London on the 16th of November, 1840, and ratified by the Texan Government in February, 1841. The Mexican Government has expressed a determination to reconquer Texas, but in the present desperate condition of Santa Anna, and the distracted and impoverished state of that country, it is not likely—even were the Americans and the European allies of the republic to remain passive—that it will be able to reduce a population almost inaccessible by land from Mexico, and one, too, which is already beginning to taste the sweets of self-government. One of the noblest acts of Lord Palmerston's policy was the Texan treaty, and we are of opinian it should be defended equally against the superstitions of the Spanish Mexicans, and the cupidity of American speculators.

The country comprehended under the name of Texas, differs considerably in its natural features from all other parts of the Mexican States. That portion of it which lies along the Sierra del Sagramento, and extends eastward to 102 deg. W. longitude, is considerably elevated above the sea, probably not less than 2000 feet. Its northern portion, embracing the country on both sides the Red River, as far north as the Arkansas, is an extensive plain, deficient of both wood and water. This region is joined on the south by an extensive tract of mountainous country, called the hills of San Saba, which is connected with the Sierra del Sagramento, and extends southward to the mouth of the Rio Pucoco. The mountains, probably, do not rise above 2000 feet; but this is only a supposition, as the whole region being in possession of a tribe of natives, the Comanches, who are enemies to the white settlers, is unknown. In this mountain-tract most of the large rivers that water Texas take their origin.

The remainder of Texas, included between the meridian of 100 deg. N. latitude, the Red River on the north, the Sabine on the east, and the Gulf of Mexico and Rio del Norte on the south, is considered one of the most fertile countries of North America. The coastis low, and skirted by a number of long flat islands, separated from the Main by narrow straits; but these straits are much deeper than those farther south, and afford, in several places, good anchoring ground for vessels of moderate size; so that Texas has more and better harbours than all the Mexican States on the Gulf of Mexico taken together.

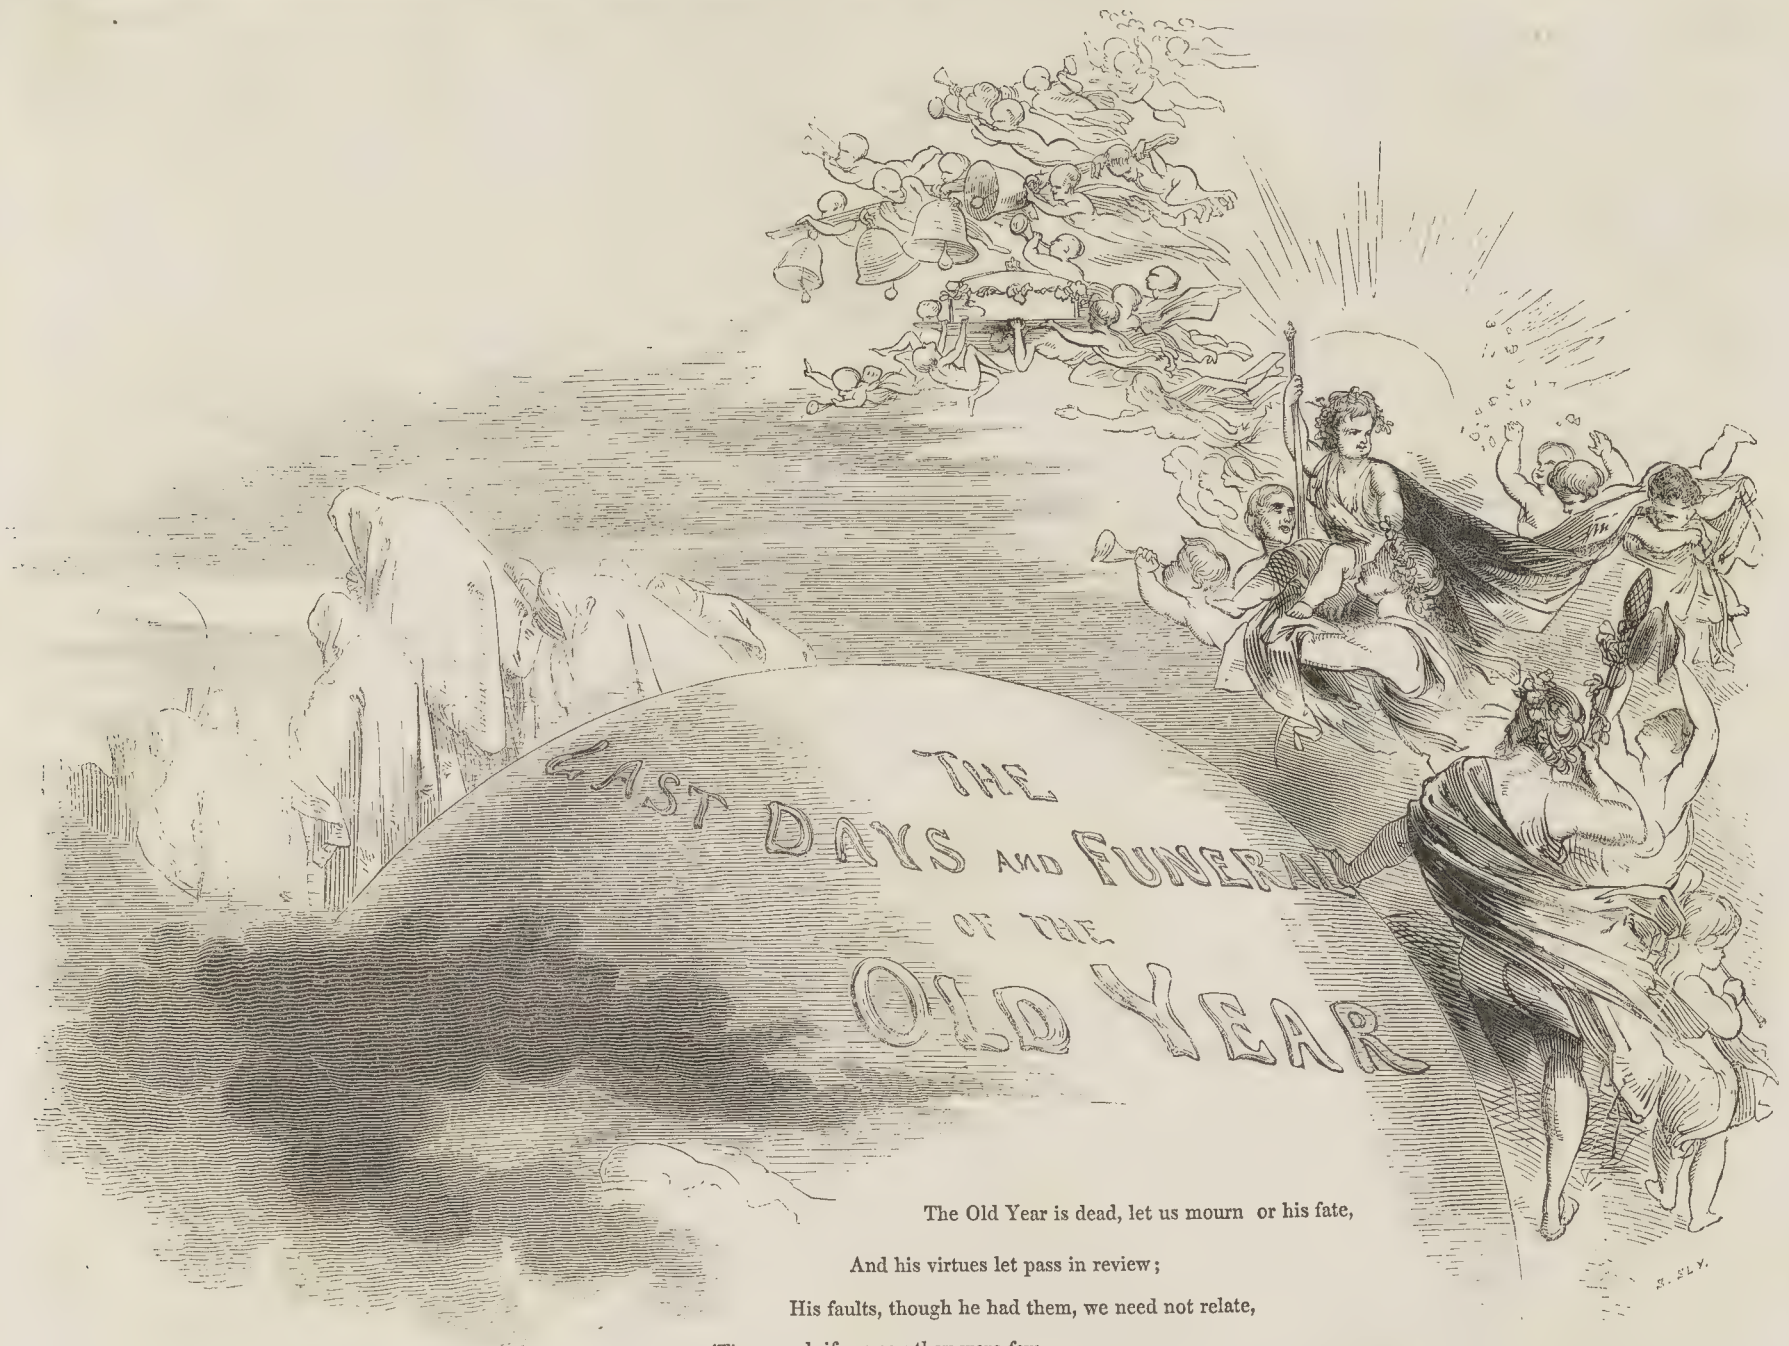
Beyond the coast the country gradually rises, till, at a distance of abou seventy miles, a vast plain of prairie land is reached, which constitutes the wealth and the hope of the infant state. The plain varies from 140 to 150 miles in width, and from 170 to 180 miles in length. It is covered with magnificent clumps and forests of timber, and its valleys are watered with plentiful streams. It is supposed that the whole of this tract might be cultivated and changed into an immense field, producing cotton, sugar, Indian corn, tobacco, wheat, and every kind of plants and fruit trees which grow in the temperate zone and on the borders of the tropics, whilst the lower prairies would, in their natural state, serve as pasture ground for cattle.

The entire area of Texas comprises nearly five hundred thousand square miles, and the capacity of so immense a district for agricultural purposes is, without doubt, owing to the numerous rivers which intersect it, and the regular course which they observe in their progress to the sea. The principal rivers are the Sabine and the Neches on the east, both flowing into the Sabine lake; the Brazos, 400 miles in length, falling into the Gulf, and the Trinity, flowing into Galveston Bay; the Colorado, connecting the Bay of Matagorda with the mountain districts of San Saba; the smaller streams of Guadaloupe, and St. Antonio, giving access to the central provinces, and the Rio Grande del Norte, running from the Rocky Mountains to the Gulf, forming, in many parts, a noble unencumbered stream, and serving as a grand western boundary to the country.

The port of Texas is the "city" of Galveston, built on a small island on the coast. It contains at the present time about four hundred wooden houses, five churches, a custom-house, several docks, a pier, a theatre, and a public garden. The site is unhealthy, but, notwithstanding its disadvantages, the port is increasing in importance, and will, no doubt, become in time one of considerable wealth and influence.

REVIEW OF TEXAN TROOPS.

The Texan capital, named Houston, after their celebrated President, is advantageously situated near the borders of the prairie country, on a branch of the Bayon Brazos. Like Galveston, it is built of wood, but on more durable plans. It numbers about three thousand inhabitants, and is altogether a thriving and—allowances being made—a beautiful city.



Our engravings show two views of these interesting places, and a vignette of one of those half military and half plebeian reviews, which the patriotic militia of the republic are at present in the habit of exhibiting to their courageous fellow-countrymen.

PORT OF GALVASTON.

CITY OF HOUSTON—THE CAPITAL OF TEXAS.

The Old Year is dead, let us mourn or his fate,
And his virtues let pass in review;
His faults, though he had them, we need not relate,
'Tis enough if we say they were few.

In Youth he had been rather rakish and wild,
In Summer he strove to get wealthy,
In the Autumn of life he was prudent and mild,
But then he no longer was healthy.

The fogs of November affected him much,
It was plain that he grew weaker daily;
But he told all his friends that his spirits were such
He should finish his days with them gaily.

When December came in, he had a bad cough,
His acquaintance began to presage
Their fears, that his asthma would soon take him off,
And begged he'd remember his age.

St. Luke was called in as the family doctor,
And advised him to look to his diet;
And sending St. Mark, his ancestor's Proctor,
Left orders to keep him quite quiet.

In a doubtful condition full three weeks he lay,
It was thought that he yet might recover;
When feasting too freely on last Christmas Day,
The fever ensued when 'twas over.

No hope now remained, all the night he grew worse,
St. Stephen was sent on the morrow;
St. John also came, but we need not rehearse
Their advice, but it filled him with sorrow.

The sweet little Innocents gathered around
His bed, when they heard he was dying;
He bade them farewell as he gazed on them round,
And they went away sobbing and crying.

Three days now he languished; at last
He seemed of this world to be tired;
And sinking on Sylvester's* bosom, he cast
A last look on his friends and expired.

ORDERS FOR THE FUNERAL.

A splendid Funeral he shall have,
Said young Lord New-Year's-Day;
My Father to his silent grave
Shall all the Days convey.

Let all in decent mourning come;
He was a worthy Year,
And now he's gone unto his home,
His virtues we'll revere.

We'll lay him in Old Time's vault,
Where all his fathers lie,
And there entomb each little fault,
And praise his memory.

THE PROCESSION.

All preparations being duly made,
The funeral procession thus began:—
The Week Days all the dead march solemn played,
While Sunday walked as leader in the van.

Then on each side the road the Weeks were placed,
And every fourth† a kindled flambeau bore,
Casting a gloomy light as on they paced,
And each a cloak of funeral sable wore.

Next came the Months, each in his order due,
Drest as the painters did depict of yore,
Save that upon their left arms you might view
That each a fold of crape, as mourning, wore.

As on they went, Old Christmas Day bestrewed
The way with ivy, cypress, and with laurel;
Holly he did not use, his care which showed,
Lest with the mourners it should chance to quarrel.

Then came the Seasons in their proper line,
The Solar Months as pages held their trains;
Each wearing on his breast the brilliant sign,
Richly emblazoned, over which he reigns.

Buoyant and blithe of heart came youthful Spring,
And scarce a mourner seemed so gay as he,
As if unconscious, ever on the wing,
That season like to years must mortal be.

Summer, whose charms were somewhat hid in black,
Seemed like a lovely widow in her weeds,
Who smiles on all around, still keeping back
The grief with which her broken heart yet bleeds.

Pale, trembling Autumn, held her head depressed,
And strove to hide her sorrows, but, alas!
So thin the veil in which herself she drest,
All could perceive her grief as on she past.

Winter—old cheerless Winter—thickly clad
In furs of sable, shivered as he went,
And seemed too cold and childish to be sad,
As if he cared but little for the event.

Then came the Body on a splendid car,
Drawn by the Hours, who slowly moved along,
All Saints were gathered round it from afar
To guard it from the pressure of the throng.

Behind, as the chief mourner, who appeared
To weep whole showers of tears, St. Swithin came,
On either hand a Saint, who often cheered
His spirits up, but both unknown to fame.

All Souls brought up the weary lengthened rear,
They as spectators went the sight to see,
And many shed an unobserved tear
To the departed Year's good memory.

THE FUNERAL.

Old Time struck one upon his solemn bell,
Just as the long procession reached the gate;
Vespers and matins, in harmonious swell,
Joined in a requiem, and bewailed his fate.

Soon as the coffin on the bier was placed,
Old Bishop Blaize the funeral service read;
And St. Cecilia, who the scene now graced,
Chanted the anthem for the pious dead.

St. George, with voice distinct, then read his style
All the attendants standing round the while.

Here to the tomb of the Years of yore,
With deep regret now bear,
The noble, venerable Year,
One thousand eight hundred and forty-four.
Son of the most renowned and dear,
By Heaven's decree,
One thousand eight hundred and forty-three;
And the grandson, ever true,
Of eighteen hundred and forty-two.

Slow from the grave the mourners turned away,
And bright Aurora ushered in the day.
A record was made, the world to amuse,
And quickly dispatched to the ILLUSTRATED NEWS.

* Sylvester was Pope in the fourth century, and was canonised by the Romish Church. He died on the 31st December, 335—the day set apart for his remembrance.

† "Every fourth a kindled flambeau bore." This is intended to pourtray the Lunar Months, which are from one new Moon to another, and of which there are thirteen in a year; a Lunar Month is a little more than twenty-eight days.

NEW MUSIC.

Cathedral Chants of the XVI., XVII. and XVIII. centuries. Edited by EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, L.L.D., F.S.A. D'Almaine & Co., Soho Square.

One of the most delightful offices of the divine art of music is that of assisting in religious worship, and cold and heartless in their devotion must they be, who, like spiritual Platonists, exclude it from their Conventicles. In the sublimest, as well as most barbarous ages of antiquity, music gave the wings upon which a people's prayers were wafted to Heaven, and it only remained for modern fanaticism or inverted idolatry) to repudiate her soothing and holy influence.

> Music! oh! how faint, how weak—
> Language fades before thy spell,

exclaims a modern and inspired poet—but we will not go so far—we shall content ourselves by considering music as the handmaid of poetry, and has been so from time immemorial. Now poetry of the highest order was employed in the praises of the Deity, and we always find music accompanying it. The Chants of the Hebrews, judging from their remains, must have been sublime things—the Greek Hymns, also, as appear from the fragments to Nemesis, &c. Before the establishment of Christianity, it may be said that the Romans had no music, sacred or profane. In the time of the Pontiff Gregory, some snatches of Greek music were applied to the Canticles of the Church; but not till the Reformation, here and in Germany, did sacred music assume its true dignity in its chants and chorales.

The work before us professes to be a careful collection of the best single and double chants, which are to be found in our church service; but, was it through ignorance or illiberality that the editor omitted those of STEVENSON (some of which are the most beautiful ever composed, uniting graceful melody with old quaint harmony), Smith, Matthews, Warren, Weyman, &c., which can hold their heads with the highest? The Cathedral choirs of Dublin, in the writer's memory, were the first in the world, under the direction of that little known, but yet great man (to come out some day), Sir John Stevenson, the Compar in Cursu, of Moore, from his earliest days (look at the immortal melodies &c), and the author of some of the sweetest airs and richest glees that ever were listened to by ears delighted.

The present volume is full of interest to those who take delight in our choral harmony. There is a pleasant little prefix by the editor, on the nature and proper mode of chanting, and his Biographical Notices of the most celebrated chant composers, are highly interesting and instructive. The volume is most splendidly got up, and deserves a place in even every church throughout the kingdom.

THE MUSICAL TREASURY, vocal and instructive, consisting of popular standard and original Songs, Duets, Glees, Catches, &c: Favourite Overtures, Waltzes, Polkas, Quadrilles, Galopades, &c. Davidson, Water-street, New Bridge-street.

No one in possession of this volume can say that he has not got a musical library; a better assortment could not possibly have been made. The various pieces are most agreably intermixed, forming a very delightful variety, and there is hardly a taste "from grave to gay, from lively to severe" but can find something to suit its humour. This volume is tastefully got up, and will prove to be a useful and ornamental appendage to any music desk.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1845.

THE American President's Message has been received this week; grandis et verbosa epistola venit, may be said of these documents whenever their arrival is announced; they are long and wordy, but seldom distinct or clear, as if the writers were anxious to secure bulk and avoid intelligibility. Some parts of Mr. Tyler's message are absolutely incomprehensible; there is a meaning we suppose, and we may, as Sir Thomas Browne says, "hazard a wide solution" of it, but it is guess only—a thing that should not be necessary in a state paper, especially one emanating from the Government of so acute and practical a people. For the rest, its facts are better than its style. It speaks of a sound state of the finances, of general quiet and order, even in the excitement of the late election, of external peace,—of all, in fact, that can tend to make a nation prosperous. And that these advantages are being shared by those so closely connected with us, we do unfeignedly rejoice. But there are omissions: while dwelling on the flourishing state of the revenue, could not a word of reproof be found for the "repudiators" of Pennsylvania? We hear a good deal of the claims of America on other powers; complaints are made of the neglect or refusal of New Grenada and Chili to discharge some old debts to the Union, and, says Mr. Tyler, "it is to be hoped that a sense of justice will soon induce a settlement of these claims." The very words that are breathed from this side of the Atlantic to the Federation that at this moment has a surplus revenue of seven millions of dollars, and yet refuses to be honest; not her poverty, but her will consenting to a public fraud. So loudly can we insist on just dealing in others, and so completely can we violate it ourselves! It is, however, an old subject, and a sore one; and we quit it for another topic, which seems growing in importance.

The Message enters at great length into the policy of the annexation of Texas to the States. Mr. Tyler is strongly in favour of it; there is a large party in America who advocate it; indeed, it may be doubted, if public opinion could be tested on the question, whether a clear majority of the people would not declare for it. It is a proposal well calculated to find favour in the popular mind; but it is very uncertain whether such advantages would result from it to the States as seem to be anticipated. It is not an increase of territory that America wants; her population will not, for ages to come, be sufficient to occupy and cultivate her immense tracts of land, though their number is yearly swelled by emigration from Europe. What the United States require is people, not prairies. Texas is lost to Mexico, that is certain; eight years of war, conducted with a cruelty and atrocity that have been a disgrace to human nature, have not recovered it, and it is now, by the acknowledgment of other powers, an independent state. If its people prefer a connection with the States to a national independence, and if the Americans are anxious to receive them into the Federation, it would be difficult to point out what can prevent the junction. Mexico considers her northern neighbours quite close enough already, and, as she cannot exercise any influence over the new Republic, would prefer keeping it as an independent power between her and the Federation, which she fears would be encouraged by the accession of Texas to push its acquisitions still farther south. It would be well if the Americans would consider whether any ultimate benefit would accrue to them from this annexation. The slave-holding states would by it acquire an enormous increase of influence; the divisions between them and the northern provinces have already caused serious apprehensions; even at present a convulsion might destroy the integrity of the Republic; and is there no danger, if the power of the slave-holding interest were increased, that they would resent the interference of the abolitionists, refuse to be governed by any but their own legislatures, and set up an independent power of their own? To preserve peace in Central America, it has been suggested that in case the annexation is persisted in, the European Governments should jointly protest against it, and refuse to permit it to take place.

ONE interesting event, though accompanied by no pomp or state, distinguished the first day of the New Year. The Royal Exchange was really opened for the transaction of business, and the busy hum of men again rose over the site devoted by Gresham to the convenience of the merchants of London.

THE dispute about the power of a writ of habeas corpus in the Island of Jersey, seems to be approaching a settlement. Mr. Baron Rolfe has issued a writ, which will, no doubt, be enforced. The monstrous anomaly of a petty dependance of England resisting one of the most wholesome provisions of the English law cannot be tolerated, or there can be no protection either for residents or natives against the caprice of the authorities, their ignorance of what is law, or, still worse, their acting on what they believe to be so. But this is by no means all that is involved in the question; the authority of the Crown is disputed, and it must be declared, in a formal manner, whether the sovereignty of her Majesty is really acknowledged in this part or fraction of her possessions or not. The necessity of a clear understanding on this point is apparent, not only from the immediate case in question, but from what has before taken place, of which one of the Jersey papers gives the following specimen:—

One Captain R., an Englishman, lately visited Jersey from Caen, owing nothing to any man in England or in Jersey. An alien—a Frenchman—seeing him here, ordered the Deputy-Viscount of Jersey to arrest Captain R., which the Deputy-Viscount did, with a constable's staff, having a crown at the end of it; and he did this, mark ye, "in the Queen's name," as if the captain were a criminal, and without a warrant—without an affidavit of debt—without any security from the alien Frenchman that he would appear and prosecute his suit. And in the Queen's name this Deputy-Viscount lodged his prisoner in the Jersey debtors' prison. In the Queen's name! We apprehend that without warrant the Queen's name might have been invoked with a poniard equally lawfully by the defendant.

THE Overland Mail from India, brings no news of importance; casualties and occurrences of Indian interest preponderate over political events. The Governor-General is quietly initiating himself into the administrative duties of his office, and does not cause that uneasy sort of excitement that has followed the movements of what are called more brilliant rulers.

The most remarkable circumstance among the foreign intelligence of the week, is the account of the unexpected difficulties into which the French Ministry appears to have fallen. One of the ablest members of it—M. Villemain, the Minister of Public Instruction—is, to the regret of men of all parties, afflicted with mental alienation, which obliges him to abstain from the labours of office for a short time; temporary repose it is hoped will restore him. This of itself would be embarrasing, but another unfortunate circumstance is the arrival in Paris of Admiral Dupetit Thouars, as it revives the memory of many unfortunate and disagreable questions. And in addition, in the election of a fourth Vice President of the Chamber of Deputies, the Government candidate, M. Debelleyme, only had a majority of four votes over M. Billault, who is well known as the "mouthpicee of all the animosity which exists at Paris between the French and English." Still it is a majority, and a recollection of past Administrations of our own will tell on what narrow majorities a Government can sometimes exist. On the whole, too, M. Guizot has succeeded very well in these opening contests of the Session, which nearly determine the strength of parties for the rest of the year. The President and four Vice Presidents of the Chamber, and fourteen out of eighteen of the Presidents and Secretaries of Bureaux, are members of the Conservative party.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

Last Saturday afternoon the Queen and Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace, at a quarter-past one o'clock, in a carriage and four, escorted by a party of Lancers, on their return to Windsor Castle.

WINDSOR, SUNDAY.—This morning the Queen and Prince Albert walked in the pleasure grounds. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Court, and the domestic household attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked for some time this forenoon, previous to his Royal Highness going to shoot in the Royal preserves, attended by Lord Charles Wellesley, Mr. Anson, and Sir Edward Bowater. The Royal party returned early in the afternoon to the Castle.

TUESDAY.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen and Prince Albert at the Castle this morning. His Excellency the French Ambassador and the Countess St. Aulaire arrived at the Castle to-day, on a visit to her Majesty. The Countess of Gainsborough also arrived at the Castle. The Earl of Warwick has arrived, and has succeeded Viscount Hawarden, as the Lord in Waiting on the Queen; and Major-General Sir Frederick Stovin has succeeded Admiral Sir Robert Otway, as the Groom in Waiting on her Majesty.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert promenaded in the pleasure-grounds adjacent to the Castle this morning. On the return of her Majesty and her Illustrious Consort, his Royal Highness went shooting in the Royal preserves, attended by Lord Charles Wellesley, Mr. Anson, and Col. Bouverie. The Royal party returned to the Castle early.

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert walked across the Home Park this morning, and, after visiting the Apiary and Dairy, returned to the Castle. His Royal Highness Prince Albert hunted this morning with his excellent pack of harriers, in the vicinity of Slough, and had two capital runs. Her Majesty and several of the royal suite proceeded to Salt Hill to witness the sport. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent will have the honour of joining the royal dinner party this evening.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO STOWE.—We believe it is now settled that her Majesty and Prince Albert will visit the Duke of Buckingham, at Stowe, on Wednesday, the 15th inst. The town of Buckingham is making busy preparations to display its loyalty upon the occasion. An illumination is determined upon. A county meeting is to be called at Aylesbury for the purpose of getting up an address to the Queen, a requisition to that effect having been already signed. The Bucks Hussars, which his Grace the Duke of Buckingham commands, a corps of 400 "yeomen bold," will act as a guard of honour, taking up their quarters at Buckingham, and in readiness to escort her Majesty to Stowe, where his Grace's tenantry will be assembled, together with 600 picked men from his different estates, clad in white frocks, and drawn out with white wands in their hands. Should her Majesty arrive after daylight, each man will bear a lighted flambeau. These, with the several society bands of the neighbourhood, will be arranged in the park. The north front of the mansion will be illuminated as well as the south. A procession of the corporation of the town will precede the Royal carriages, headed by the different benefit societies and their bands of music, and every possible demonstration of a public welcome will be exhibited, as well as the hearty and noble reception which is sure to await the Royal visitors at Stowe. The event has already excited a great sensation in the neighbourhood of Stowe. Such a sensation would naturally have arisen under the ordinary circumstances of a Royal visit to a subject, but the known princely munificence of the Duke of Buckingham has increased it to an extent beyond precedent at so early a day in the work of preparation. The mansion of his Grace the Duke of Buckingham is particularly adapted to the reception of such an assemblage of guests as his usual practice on great public occasions is certain of collecting around him. Stowe will, it is true, not have the particular associations connected with the Royalty of a reigning Queen, as Burghley presented. Nor is the style of building at Stowe so well calculated, perhaps, as that of Burghley, to impress the mind with ancient recollections. But it is in every sense of the word a most princely residence, and from its vast extent—much more vast in its magnificent suite of receiving apartments than Burghley—is far better calculated than almost any other nobleman's mansion for such a gathering of guests as may be looked for should it be her Majesty's pleasure to have invitations issued for a ball. The infant Royal Family will remain at the Castle during the short absence of their illustrious parents, whose visit to Stowe will not be extended beyond the following Saturday. All the arrangements in progress for the reception of her Majesty and the Prince Consort are upon the most princely scale of grandeur and magnificence.

HER MAJESTY'S HEALTH.—There is a report, which we believe to be well founded, that her Majesty's health is such as to render an increase of the Royal Family probable in the course of the summer.

REPORTED VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO PARIS.—It is asserted that Queen Victoria and Prince Albert will visit Paris in the ensuing spring. Preparations are said to be making for the reception of these illustrious visitors at Fontainebleau and Versailles.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—The Queen Dowager is surrounded by a select party at Witley Court. Their Serene Highnesses Prince Ernest of Hesse Philipsthal and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar have arrived there to pass the Christmas holidays with their illustrious relative. As was the case last year, the poor of the neighbourhood have partaken of her Majesty's extended bounties, having been supplied with many comforts to render this festive period of the year one of enjoyment. Her Majesty's health continues satisfactory.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge gave directions that every poor person in the parish of Kew, Surrey, should be supplied with a good dinner on Christmas Day, when upwards of 800lb. of beef were divided amongst them, with 200 loaves, and a pint of beer to each person, and a sack of coals to each family. His Royal Highness also presented every child in the Queen's Free School, Kew, to the number of eighty, with a new suit of clothes, and all the poor persons belonging to that parish in the Richmond union workhouse, were on Christmas Day regaled with roast beef and plum pudding, at the illustrious duke's expense.

Viscount Melbourne, who is enjoying an excellent state of health, has arrived at Broadlands, near Romsey, Hants, on a visit to Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston. The noble viscount is expected to return to Brocket Hall, Herts, at the end of next week.

The Duke of Wellington has already sent out the invitations for the opening dinner of the session of Parliament, which it is expected will be very fully attended.

THE NEW AUSTRIAN AMBASSADOR.—His Excellency Count Maurice Dietrichstein, the newly-accredited Ambassador from Austria to the British Court, arrived at Chandos-house at a late hour on Tuesday night, accompanied by the Countess, from Brussels and Vienna. The noble count had previously been to this country in a diplomatic capacity, having been resident here some four or five years as first secretary under Prince Paul Esterhazy.

Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart., is dangerously indisposed at his seat in Norfolk.

CHRISTMAS FESTIVITIES.—The Marquis of Lansdowne has been entertaining a large party at Bowood this Christmas. Mr. Moore, the poet, has been among the visitors.

APPROACHING MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—We understand that a marriage is on the tapis between the Lady Louisa Fitzmaurice, only daughter of the Marquis of Lansdowne, and the Hon. James Howard, brother of Lord Andover.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD, Dec. 28.—Charles Rich and Charles J. Fuller have been admitted actual Students of Christ Church, having been elected from Westminster School in May last. The following gentlemen have also been admitted Canon Students:—John Edmund Coulson, Edward Reeve Hampden, Francis Trevelyan Buckland, John G. D. Engleheart, Frederick Pigot Johnson, and Henry T. Whateley. Edward Hadarezer Knowles, B.A., has been elected a Michel Fellow of Queen's College.

It is understood that the Rev. Frederick Anson, brother of Mr. George E. Anson, Prince Albert's private secretary, will be the new Canon of Windsor, in the place of the late Hon. and Rev. Mr. Stopford.

NEW FRENCH PROTESTANT CHURCH.—On Thursday last the Bishop of London laid the foundation stone of a new French church, intended to be erected in Bloomsbury-street (late Charlotte-street), Holborn, for the benefit of the French Protestants residing in that district. The Lord Bishop arrived at two o'clock, attended by his Chaplain and some clergymen. Several respectable individuals were present, the majority being English, and the children connected with the French schools in the neighbourhood, occupied places on the platform. The forms peculiar to such ceremonies having been gone through, the first stone was laid near the spot where the altar is hereafter intended to be placed. A very impressive address was read by the minister, the Rev. M. Mudoz, who is a native of France, and who, at the conclusion, thanked the Bishop for his services. The church will be a very small one; the intended dimensions being 68 feet 6 inches, by 38 feet 7 inches. A small gallery will be erected at the west end, and a vestry-room and school-rooms adjoining the building. Accommodation will be afforded for about 400. Mr. Poynder, of the Poets'-corner, Westminster, has been named as the architect, and the style will be that observed during the Elizabethan period; Mr. Byrne, of Theobald's-road, the builder.

THE HULSEAN PRIZE.—The prize (£100) has just been awarded to Frederick James Gruggen, B.A. of St. John's College, Cambridge. The subject was—"What is the relation in which the moral precepts of the New and the Old Testament stand to each other?" The subject for 1845, just announced, is as follows:—"The influence of the Christian religion in promoting the abolition of slavery in Europe."

Under the provisions made by the Ecclesiastical Commission, the Archdeaconry of Cornwall, vacant by the death of the venerable Archdeacon Sheepshanks, will be divided. The Lord Bishop of the diocese has appointed the Rev. W. Gee, Archdeacon of East Cornwall.

PREFERMENT.—The Rev. R. B. Paul, M.A., formerly Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, has been presented to the perpetual curacy of Kentish-town, St. Pancras, Middlesex. Value, £260. Patron, the Vicar of St. Pancras.

At a convocation just held in Cambridge University, the following grace passed the Senate:—The appointment of Mr. Sykes, of Pembroke College, an examiner of the candidates for mathematical honours, in the room of Mr. Stokes, who is incapacitated by illness.

The Rev. Thomas Worsley, M.A., Master of Downing College, has just been elected to the office of Christian Advocate; and the Rev. Richard Chenevix Trench, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, to be Lecturer, or Christian Preacher, on the foundation of the Rev. John Hulse.

THE SEATONIAN PRIZE AT CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.—The subject just announced is—"The loosing of the four Euphratean angels," Rev. ix., 14, 15.

JESUS COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.—The Rev. Robert Parker Bowness, M.A., has just been elected from a lay to a foundation fellowship of this society.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CABINET COUNCIL.—The first Cabinet Council previous to the meeting of Parliament is appointed for Thursday, the 9th inst. Sir. R. Peel is expected to come to town from Drayton Manor on the 7th.

OPENING OF THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE FOR BUSINESS.—This splendid edifice was opened for business on New Year's Day, as had been arranged. The attendance of merchants, though the day was not a post day, was very considerable. In consequence of the intended occupation all the avenues were completely opened. The only arrangement which had any novelty about it was that by which the advertisements and announcements of the sailing of ships, which used to be affixed generally to the walls of the old Exchange, are now pasted upon neat boards, hung up in the recesses of the merchants' area. These boards are all of one size and character, and seem calculated to prevent the disfigurement which the old system involved. The temporary exchange in the court yard of the Excise-office will soon be dismantled of its roof and other fittings, and the materials are to be sold. The proceeds will be devoted to the principal city charities. Some of the merchants complained of draughts of cold air, an evil which it is intended to remedy, by the introduction of inner doors, should the inconvenience be found to be important. By way of commemorating the honour conferred on the mercantile community of the city of London by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, in laying the first stone of the New Royal Exchange, and in testimony of their loyalty and devoted attachment to her Majesty and her illustrious consort, the merchants, bankers, shipowners, underwriters, and others interested in the commerce of the city of London, propose (if the Royal permission be obtained) to erect by subscription a full-length statue in marble of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, to be placed in the vestibule of Lloyd's, or in such other situation in the Royal Exchange as may, with the approbation of the Gresham Committee, be hereafter determined upon. A committee of some of the most influential merchants of the City is in course of formation to carry out the object.

THE FINE ARTS' INSTITUTE.—On Saturday evening the first meeting of the second session of the Institute of the Fine Arts took place in the theatre of the Royal Society of Arts, Adelphi. The chairman, Mr. Hurlstone, expatiated upon the benefit likely to arise from the Institute, one object of which was to combine all branches of the fine arts. Mr. Fahey, the secretary, read the address of the council, which stated that the exertions of the Institute had been very successful, and explained the operations which were in progress to render it more so. Mr. Foggo eulogised the conduct of the council of the Institute in the course they had pursued with respect to Art-Unions, and concluded by moving a resolution, "That the meeting was anxious to express its decided approbation of the liberal and prompt manner in which the council called the artists of the metropolis to watch over the interests of the arts, by supporting the Art-Unions during the momentary suppression of those establishments." The resolution was adopted.

LONDON AND CROYDON RAILWAY.—On Thursday a special general meeting of the proprietors of the London and Croydon Railway Company was held at the Railway-station, London-bridge, for the purpose of agreeing to the formation of several new lines into the County of Kent, and the general extension of the line. The meeting was fully attended, and William Arthur Wilkinson, Esq., the chairman, in opening the meeting, stated that the course they intended to adopt was forced on them by the intrusion of the Dover Company into their line of country. The meeting decided on enlarging the Croydon, Greenwich, and Bricklayers' Arms Railways, so as to admit of one or more additional lines of rails being laid down on the atmospheric principle: the extension of the Epsom line to Dorking, a new line from the Croydon Railway by Orpington and Chatham, to Chilham; with branches to Gravesend, Sheerness, and Faversham Creek; and another new line from the Croydon line, by Maidstone, to Ashford, with a branch to Tonbridge. Application was agreed to be made to Parliament for bills to carry out these plans, and 102,000 shares of £20 each were agreed to be raised to carry out the works. In answer to a question from a proprietor, Mr. Cubitt, the engineer, said the new atmospheric line of rails on the Croydon line to Epsom, would be open in a short time, in all probability in time for Parliament to judge before they decided on some of the great lines. Thanks to the chairman and directors were carried, and every resolution was agreed to unanimously.

DARKNESS ON THE METROPOLIS ROADS.—The total darkness which has so long prevailed along the great western road, particularly between Kensington and town, since the refusal of the Commissioners of the Metropolis Roads longer to be at the expense of lighting them, is now at an end, the inhabitants of the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster (in which parish that portion of the road is situate) having at length undertaken to light it. For that purpose forty-one lamps were last week placed on the lamp-posts still existing along the road, and were on the night of Christmas day lighted for the first time. Through Kensington the road is also lighted by the inhabitants as far as Hammersmith turnpike, and at a meeting of the inhabitants of Hammersmith, recently held, resolutions to light were adopted.

METROPOLITAN MORTALITY.—We regret to observe that the deaths within the "bills" last week were 1249—the average for the past year having been 946. A few weeks ago the number was fluctuating between 900 and 960. The increase of mortality from infectious diseases continues to be observed, as compared with the averages of past years, but it has not advanced, and, indeed, appears less than it has been recently. The deaths from diseases of the lungs were last week 415, upwards of 100 more than the five years' average, or than the number some month or so back.

THE NEW METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS ACT.—On Wednesday this important act, some of the provisions of which have been noticed in this journal, came into operation. The act extends, on the north side of the Thames, from Fulham to Shadwell, and on the south side of the river from Woolwich to Wandsworth, including the other suburban districts. The legislature, by the 4th section, anticipates that building speculations would be carried on beyond the limits of the statute in order to evade the law, and therefore gave power to her Majesty in Council to extend the operation of the same to any parts within 12 miles of Charing-cross.

THE ROBBERY AT ROGERS AND CO.—It having appeared in a Frankfort journal that a £5 note, one of those stolen, had been stopped at Hamburg, Mr. Hobler at once despatched Mr. Justins to that city. The man who had changed it was stated to be a simple navigator, working under Mr. Munday, a builder, of Abchurch-lane, City, who is at present making a complete sewerage, at a cost of £80,000, through Hamburg, and employs on the works 500 Englishmen. The person who passed it on him was said to be a Jew, named Goldsmid. The house of the supposed receiver was then said to have been searched by Mr. Munday, and notes to the amount of £4000 found there. Mr. Justins, on arriving, at once inquired for the navigator, and he was informed that Mr. Munday, for security, had placed him in one of the sewers constructing. Upon these representations Mr. Justins felt himself authorised to apply for the assistance of M. Meveins, one of the magistrates, and both the assumed sewer and Mr. Munday were visited by Mr. Justins and M. Meveins. He was then told that the whole tale was a fabrication in the journal, and how it originated was not known. Mr. Justins finding that none of the notes had been circulated in Germany, left in company with Mr. Munday on sledges, the Elbe being frozen; and as they were the talk of the whole town, a rumour was spread that Mr. Justins's companion was the robber of the notes, whom he was conveying to England. It is now, however, clear that none of the notes are in circulation on the continent.

THE LATE CALAMITOUS FIRE IN GUILDFORD-STREET.—On Monday morning Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the Angel Inn, High-street, St. Giles's, on view of the bodies of Robert Birkmyre, John Wright, Charles Jenkins, and William Robinson, all of whom lost their lives at the late calamitous fire in Guildford-street, Russell-square. Mr. Farey and several other witnesses were examined; but their testimony added very little to the facts already mentioned by us. Nothing was elicited which positively proved the origin of the fire. A long investigation took place on the subject of the conduct of the policemen on duty, who were said to have been drunk at the time of the fire, the result of which proved the insinuation to be entirely groundless. The Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death." Connected with this sad accident we regret to have to mention, that Mr. Mayow, the Solicitor of Excise, was found dead in his bed on Saturday morning. Mr. Mayow lived in a house opposite to that of Mr. Farey, and his nerves were so much shaken by the calamity that it was found necessary to call in the professional aid of Dr. Latham, the physician. Mr. Mayow, however, never rallied, and his lady on going to his room (the footboy having failed to arouse his master) found him a corpse. At the inquest upon the body of Mr. Mayow the evidence confirmed the above statement, and the jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."

A DRUGGIST COMMITTED FOR MANSLAUGHTER.—On Tuesday, Mr. Wakley held an inquest at the King's Arms, Rawstorne-street, Clerkenwell, on the body of William Watts, a cab-driver. The evidence went to prove that on the 7th ult. the deceased went into the shop of Mr. Watkins, druggist, Myddelton-street, and asked for two ounces of Epsom salts, but by mistake Mr. Watkins, jun., gave him tartaric acid, from the effects of which he died some days afterwards. The jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against Charles Watkins, jun., and he was conveyed to gaol. The jury afterwards raised a subscription on behalf of the widow of the deceased.

Accounts from Athens to the 20th ult., state that the Chamber is still busy with the verification of the powers of the deputies, and to admit deputies favourable to the present Ministry they have committed illegalities without number. Coletti has got by these means an immense majority.

FATAL ACCIDENT IN JERMYN-STREET.—On Monday morning a high scaffold, erected against the premises of Mr. Slater, butcher, in Jermyn-street, St. James's, suddenly fell down, and the most lamentable consequences ensued to several labourers. One was taken out quite dead, and two were crushed by the weight of the falling timber. Another was removed to the hospital in a very precarious state. The workmen had no suspicion that the scaffold was at all in a dangerous state, it being composed of strong upright poles, which are rendered secure by long cross pieces of timber firmly wedged to the brickwork and tied with thick cords. They were in the act of running the scaffold up some 10 or 12 feet higher, for the purpose of completing the ornamental coping on the parapet of the house, when they were alarmed by the boarding or flooring of the scaffold suddenly receding from the wall, and before they could warn their fellow-workmen the whole fell and occasioned the dreadful result. An inquest was held on Monday evening upon the man who was killed (William Powis) and the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

DEATH OF A GENTLEMAN OF FORTUNE FROM PRUSSIC ACID.—On Tuesday afternoon Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the Holly Bush Tavern, Hampstead, on the body of Frederick Clissold, Esq., aged 52, who died at that house on Saturday last, under very painful circumstances. The deceased belonged to one of the oldest and most opulent families in the county of Suffolk. Three brothers of the deceased, and several other relatives were present at the inquest, amongst whom were the Rev. Augustus Clissold, M.A., rector of Stoke Newington; the Rev. W. Clissold, rector of Wrenton, Suffolk; and the Rev. Arthur Clissold. The evidence proved that the deceased had for some time laboured under great mental depression, and had told one of his brothers that he had recently discovered a medicine which was better for him than any he had ever before used. That medicine was prussic acid, of which he took large quantities, but it was not believed that he did so for the purpose of destroying life. The deceased ordered dinner at the above tavern on the Friday afternoon, and went to bed, giving directions that he should not be called. The next afternoon he was found dead in his bed. The deceased was a man of very studious habits, and had for some years been engaged in a metaphysical work, which he expected to complete in about fifteen or sixteen years. The verdict was, "That the deceased died from taking an over-dose of prussic acid."

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Evening.

CONTINUED IMPROVEMENT IN THE REVENUE.

Our readers are aware that the Revenue returns are made up in January, on the 5th, but as that day this year falls on a Sunday, the accounts will be completed this evening. We are glad to learn, from an official source, that the revenue continues to improve, and that, as far as can be ascertained at present, the account for the quarter will show an increase, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, of upwards of £600,000.

The increase in the Customs, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, is expected to exceed £150,000.

The Excise, which is generally admitted to be a test of the increasing comforts of the people, is most satisfactory. The three quarters' revenue from the 6th of April last year (ending to-day) will exhibit an increase of upwards of £350,000, as compared with the three corresponding quarters of the previous year, ending 5th January, 1844; and it is expected that the increase on the financial year, ending on the 6th of April next, under the head of Excise, will be upwards of half a million sterling.

In the Post-office there will be an increase, calculated at about £5000 or £6000 in the quarter.

The Property Tax returns do not materially differ from the returns of the last two or three quarters. In Stamps, Taxes, and all miscellaneous articles of every description of revenue, there is a small increase.

Upon the whole, the position of the revenue exhibits a gradual improvement, a fact which will no doubt create great satisfaction throughout the country.

THE MONTHLY OVERLAND MAIL.

Since the arrival of the Intermediate India Mail, announced elsewhere, we have received letters and papers by the regular Monthly Overland Mail, which brings intelligence from various parts of India to a few days later. The dates are Bombay, December 2; Calcutta, November 23. The chief interest of the news is connected with the affairs of the Southern Mahratta country, which still continues much disturbed. The second of the two principal forts, for some time besieged, has fallen to our hands by surrender, but the country continues full of troops. Colonel Ovans, the newly appointed Resident, has fallen into the enemy's hands, and is kept by them a prisoner. An insurrection has broken out in the Sawunt Warree country; and in the two together an army of nearly 8000 men is occupied in quelling disturbance. Everything continues tranquil in Scinde. The health of the troops in the lower country is good. At Shikarpore and Sukkur sickness prevails to a very alarming extent. Her Majesty's 78th regiment, with the exception of about 100 men, is wholly in hospital; out of about 1000 Cavalry and Native Infantry at Shikarpore, between 700 and 800 are in hospital. The Punjaub chiefs have become reconciled to each other, and comparative tranquillity reigns in the country of the Five Rivers. There seem to be some slight discontents in Gwalior, but not such as to occasion alarm. Peace and prosperity prevail throughout India at large.

Some of the papers compliment Sir Henry Hardinge in very warm terms. He is said to have continued, since his arrival, constantly at Calcutta, and to have been gaining golden opinions of all sorts of people. His administration promises to be a plain, practical, and peaceful one. The state of education amongst the natives was the first thing to receive his attention, and seems to occupy a most prominent place in his mind. The encouragement of science, and the promotion of domestic improvement—the improvement of agriculture—the opening up of fresh roads, and the construction of bridges, have all received more or less attention. The most peace-loving suffer from no fears; the most war-loving entertain no hopes of conquest or invasion under the present rule. The plague was ravaging to the north of Cabul, and it had made some progress towards the Indus, and had threatened Peshawur.

From Madras we learn the execution of two Sepoys at Arcot, for having administered unlawful oaths to their comrades of the 6th Light Cavalry; eleven others were transported, and a number of the native officers and Sepoys dismissed from the service.

In a postscript to one of the papers we find that intelligence had reached Bombay of the investment of the Fort of Pownaghur by the field force under General Delamotte, and another body of troops, from Kolapore. They had arrived there on the 25th of November, and had waited for the heavy guns. On the 27th the force proceeded to attack a pettah near Pownaghur, which is a smaller fort, within gunshot of Punalla. The enemy kept up a brisk firing. Lieutenant-Colonel Hickes, of the Bombay Grenadiers, was killed; the other casualties were few.

The news from China is purely commercial. Trade was going on rather favourably at the new ports; but the rabble of Canton were preparing some new uproar.

So extensive has adulteration been practised at Bombay, that Malway opium is quoted at 50 dollars to 750 dollars, and is getting rapidly out of repute, so that the swindlers have their reward in a ruined market.

DEATH OF MAJOR-GENERAL SIR WILLIAM NOTT, G.C.B.

Carmarthen, Jan. 1.

It is our melancholy duty to announce that General Sir William Nott G.C.B., died this day (January the 1st), at about a quarter before two, A.M. For some time past it has been deemed almost impossible that the General could recover, and, in fact, he had been lying in a state of insensibility for the previous two or three days. The nature of his disease—an enlargement of the heart—precluded all possibility of his existing for any lengthened period, although it was hoped that his native air would reinvigorate him, and enable him to live for some years. The severity of the weather, however, joined to the state of weakness to which he had been reduced by the forced journeys he was compelled to take in order to reach Wales, and the excitement consequent upon the triumphal reception he met with at each town on his route, all contributed to weaken a constitution naturally strong, but which had been exposed to the numerous vicissitudes of an Indian climate. The late General Nott was born in the year 1780, at Neath, Glamorganshire, and was consequently in the 65th year of his age.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—We learn from a good source that the projected visit of her Majesty and Prince Albert to the Duke of Wellington at Strathfieldsaye is now fixed for Monday the 20th instant. Her Majesty is likely to remain the guest of the illustrious Duke three days.

GRAND BALL AT HATFIELD HOUSE.—Last night a magnificent ball was given by the Marquis of Salisbury, at his lordship's Elizabethan seat, in Herts, to the leading families of rank in that county.

The Rev. Lord Augustus Fitzclarence was on Thursday married, at Kensington church, to the Hon. Miss Gordon, daughter of Lord Gordon.

IMPROVED COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA.—The Admiralty have forwarded a letter to the East India and China Association, intimating a fact which we are sure will be received with gratification by all connected with our eastern commerce—viz., that arrangements have been made for the conveyance of the mails between Suez and Calcutta and China.

The Poor-law Commissioners have at length consented to the separation of the parish of Kensington from the Kensington Union. Kensington and Paddington are each to have separate Boards of Guardians, and Hammersmith and Fulham are to remain united as at present.

DEATH OF A GENTLEMAN 100 YEARS OLD.—On Thursday Mr. G. J. Mills held an inquest at the Colosseum Tavern, Portland-road, on the body of Mr. William Bennett, for many years the principal clerk to Messrs. Cox and Greenwood, army agents. The deceased, who was in his 100th year, had for the last fourteen years been totally deaf and blind, but otherwise enjoyed excellent health. He had a great aversion to doctors. On Monday last he complained of being poorly, but refused any advice. On the following morning, when his daughter went into his apartment, she discovered that her venerable parent had ceased to exist. A neighbouring surgeon was, however, called in, who pronounced life to have been extinct several hours. Verdict, "Natural death."

THE LATE RAILWAY COLLISION NEAR NOTTINGHAM.—At a meeting of the directors of the Midland Railway, on Tuesday, it was agreed to allow to the widows of the late Mr. John Dean and Mr. James Bolestridge £300 each, and also to allow to the mother of Mr. Dean the sum of 5s. a week for her life. It is the same sum which Mr. Dean allowed to his mother, who is now about 70 years of age.

DESTRUCTION OF DOLGYN-HALL BY FIRE.—Letters have been received, announcing the complete destruction of Dolgyn-hall, the seat of Sir L. H. Lewis, situate near the town of Dolgelly, in Wales.

DANGER OF USING ARSENIC IN THE MANUFACTURE OF CANDLES.—A workman lately in the employ of Messrs. Le Paige and Co., composite candle manufacturers, in the Borough, on Christmas Day imbibed some arsenic into his system. The consequence was that his hand became swollen, and on the Monday he died. The deceased had told his landlord that his hands were contracted by the arsenic, and he attributed his ailments to standing over the steam of the ingredients used in making the candles, which, he said, affected his breath. At the inquest a surgeon said there was no doubt the death of the man was caused from the influence of the poison. M. Le Paige stated that nine ounces of arsenic were generally mixed with the melted stuff in other manufactories, but in his only two ounces, as he was desirous to do away with arsenic as much as possible. The arsenic made the candles have more the appearance of wax. The verdict returned was, "That deceased died from the mortal effects of his exposure to the poison of arsenic, while at work in a candle manufactory."

A CHILD FOUND MURDERED IN THE REGENT'S PARK.—Yesterday (Friday) afternoon a jury was empanelled before Mr. Wakley, M.P., at the Elephant and Castle, King's-road, Camden-town, on the body of a newly-born female child, found murdered in the Regent's-park. The child was wrapped in a coarse calico cloth, and had on a bedgown. It was lying on its face, and its nose was flattened. The coroner said the florid appearance of the child indicated suffocation. The jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against some person or persons unknown.

THE SUPPOSED MURDER AT SALT-HILL.—Another investigation took place before the coroner late last night into the circumstances attending the death of Mrs. Hart, at Salt-hill, of which some particulars are given in page 11. The medical testimony as to the cause of death was of importance. Mr. Henry Champneys who made a post-mortem examination of the body, gave his decided opinion that prussic acid had been administered, which had caused death. A bottle containing liquid was found upon the table of the deceased, but Mr. Champneys said he had not time to analyse it. Another medical man, named Norbled, corroborated the testimony of Mr. Champneys, and also expressed his belief that the deceased died from prussic acid, or some one of the salts into the composition of which prussic acid enters.—Catherine White said: I am barmaid at Mr. Botham's Hotel. I knew the deceased, who came to my master's house on Wednesday evening, at half-past six, and asked for a bottle of Guiness's stout; my master gave her the stout, and she remained about ten minutes. (Mr. Champneys produced the bottle found on the deceased's table.) I believe the bottle produced to be the same as she had the stout in. She asked me to lend her a corkscrew to draw the cork, and I did so. She did not appear to be ill or agitated. The corkscrew produced I believe to be the one I lent the deceased. The inquest was adjourned till Wednesday, in order that the contents of the bottle found in the deceased's room might be analysed, and Mr. John Tawell was removed back to Eton in the custody of Superintendent Perkins.

ANOTHER ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE DUKE OF NORMANDY.—The self-styled Duke of Normandy, who now occupies Mulgrave-house, Fulham, where he has been for some time carrying out his inventions of explosive materials to be employed in warfare, was again shot at on Thursday evening by some unknown assassin. His life has been twice previously attempted; once before he left France, and again on the 10th of November, 1838, in the garden of the house he then occupied on Camberwell-green. On that occasion two pistols were stated to have been discharged at him, and three balls entered his person. The third alleged attempt at assassination was made on Thursday night whilst the "Duke" was engaged in his workshop. The following is his own account of the strange affair:—"I was standing at the lathe polishing a piece of the lower part of some machinery, which has been ordered by a friendly party (at which I have been working night and day, sometimes by myself, and occasionally attended by one of my officers), when I heard my dog, which was fastened to the kennel outside the shop, barking furiously. I went out and released him, when he bounded down the garden, barking all the while. I returned to the lathe, and had not been at it five minutes when I heard an explosion, and saw my workshop all in flames. I thought at first that one of my officers had left some combustibles in the shop which had ignited; but directly I saw the windows broken, I knew then that my political enemies had sent some one to shoot me. To save my life I put out the light and crouched down behind the lattice. I know it is a plot of my political enemies. They thought to shoot me, and believing the shop was full of my inventions, they thought it would be set fire to, and I should be utterly destroyed." The grounds were immediately searched, but no one could be discovered.

MORE MURDERS IN IRELAND.—MURDER IN LIMERICK.—Saturday evening last, Patrick Raleigh, under-agent and care-taker on the estate of Lord Massey, in the eastern part of the county of Limerick, was brutally murdered, as it is supposed, with a pitchfork. An inquest was held on the body on Monday, when it appeared, on the evidence of the medical gentleman, that more than one person must have been assisting in the murder, the upper part of the head being beaten in with a spade or slane, or some blunt instrument. About the ears there was the appearance of a pitchfork having been driven through-and-through the skull; and the police discovered in the immediate vicinity of the spot, the iron prongs of a fork covered with blood, and which had the appearance of being recently sharpened. The place where this awful deed occurred is called Duntryleague, near the high road between Tipperary and Mitchelstown. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against some persons unknown." The general impression was, that some members of his own family were the guilty parties, and that his occupation of land—the fruitful source of crime in Ireland—was the immediate cause.——The Irish papers received to-day record another murder in Ireland. It took place in the county of Tipperary. The following are the particulars:—On the night of the 27th of December, about eight o'clock, William Stapleton, of Lorha, heard some person pulling the thatch off his house, when he made a stab of a pitchfork through the part, and at the same time ordered his son John to light a candle and proceed to the yard. Stapleton followed him immediately, and discovered his brother-in-law, Michael Phelan, outside, armed with a pistol, the contents of which he lodged in the body of John Stapleton, who fell to the ground and died. Land is the cause. An inquest was held on the following day, and Michael Phelan was fully committed for trial.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The latest Paris papers do not communicate any additional information relative to the Ministerial crisis. The vote on the Address will be the test of the power of the Ministry to maintain their position. The King received the new President and the Vice-Presidents very cordially. The Débats goes so far as to state, almost officially, that Louis Philippe expressed his regret to M. Debelleyme that his majority was so small; adding, that he (his Majesty) was glad to see him again, and whoever thought to the contrary was in error. M. Villemain, the late Minister of Public Instruction, continues in a sad state. On Tuesday, in a fit of delirium, he threw himself out of the window of his room. The room being near the ground, he was not much injured; but in consequence of the increase of his malady, all the most eminent physicians of Paris immediately met in consultation.——New Year's Day being a great holiday in Paris, but few papers were published on Thursday. They contain the usual addresses to the King; and his Majesty, in answer to them, reiterated his satisfaction at the pacific aspect of affairs, and alluded, in courteous and grateful terms to the cordial reception which he had met with during his recent visit to this country, and to the proofs of friendship manifested towards him by the Queen of England. In reply to the address presented to him by Baron Pasquier on the part of the Chamber of Peers, Louis Phillippe said—"In the visit which I made to the Queen of Great Britain, who has given me so many proofs of personal friendship, I everywhere found the most earnest disposition to keep up with France the most friendly relations, and to cultivate that good understanding which it is the true interest of both countries to maintain."

PORTUGAL.—We have advices from Lisbon to the 25th ult., but they are destitute of political importance. Financial affairs chiefly occupied the public mind. The funds had fallen. The Five per Cent. Scrip of the home debt had fallen, on the 17th ult., from 71 to 65, and up to the 25th no sales at higher price had been made. The rage for the formation of capitalist companies still continued. A new company, with a capital, on paper, of 20,000 contos, upwards of four millions and a half sterling, had sprung up in one day, and gone through all the stages of its incorporation in twenty-four hours after the submission of the project to the Sovereign.

TURKEY.—Letters from Constantinople of the 18th ult. confirm the report of the settlement of the Trebisond affair. The Pacha of that city had been reproved by the Divan, and had been directed to apologise for his conduct towards the dragoman of the British Consul. The Augsburg Gazette of the 28th ult. states, that the Pacha of Trebisond had offered 15,000 piastres to the Greek who had been ill-treated by his directions, on the condition that he should abandon his intention to appeal to the protection of the Foreign Ministers at Constantinople.

THE LATE INUNDATIONS AT FLORENCE.

We have been favoured, by an artist who has just returned from Florence, with the accompanying sketch of the devastation caused by the late inundation of the Arno, which have laid a great portion of the "fair Florence" in ruins. The sketch is taken from the Ponte de Perro; and one of the objects in the right hand foreground, is a portion of the remains of the suspension bridge near the Porta St. Niccolo, which almost instantaneously gave way to the flood, and was dashed with such violence against the next bridge, the Ponte delle Grazie, that at one time it was nearly given up; fortunately, however, the fragments were carried down the current and deposited in the cascina.

The dreadful calamity commenced on the 3rd of November: the cause is thus stated by a correspondent of the Times:—"Incessant copious rains swelled two small rivers (the Chiana and the Sieve), so that they overflowed, and devastating the country in their vicinities, disgorged their overwhelming masses in the Arno, which could not bear such a superaddition to its own abundance, and, overstepping its banks, caused such misery as never has been witnessed here within human recollection. You must remember the mark on one of the houses in the Piazza St. Croce, commemorating the height of the famous inundation in the year 1740. Now the present one was only one-sixth of a braccio lower, consequently, about equal." The writer, on looking out of a window, at nine o'clock in the morning, was struck with the appearance of a yellow current in the middle of the street flowing towards the walls, which proved to be the Arno itself, which, from the Borgo Oymssante, was rushing and rapidly filling our street.

Towards six o'clock, the flood began to abate, and the street was free from water towards seven or eight o'clock. But for several days after, the streets in the inundated quarters were impassable, on account of the great quantity of mud accumulated ankle-deep, and in many places knee-deep, and which could not be speedily removed. Down the Arno were seen floating fragments of houses, windows, shutters, drowned cattle, &c.

On the tenth day after the disaster, people had not done pumping the water out of their cellars and lower stories, and carrying the mud in pails and buckets into the streets. In several parts of the town, especially near St. Croce, the water rose as high as the first piano, and people escaped drowning almost by a miracle. A fine bridge, just finished, at Ponte a Sieve, and which cost 84,000 dollars, was swept away, and nine smaller bridges in the country shared the same fate. The details of the damage done are really heart-rending.

DISTRIBUTION OF ROYAL NEW YEAR'S GIFTS AT WINDSOR.

On Wednesday morning, the distribution of her Majesty's and Prince Albert's New Year's gifts to the poor and needy families residing within the borough of New Windsor, took place, by command of her Majesty, in the New Riding-school at the Royal Mews. The number of families who were the recipients of the Royal bounty amounted to 510. In the centre of the immense building, was a table, upwards of 50 feet in length, upon which were piled the primest joints of beef, weighing nearly a ton, and tastefully decorated with laurel. At either end were two other tables, one containing immense pyramids of plum-pudding and the other quartern loaves, similiarly decorated. Along the walls, at the north and south sides of the Riding-school, tables were arranged, upon which were placed the blankets for distribution. The whole of the persons who were to receive these well-timed gifts, were admitted at the western entrance by tickets, and remained at the end of the building, until the arrival of her Majesty and Prince Albert, who entered the Queen's gallery, which is situate at the east end, over the vestibule, at half-past nine o'clock.

Amongst the members of the Royal household present were the Countess of Charlemont, Lady Caroline Cocks, the Earl of Warwick, Sir Frederick Stovin, the Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell, Major-General Sir Edward Bowater, Mr. G. E. and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay, Mr. Glover, &c. The distribution of the Royal gifts commenced immediately upon the arrival of the Queen and Prince Albert, under the superintendence of the Mayor (Mr. T. Clarke) and magistrates of the borough, the Rev: Isaac Gosset (vicar), the Rev. W. Canning (canon in residence), the Rev. Stephen Hawtrey, the Rev. Messrs. Gould and Bentley, curates of New Windsor; and Mr. John Clode, jun., Mr. T. Adams, and Mr. Ingalton, churchwardens.

The following is a list of the various articles which were given away this morning:—180 families each received an excellent pair of 10-quarter blankets, supplied by Mr. Sharman and Mr. Caley. The provisions, as under, were divided amongst 330 families, excluding those who had been supplied with blankets:—1819lb. of meat, supplied by Mr. H. Adams and Mr. Hughes; 1395lb. of bread, supplied by Mr. Jull and Mr. Phillips; 944lb. of pudding, supplied by Mr. Jull and Mr. Phillips; 584 gallons of potatoes, supplied by Mr. Layton; 1032 pints of ale, supplied by Messrs. Twinch; and 330 cwt. of coals, supplied by Mr. Astle. The quantity of meat given to each applicant was regulated according to the number in the family; each male adult receiving 3lb., each female adult 2lb., and 1lb. to each child. The distribution of the other gifts was similarly regulated.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness remained until the interesting proceedings, which lasted upwards of an hour, had terminated, and proceeded on foot across the Home Park to the Castle, attended by the Royal suite. Two splendid banners, one containing the Royal arms and the other the arms of the Prince Consort, were displayed from the Queen's closet, which was tastefully ornamented with laurel and other evergreens. The splendid chandeliers in the centre of the building, and the branches for lights on either side, were also similarly ornamented.

FINE ARTS.

THE YOUNG GARDENERS.

THE YOUNG GARDENERS.*

Here is a dream of glory !—sweetly blest
With such refined simplicity of Art
That its extatic influence bounds—confest—
To Nature's bosom, and absorbs the heart!
The two so blend—pure Art—dear Nature—just
As tho' new kindred grew between them both;
Art stealing Nature, singing "Come, you must;"
And Nature coming as if nothing loth!
Such holy beauty never Genius drew,
With pencil half so glorious, yet so true!

What is the theme? When Eden's garden bloomed
From Earth's young bosom,—and by mortals trod
Who felt how Innocence their nature doomed
To walk in purity before their God!
The wearers of His image threw away
Their angel garment for the cloak of sin,
And banished purer light, and endless day,
And caught the flaming sword, and quailed within!
Since then;—with withered Paradise—when Earth
Would call back Innocence—lo! Genius wild
Would crown it with a new and lovely birth
In the sweet presence of a little child!
And such the pictured bud of Art that now
Nestles on Nature's tree, and gleams upon its bough!

Here are two little Children—as they sit
In some sweet garden of the blushing south;
Their pretty eyes by very Heaven seem lit,
While lingering beauty flickers round the mouth,
And playful dimples smile upon the cheek,
And Love seems glowing through the very curls,
Not love like that which makes the brain grow weak
In after life, with wild and maddening whirls;
But love that calls all hearts down—like some spring
That hath a quenching for Affection's thirst—
A soothing, holy, good-beguiling thing
That always calmed the soul and never curst!
The blessed love of childhood:—Well they play
Young Gard'ners!—with the crop they find around,
And as their sweet limbs catch the warm sun's ray,
They gather flowers and fling them to the ground,
As the light plays around their forms the while,
And bathes their beauty in a sea of smile!

The boy is infantine—a very child,
With but a lap of flowers—all else unclad—
So mimic, pensive, purposeful, and wild;
Yet with his cherub heart so full and glad!
The girl—his most sweet sister—holds him fast,
Keeps him from harm, and smiles upon his face.
(Oh! that such heavenly smile could ever last,
Nor ever fade before the world's disgrace!)
And the trees seem around them both to grow
As frames unto their pictures!—just as though
Nature would clasp them to her arms of green,
And say, "So pure be all my children seen."

* The above verses are not more a tribute to our own dear public—in so far as regards our general ministering to their enjoyment in the way of illustration of whatever is exquisite in art—than to the genius and power of an artist, who has painted the most natural picture we ever saw, and of the engraver, who has engraved it most naturally. It is a foreign production—produced at Berlin—and nothing has yet, in our humble opinion, burst from the burin with such an intense light of genius—with so glorious a mantle of soul. Never did painter and engraver share laurels so completely, for if the painting be as it deserves to be—Fame—the engraving is Immortality. We believe the proofs have already attained the extraordinary price of 30 guineas, and that the plate is destroyed.] The name of the painter is Eduard Magnus, that of the engraver Eduard Mandel. Here is another tribute to the genius of this noble composition, from a truly accomplished pen:—

Young Buds of Beauty in your garden bow'rs,
Nurs'd by the sunbeams and the dewy show'rs,
There never yet since first Creation's dawn
Drank up the glist'ning pearls upon the lawn,
Were two more lovely or diviner things—
All that ye want are angels'—seraphs' wings,
To show your high descent was from the skies,
Making our Earth a while the Paradise!
Sweet faces with the bloom of youth and health,
Sister-and-brother-Hebe, as by stealth,
An Artist had admission to pourtray
Immortal charms and them to Earth betray!

THE THEATRES.

Any one who might be inclined to doubt the fact of our being a play-going people, has only to look at the theatrical advertisements in the newspapers, to alter his opinion. The Times contains the announcements of ten theatres every day, and there are as many again who do not advertise, all in full play, and all, without doubt, nightly filled with merry Christmas audiences, who, if they do not come for the entire performance, at all events muster in considerable force at half-price to the pantomime or burlesque. Some judicious alterations have taken place in the harlequinades since the first night of their production; a quantity of tedious and unmeaning effects have been unceremoniously disposed of. Their scenery and tricks also now work glibly—the carpenters, as well as the ropes and pullies, begin to fall into their work, and the pantomimists are getting more supple and active by practice. Still, we believe, as we stated last week, that pantomime has had its day. The authors who compose them are, of necessity, theatrical to the most intense degree, and, in consequence, the entertainment is solely composed of repeated conventionalisms, which, sooner or later, must weary any audience. Individuals connected with theatres are accustomed to look but a very little way beyond the sphere of their professional exertions. They reason also rather from what has been, than what is: they conceive if they do not understand a point, or see the nature or meaning of an effect, that nobody else does. They dread innovation upon the old established method of doing anything: and rely, for success, upon memory rather than creation. It is for this reason that pantomimes generally have become dull and wearisome. The scenery is more splendid, the tricks more elaborate, the whole of the mechanical appliances more complicated than in their palmiest days; but the track is so beaten that everything is anticipated, from the butter slide, and red hot poker, to the very method in which the trick is to change. Possibly, increasing years teach us to view things through another medium; but we fancy that the laugh which greets the Clown's "Here we are again—how are you?" or the applause consequent upon his cruel treatment of the Pantaloon, is less hearty than heretofore. The burlesques, as we have before said, have fairly "shut up" the pantomimes. They offer a far better medium for squibbing the bubbles and events of the day; and their quaint humour—their antithesis and anachronisms—tell better with the audiences than all the jokes of the harlequinade put together

The different Christmas entertainments will, without doubt, render a change in the bills unnecessary for some little time to come. In the meantime, however, there have been one or two novelties which we will now notice.

COVENT GARDEN.

Mr. Henry Betty, the son of the celebrated young Roscius who created such a sensation about the commencement of the present century, made his first appearance before a London audience at this theatre, on Saturday evening, in the character of "Hamlet."

Mr. Betty possesses several excellent physical qualifications for the stage. He is young and his features are pleasing: his figure is of the middle size, and well formed. His performance was smooth, careful, level: there was nothing particularly to condemn in it, nor were there any points which called for especial approbation, although the audience were at times loud in their applause throughout the tragedy; and evidently well disposed, as a whole, towards the debutant, in spite of some sounds of disapprobation which were occasionally heard. Some of these might have been provoked by the efforts of too enthusiastic friends. After all we believe that the public is the best supporter either an actor or a dramatist can have—at least in England; for John Bull does not like to be schooled into commendation against his inclination. Such a proceeding generally makes him indignant. And again, the cheers of a first night, raised by those who mean well in all good fellowship and heartiness of feeling, are apt to raise hopes which can only end in disappointment.

The first soliloquy was excellently delivered by Mr. Betty; better, perhaps, than those which followed. He struck us as being more effective in those portions of the part requiring passion and earnestness, than in the scenes, solely dependent for their interest upon a fine demonstration of the workings of Hamlet's wonderful character. But, as a whole, it was a performance to be commended; and at its conclusion, he was most enthusiastically called for and cheered.

Of the production of the piece generally, and its cast, the less that is said the better. Some venerable scenery and dresses did not much contribute to its effect; and a collection of names in the play-bill, perfectly unknown to us, did not promise any remarkable excellence in the subordinate characters. Truth to tell, we are sure the public are weary of these companies of third and fourth-rate performers, which some speculating lessee is continually getting together for a season as brief as it is usually unfortunate. Without an audience see a spirit of liberality in a management, they will in return be chary of their patronage. Mr. Betty has since appeared in the "Lady of Lyons," and, to judge from report, with effect; we have not had another opportunity of witnessing his performance.

On Thursday evening the tragedy of "Antigone," translated from the Greek of Sophocles, was produced, with the music by Dr. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, and with complete success. We give a synopsis of the plot, as it appears in the play-bills:—

"Eteocles and Polynices, the sons of Œdipus, King of Thebes, agreed to reign alternately. Eteocles, having grasped the sceptre, determined to retain it. Polynices procured the aid of his father-in-law, the King of Argos, to enforce his right. An Argive army besieged Thebes; it was defeated; and the brothers, encountering in battle, fell by each other's hand. Creon, their nearest male relative, immediately ascended the throne, and forbade the rights of sepulture to the body of Polynices. Antigone, animated by piety and sisterly love, nobly dares to break the tyrant's mandate—she was detected in the attempt to inter her brother, and was conveyed to die by incarceration in the cavern of a rock. Tiresias, the blind seer, prophetically announcing the sequent ills of this unjust sentence, induces Creon to bury Polynices and release Antigone. He inters the corse, and hastens to the cavern, but too late to avert the torments of a lingering death—Antigone had strangled herself. Her lover, his son Hæmon, was there discovered, lamenting her untimely end—the youth destroys himself. Eurydice, his mother, distracted for her loss, plunges a fatal weapon in her bosom and expires. The Tragedy concludes by the self-reproaches of Creon. The Chorus consists of Nobles and Councillors of Thebes, who are assembled before the Palace of Creon, to hear the tyrannic decree which proved so fatal to his family."

The play was very carefully put on the stage; the scene representing the ancient Greek theatre, admirably painted by Mr. John Macfarren; and the dresses were also in keeping, with the exception of the sandals, which should have been Greek instead of Roman. Miss Vandenhoff's impersonation of Antigone, deserves all praise. Throughout the part, which was in every respect a most difficult one, she evinced the highest intelligence; and in the fourth scene, where she has to speak through the music, which is appropriate to the words, she was loudly applauded. Mr. Vandenhoff, as Creon, had a part exactly suited to him; and he pourtrayed the stern and rugged passions of the monarch with great effect, especially in his desolation of grief at the end of the play when all have died around him. He was also warmly applauded. The other parts did not admit of much more than mere declamation; but they were very efficiently sustained by Messrs. James Vining, Archer, and Rae.

The music is of the highest order, and well worthy of Dr. Mendelssohn's reputation; but in more than one instance the success of the play might have been placed in considerable jeopardy by the miserable inefficiency of the chorus, which ought to be immediately altered.

The curtain fell amidst the unanimous cheers of the audience, and Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff were loudly called for. Antigone was subsequently announced for repetition this evening, without a single dissentient voice. We regret to add that Mr. Vandenhoff met with an accident after the play, which was mentioned as the reason for the tragedy not being repeated the next night.

VICTORIA.

A new domestic drama, entitled "Marianne, the Child of Charity," has been produced at this theatre, with great success. The heroine, Marianne, cleverly performed by Miss Vincent, at the opening of the drama is a child of charity, but eventually proves to be the heiress to immense wealth. Mr. Osbaldiston acted admirably the part of Captain Sefton, the father of Marianne who had been supposed to be dead, but returns from slavery in time to rescue his daughter from destruction. The serious scenes were relieved by a comic underplot; and the piece throughout was loudly applauded. The pantomime, accidentally omitted to be noticed in our last, is received with roars of laughter from first to last.

We have been requested by Miss Rainforth to give the fullest contradiction to a report, circulated by a contemporary journal, that that young lady was married to Mr. Harley. We believe Miss Rainforth's secession from playing every night in "The Daughter of St. Mark," was to enable her to fulfil her concert engagements.

A two-act drama, by the author of the "Trip to Kissengen," has been accepted at the Lyceum Theatre.

THE NEWEST LONDON AND PARIS FASHIONS FOR JANUARY, 1845.

(Extracted from the World of Fashion Monthly Magazine of the Courts of London and Paris.)

CAPS.—The present style of cap is still made very small, but the crowns are more ornamented than they have lately been: the form paysanne is still in great request with some of our fashionables.

CLOAKS are made of black merinos or cloth, and lined with a deep bright colour, such as red satin; the jupe part is made rather long, and corsage à coulisse, or guaged, trimmed upon the front with large facings of black velvet; a small pelerine also of velvet, adds much to the graceful appearance of the cloak, and is gathered in at the waist, forming a little jacket or caraco descending over the sleeve, where it is left open and laced up the fronts of the pelerine joining the revers of the skirt. A splendid cordelière is worn round the waist, and perfectly straight, trimmed with facings of velvet opening underneath, and laced pareil to the pelerine.

CHAPEAUX.—Velvet is in great request for hats for public promenade, particularly those in dark blue or green; they are mostly decorated with feathers or bouquet of marabouts; those which are intermixed with satin have a very light effect; for instance, the front part of the hat of violet velvet, and crown of the same coloured satin fulled, and trimmed with a narrow fold of velvet and nœuds in satin; velours épinglé is also a favourite material with our modistes, those in yellow being considered very distinguée looking, trimmed round the front with a broad biais of satin, which is again repeated round the crown, and finished with a small bouquet of flowers upon the side; sometimes the culotte alone is decorated with two satin roulcaux, brides and nœuds of blue satin decorating the interior; the form of these chapeaux are very long and close at the ears.

BALL DRESSES are at the present moment a subject of great importance amongst our élégantés. The following are what we have selected as most worthy of the attention of our fair friends. For instance, a robe of blue Italian taffetas, trimmed en tablier with fullings of the same material attached at regular distances with nœuds or bows of blue silk; plain body à triple conture, the point of the waist being very deep and long. Another is composed of pink satin, trimmed on the top of the hem with choux or rosettes of satin, placed upon each side of the front breadth just over the seams. Under dress of tarlatane muslin, having a broad pink satin ribbon fixed upon the side of the waist, and descending crossway upon the front as far as the top of the knee, where the skirt is caught up and fastened with a choux of pink satin; low plain corsage à pointe, trimmed with draperies en tarlatane, put on in the form of a berthe, and fastened upon the shoulder with a patte of satin; and in the front with a bouquet of roses; sleeves demi larges, caught up just under the patte, which confines the berthe, leaving the arm quite bare.

CRISPINS are much in favour, particularly for throwing over an evening toilette; they are very pretty when made in pearl grey poult de soie, lined and bordered with a broad band of white plush, which is again repeated round the armholes; also those mantillas, with sleeves attached, made in black velvet, and trimmed in a most graceful manner with lace.

FULL DRESS ROBES are principally composed of satin, and the damas Pompadour richly trimmed with volants of English point lace, whilst velvet dresses are generally ornamented with the Alençon lace, that being of a heavier and handsomer description.

SHAWLS.—The most novel are those of black cloth or cachmere fitting quite plain all round the throat, and fastened in front as far as the waist with a double row of buttons laced across with braid and decorated all round with a narrow embroidery of braid in a large Gothic pattern, the same being continued round the shoulders, and at the corners of the shawl.

MUFFS are now universally adopted; they are made in every kind of fur, with their usual accompaniments, those useful manchettes, and are lined with moire, or satin, fastened at each end with a pretty fancy nœud, of ribbon of the same colour as the lining.

MANTLES are also in great request, particularly for the theatre or evening costume; those having satin sleeves are extremely commodious for a sortie de bal; they are remarkably elegant when composed of white satin lined throughout with ermine, and encircled with a deep bordering of the same.

FASHIONABLE COLOURS.—Rich full hues are still all the rage, as well as noisette, bruns, greens, violets, &c.; black also predominates, particularly for out-door costume; and azure blue, pink, white, paille, and hortensia, for evening dresses.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"The turn of Christmas," as the phrase goes, brings us to the legitimate season of the chase and the leash. To these, winter woodcraft may now be said to be confined, for shooting is on its last legs, and steeple-chasing has not got on well of late, owing to a defalcation of "the legs" also. But, with this brace of popular pastimes on the carpet, there is occupation and interest both for the sportsman whether of action or theory. To the former school the fox-hunter emphatically belongs: it must have been of him Shakspeare was thinking, when he said—

> There be some sports are painful, but their labour
> Delight in them sets off.

Of a verity so it does: let no man despair, for the delirium of fox-hunting is a specific for all the ills that flesh is heir to. No man—no! nor the infinitèssimal part of a tailor: for would it not give health and spirit to a Schneider's goose to see a fox well found, break from five acres of gorse? What is that before our mind's eye? A fellow cross-legged, garnished extensively with cabbage, and seated on a table, has laid hands on the first number for 1845 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. He has sought, with a soul superior to buttons, its article on National Sports. He reads of "moving accidents by flood and field:" his ninth-hood is on fire—call his wife to take away his scissors: he's dangerous. . . . We ourself, albeit, used to the magic of hound and horn, have been carried by our enthusiasm far beyond the realms of long dogs and currant jelly—and so crave leave, for the nonce, to confine us to the sylvan type of war. Appropriate term—simile most suitable—for

> Oh! 'tis a glorious sight to see
> The charge of the Melton chivalry

from Barkby—Rathby—or eke from Bunny Park. Call man a hunting animal, and you class him more characteristically than any naturalist has done yet. Not your Parisian—certainly not: he's a polkaing beast—that is gentleman—but then, you know, the exception proves the rule. What was Lord Ranelagh about when he did "Used Up" (a thousand per cent. better than the original) that he forgot to state Coldstream had neglected Leicestershire? A pink coat at the first "exhibition" would have got rid of his ennui, and by the time he was twice in his buckskins and boots, his heart would have been as light as hope, and his spirits would have "laughed like parrots at a bag-piper." Who can describe the thrilling rapture he feels in the well hunted field, with whom passion for the chase is an instinct,—

> Say who—but he, that in his time hath tried
> A burst from Ashby—and essayed to ride
> From find to finish by our ———'s side.*

This paper will evidently be all theory—we are in the mood for "essay"—softly moved by the spirit of our triplet, and good may come of it. All has not been upon velvet lately with the economy of the chase, in full too many instances. The Duke of Beaufort met with annoyance—and Lord Gifford with opposition, and other worthies with treatment they did not deserve. It ought to be thoroughly understood and acted on by the followers of fox-hounds in every quarter of this land, that they are deeply the debtors of those who support establishments from which they derive so much enjoyment—nay, more—than those, at whose cost they are kept up. The office of Master of Hounds, is always one of anxiety and trouble, perhaps most so when the expences do not all fall to his share. It has been well said that the difficulty of keeping together subscription packs is every day becoming greater. At the best it is done by screwing—in many cases without effects—when the nominal head fares as those do who are in the van in a struggle of any kind. Unhappily, rural discontent is the badge of the present day: if every member of society—if all those who are connected with rural life in this country, by property, or any other social link—did as much for the interests of their districts as those who support our great hunting establishments, the restoration of peace and good-will would not be an event far off.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A miserably flat wind up to the year, few of the subscribers having shown; and those who did, having betrayed very little inclination to speculate. The only Derby horses backed were Alarm, Idas, Pam, Cotswold colt, Kedger, Old England, Fitz Alan, and Collier, the prices taken being, almost to a fraction, the same as were last quoted, except as against Pam, who continues steadily on the advance. All the prices mentioned against the Chester Cup and Oaks favourites were taken.

GREAT PEDESTRIAN MATCH IN AMERICA, FOR TWELVE HUNDRED DOLLARS.—The great pedestrian match between the English and American runners, for 1200 dollars, came off on the 19th ult., on the Beacon Course, at Hoboken, opposite New York, and attracted an immense assemblage of spectators. The competitors were:—John Barlow and Thomas Greenhalgh, two Englishmen, natives of Lancashire; Thomas M'Cabe, an Irishman John Steeprock, an Indian; John Underhill and Thomas Jackson, Americans; John Gildersleeve and Joseph Smith, of New York; and J. P. Taylor, of Connecticut. The distance to be performed was ten miles, over ground extremely heavy, from the rain of the previous evening. The betting was decidedly in favour of Barlow and Greenhalgh, who had obtained considerable reputation in America as pedestrians. After the arrangement of the usual preliminaries, the start took place, the two Englishmen leading at at a tremendous pace, closely followed by the Indian and Gildersleeve. Barlow accomplished the first mile in the short space of 5 min. 10 sec., the Indian being second, and Gildersleeve and Greenhalgh third and fourth; behind them, M'Cabe and Taylor, and the rest "nowhere." Barlow maintained his position in the second mile, which he ran in 5 min. 15 sec., the Indian well up, and Gildersleeve and Greenhalgh as before. Barlow did the third mile in 5 min. 22 sec., and was now 50 yards ahead of the Indian, Gildersleeve and Greenhalgh being still third and fourth. Barlow from this mile kept increasing the distance between him and the other competitors. He closed the fourth mile in 5 min. 25 sec.; fifth mile, 5 min. 28 sec.; sixth mile, 5 min. 31 sec.; seventh mile, 5 min. 34 sec.; eighth mile, 5 min. 36 sec.; ninth mile, 5 min. 35 sec.; and last mile, 5 min. 25 sec.; thus accomplishing the ten miles in the unprecendented short time of 54 min. 21 sec. Steeprock, the Indian, was second; time, 54 min. 53 sec. Greenhalgh, third; time, 55 min. 10 sec. Gildersleeve, fourth; time, 55 min. 51 sec. M'Cabe, fifth; time, 56 min. 52 sec. Taylor, sixth; time, 59 min. 52 sec. In the last mile Greenhalgh made a most desperate effort, passed Gildersleeve, and gained 40 seconds on Barlow, though the latter ran this mile 10 seconds quicker than he did the ninth. Greenhalgh, it is supposed, must have run this mile in about 4 min. 48 sec. Barlow beat the Indian exactly 173 yards, while Greenhalgh was less than 90 yards behind him. It is supposed that had Greenhalgh made his running in the ninth mile, instead of waiting for Gildersleeve, he would have beat the Indian, and thus become entitled to the second prize. The purse was thus divided: Barlow, 700 dollars; Steeprock, 250 dollars; Greenhalgh, 150 dollars; Gildersleeve, 75 dollars, and M'Cabe, 25 dollars. Barlow has since returned to England, leaving Greenhalgh behind to complete some matches he had undertaken.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE TALACRE MINING COMPANY.—The case of John Davis, the original projector of the Talacre Mining Company, was heard in the Court of Bankruptcy on Wednesday. The insolvent's debts and liabilities amounted to £26,000, which accrued principally through his connection with that concern. Wednesday was fixed for his final order, which was opposed by Mr. Wylde, for certain creditors, upon the ground that the insolvent, by trading as the director of the Talacre Company, had brought himself within the operation of the bankrupt laws. The Learned Commissioner was of opinion that the trading of the insolvent had been proved to a certain extent, but yet, in order to satisfy himself fully upon that point, he would adjourn the order for three weeks, in order that further inquiries might be made.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, Capt. Lord A. Fitzclarence, was paid off at Portsmouth on Tuesday. She hoisted the pendant again next day, with a complement of only 59 officers and men. Commissions are down at Portsmouth re-appointing the following officers:—Captain Lord A. Fitzclarence, Commander Wm. Crispin, Lieut. Langton Browell, Master W. Ellis, Surgeon John Greenish, Purser Wm. Bell. She will also have one mate and one midshipman, making one officer of each grade. Fifty able seamen will be borne on the books of the Victory, to be kept always available for the service of the yacht.

Colonel Battersby died at his residence, Listoke, county Louth, last week. On the breaking up of the last American war, he was appointed to the command of the Glengarry (Canadian) Fencibles, and distinguished himself in the force under Sir John Prevost; and on the conclusion of peace he was presented by the legislature and House of Representatives of Upper Canada with their marked thanks, and with a sword of great value, for his conduct and services during the war. Upon his return to England the late Duke of York placed him in command of the 64th Regiment, then at Gibraltar, but from which ill-health obliged him to retire.

MALTA, DEC. 24.—The court-martial assembled on board her Majesty's ship Formidable, for the trial of John Randolph on charges brought against him by Lieutenant Commander Hoseason, of her Majesty's steamer Alecto, on charges of robbery and embezzlement, terminated its proceedings on Friday last, by finding the prisoner Guilty, and sentenced him to be dismissed her Majesty's service with disgrace, to lose six months' pay, and to receive 50 lashes. This punishment, however, was remitted, and the man was drummed out of the fleet. Her Majesty's steamer Alecto will proceed on Thursday to Civita Vecchia, and be placed at the disposition of Sir W. Follett, her Majesty's Attorney-General, who is staying there.

COUNTRY NEWS.

INCENDIARISM.—A man, named Daniel Evans, has been committed to Gloucester gaol on a charge of arson, for having wilfully set fire to the premises of his master, Mr. Wood, of the Ford-house, Newent, on the morning of Tuesday week.

ANOTHER AFFRAY WITH GAMEKEEPERS.—Another fatal struggle has ensued between poachers and gamekeepers. It occurred yesterday week, at Picton, on the estate of Sir R. B. T. Philips, Bart., M.P. for the borough of Haverfordwest, and will probably be attended with the loss of one or two lives. During the fight, the poachers inflicted an awful blow on one of their party, which he will not probably long survive. The poachers then made off, carrying with them their wounded man. Of the keepers and assistants, eleven altogether, eight received very severe wounds. One person had his skull fractured, jaw broken, and teeth knocked out, and was unable to speak. The others got off with severe bruises about the head, &c. The poachers, five in number, have not been taken, although active means are being used for the purpose.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE ICE.—A melancholy event occurred on Friday week at Newport, on a sheet of water in Chetwynd-park, belonging to Mr. J. C. B. Borough, high sheriff of Shropshire. Four young ladies, two of them daughters of the Rev. William Sandford, the third a Miss Hathaway, and the fourth, a daughter of the late Rev. J. Chalmers, Independent Minister, of Stafford, ventured on the ice, to watch the evolutions of two or three skaters. The consequence was, that the whole of the party were, by the ice breaking, immersed in the water. By great exertions the two Miss Sandfords and Miss Hathaway were rescued from drowning, although in a very exhausted state; but it was found impossible to rescue Miss Chalmers until life was extinct. The unfortunate deceased, who was verging on her 23rd year, is described as a most amiable and accomplished young lady. At the coroner's inquest, a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

THE LATE TRAGICAL AFFAIR AT NEW STAINES.—In our paper last week the particulars appeared of a lamentable occurrence at a cottage at Ashford, near Staines. A man named Oliver, and his wife, were found dead, and it was supposed that they had committed suicide. The circumstances had not then fully transpired, and it was supposed that a double suicide had taken place. An inquest, however, has since been held at the King's Head, Ashford, before Mr. Wakley, M.P., and from the evidence given it appears that murder as well as suicide had been committed. We subjoin a report of the proceedings:—William Latham deposed: I am constable of Ashford. I was fetched on Tuesday morning, about ten, to the cottage of the deceased man and woman, by a young woman named Anne Mitchell. I saw the woman lying underneath the man, with her face downwards on the pillow of the bed. She was covered over, except her shoulders. The man was leaning over her, and he was foaming at the mouth very much. The woman had her nightclothes on. I laid hold of the woman's head and lifted her up, and found that she was quite dead. The man was still alive, but quite insensible, and unable to speak.—By the Coroner: When I first went to the cottage I saw two children, viz., a boy about nine years of age, and a girl about five years old. All they said to me on entering was, "Look here, sir; mother is dead, and father can't open his mouth."—Mr. Henry Richardson examined: I am overseer of the parish of Ashford. On Tuesday morning I accompanied the last witness back to the cottage, and found the woman lying on her face upon the bed, and a good deal of foam about her mouth and nostrils. The man was lying upon his back and shoulder, and was still alive. He breathed very hard, but there was not the slightest motion in him.—Mr. Thomas M'Kern examined: I am assistant to Mr. Curtis, surgeon, of Staines. On Tuesday I attended at the cottage of the deceased, about half-past eleven o'clock, and found the woman lying dead in the inner room, and the man in the same room apparently dying. There was saliva about the mouth of the man, and his face was livid, lips quite blue, and the lower part of the body cold. He was quite insensible. I made a hasty examination of the room, in order to see if there was anything lying about that might lead to the certainty that they had been poisoned, but I could find nothing of the kind. I considered the case of the man quite hopeless directly I saw him.—The Coroner: Had these people been under the treatment of Mr. Curtis, as union surgeon, before Tuesday last?—Witness: Yes; the woman had. About a fortnight before I saw her there, she had a sore throat. She said she was not able to obtain meat, and I gave her an order for some mutton. She did not at that time complain of distress, more than a want of meat.—Mr. Wakley then ordered the boy to be brought into the room. He deposed as follows:—My name is William Oliver. I was at home on Monday evening. My mother was also at home all the evening. She appeared to be very well. I did not hear her complain; she was quite sober. My father came home that evening between eight and nine o'clock; he was also sober. When he came in he kicked up a row with my mother about some money. My father had some money, and she wanted him to give her some for the purpose of buying some coke. My father swore at her, but he did not strike her. They both called each other names. Mother had got the supper ready against father came home. They had tea to drink with it. They were quarrelling when I went to bed. Did not hear them quarrelling afterwards in the night. Did not see father put anything like powder, or anything out of a bottle into the teapot. Saw him put the tea into the teapot. He did not usually put the tea into the teapot. Father brought the tea with him from Feltham. The tea was in a large piece of paper, and when father had put it into the pot he threw the paper into the fire. When mother drank the that father made she said it was very nasty. Father often beat mother because she would go to fairs. He did not threaten to beat her that night. Mother did not get tipsy, but father used to do so. Sometimes I have had victuals, and sometimes not. Father used to have two shillings and four loaves every week from the relieving officer. Heard father tell mother so. Father had not worked lately, as he could not get work. Father had been in the Brentford union workhouse at Isleworth. Had been out with father begging.—Mr. Emmott, surgeon, of Hounslow, stated that he had made a post mortem examination of the bodies. Found no poison in the body of the woman: believed she died from suffocation produced by violence. In the stomach of the man there was arsenic, which was no doubt the cause of death.—Several witnesses stated that the deceased man was very lazy and violent, and got his living chiefly by begging.—The jury returned a verdict, that the deceased, William Oliver, had murdered his wife, Sarah Oliver, and that he afterwards wilfully murdered himself.—Immediately after the verdict of felo-de-se was returned by the jury, Mr. Wakley handed the constable his warrant for the interment of the deceased; that referring to the man specifying that he should be buried between the hours of nine and twelve at night, without any funeral ceremony. The woman was buried on Sunday afternoon, and her remains were followed to the grave by a vast concourse of persons. The murderer was not buried until Monday night, about ten o'clock, the place selected for the grave being a corner of the churchyard which has before been the receptacle of the remains of two persons who, some thirty years since, destroyed themselves, and against whom verdicts of felo-de-se were returned. During the whole period that has since elapsed, there has not been a single suicide in the parish until the present.

THE POACHING AFFRAY AT CROOMBE.—An inquest has been held on the body of Thomas Staite, who died from the injuries he received from the gang of poachers in the preserves of the Earl of Coventry. After hearing several witnesses, the coroner adjourned the inquiry to the 7th of January. Three men, named Francis Dingley, Samuel Tarvey, and William Brimfield, have been captured, on suspicion of being concerned in this murderous attack.

BARBAROUS MURDER AT ULVERSTON.—The Carlisle papers state that an itinerant knife-grinder at Ulverston, last week murdered his wife in the most brutal and barbarous manner. He returned home in a state of intoxication, and a quarrel ensued between him and his wife, which at length terminated with blows. The enraged man eventually seized the poker, and struck his wife a formidable blow with it on the head, which completely shattered her skull, and must, it is supposed, have produced instant death. Not satisfied with what he had done, the enraged murderer commenced kicking the head of his victim with such violence as to force one of her jaws entirely out of its place; he then brutally kicked her on various parts of her body, which he dreadfully mutilated. He then stripped the dead body entirely naked, and threw it down stairs, after which he burnt the whole of her clothing. Having done this, he left the house, and went to his wife's sister, and coolly told her he was afraid his wife was dead. In the meantime, two children (a boy and a girl) awoke, and the neighbours, who had heard the noise, were first alarmed by the screams of the boy, that his father had murdered his mother. At the Coroner's Inquest, a verdict of wilful murder againt the perpetrator of the deed, whose name is Thomas Donahoo, was returned.

EXECUTIONS.—On Saturday last, Mary Gallop, the girl condemned for poisoning her father, was executed at Chester. On arriving before the city gaol the gibbet suddenly met her view, and all her fortitude seemed at once to forsake her. At about half-past eleven o'clock in the morning the prisoner was led between her two female attendants to the chapel, where prayers were offered up, after which the sacrament was administered; during the whole of which the unhappy prisoner seemed overwhelmed by the sense of her dreadful situation. She was soon after re-conducted to the apartment she had left, where a short time was again devoted to prayer. But the awful moment was then fast approaching; the executioner entered and pinioned her arms as she sate, and, finding her quite incapable of standing, she was carried in a chair and placed under the fatal beam. The cord was quickly adjusted; her spiritual teachers uttered their parting words of consolation; the executioner asked and obtained a pardon; shook her hand with all the kindness he could assume, and left her alone upon the scaffold. The next instant the bolt was drawn, and then the awful plunge—the mortal struggle (which, in consequence of the little fall afforded by her sitting posture, was of frightful duration)—the equally appalling stillness that succeeded, when the convulsion of the countenance and the quivering of the limb announced that suffering was at an end, and—all was over.—On the same day, the murderer, William Kendrew, underwent the extreme sentence of the law in front of the county gaol at York, for the murder of Mr. Inchbald, on the high road, near to Knaresborough. Several thousand persons had congregated together, including a large proportion of females. The unfortunate man mounted the scaffold with a very firm step. He was preternaturally pale, but beyond that betrayed no emotion or fear. It was observed, however, that as the executioner was adjusting the rope a shivering spasm crossed his frame, while his chest heaved convulsively. After being suspended the usual time the body was cut down, and taken within the gaol, where it will be buried in accordance with his sentence. As one illustration of the "tendency" of public executions, it may be added, that a young man was detected, almost at the foot of the scaffold, in the act of picking pockets.

HOW TO DIE FOR LOVE.—A lamentable instance of suicide arising from disappointed love has taken place at Derby. It appears that a young man of 21, named Frank Dixon Manning, formerly footman in the family of a clergyman residing in a neighbouring county, but latterly a frame-work hose-maker, in the employ of Mr. Morley, of Nottingham, was enamoured of one of the daughters of a copper-plate printer, at Derby, named Allen. Manning made proposals, to her, which, however, were rejected until about a year ago. Caroline frequently went over to Nottingham to attend a "saloon" there, in the capacity, as she states, of vocalist, and received certain wages for her services, whatever those might be. During her visits there she frequently supplied the deceased with money, and pressed for their union. He complained of his restricted means, and she gave him on one occasion two sovereigns to get the bans published, and to purchase the necessary articles for the wedding. The bans ran out about two months ago, and the deceased then wished her to wait a little until his friends became more reconciled to the match. The match was broken off at the girl's request, but by desire of the deceased she subsequently wrote to him as a friend several times, and on one occasion saw him at Nottingham. On Christmas-day he arrived in Derby, at a public-house kept by a person named Glue, at which place Caroline met him in the evening by his particular desire. He wished to know whether she still desired that the acquaintance should cease. Her reply was that she did, and she urged the propriety of this course. He said, "If it must be so, it must," and they parted in good feeling. Next day he spent several hours at the house of Caroline's father, and conducted himself much as usual. In the evening he went to a saloon, and took part in the singing or performance, and Caroline went there to see him, and after remaining a short time bade him good night, and then proceeded to another saloon, where she remained until four o'clock in the morning, and was taken home by a young man, who is supposed to be somewhat enamoured of her charms. On Friday morning week the deceased again returned to Allen's house. At that time Caroline was in bed. Two other sisters, Eliza and Emma, were in the house. The deceased called to Caroline at the foot of the stairs, and she got up, dressed herself, and went down. Meanwhile the deceased had sent her sister Emma for a pint of ale, and on Caroline descending the stairs he inquired kindly after her health, and then presented a glass of ale to her, saying, "Caroline, drink with me; it is our parting glass." She complied, and had no sooner got some of the contents into her stomach than she became ill. The deceased told her that the reason he had "done it" was, because he could not bear to see the object of his affection in the arms of another; adding, that his former wife (the daughter of the clergyman with whom he lived as servant, and with whom he eloped, a divorce having since been obtained) was about to be united to her cousin; but that he "should not have minded, had she (Allen) been willing to marry him; and that, under these circumstances, he could not, and would not bear with it." The girl recovered, but Manning finished the contents of the glass and soon afterwards expired, while in a state of great excitement. There was no doubt that he had put prussic acid in the glass. The jury returned a verdict of "Felo de se."

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT ON THE LIVERPOOL AND MANCHESTER RAILWAY.—On Monday morning a very melancholy accident occurred on the Liverpool and Manchester Railway during a thick fog. Some few days ago a young lady, daughter of Mr. John Forsythe, died, and her funeral was fixed for that morning. Mr. Forsythe was one of the principal servants on the line, and his son was also engaged by the company, and has care of the locomotive department. Mr. Thomas Forsythe, the brother of the young lady, in order to attend the funeral of his sister, ordered one of the engines to convey him a short distance on the line towards his father's house. On the way he observed to the fireman, "I fancy I felt the engine pass over a soft substance;" and they agreed to turn back to see what was the matter. They did so, and the first object that met the eye of Mr. Forsythe was the mutilated body of his father, over whom the engine had passed, and killed him on the spot. It appears that the old gentleman was on his way to attend the funeral, when he was overtaken by the engine and killed. The fog was so dense that it was quite impossible to distinguish any object at ten yards' distance. The jury, at the inquest, returned a verdict of Accidental Death.

SUPPOSED MURDER AT SALT HILL.—A long inquiry took place on Thursday evening at the Three Tuns, Salt Hill, before John Charsley, Esq., respecting the death of a married woman, named Sarah Hart, who was supposed to have been murdered on Wednesday night, at the house where she resided at Bath-place, a row of houses near Botham's Hotel. According to the evidence, stifled screams had been heard to proceed from the residence of the deceased, who was found lying on her back. She appeared as if she had been struggling. She was foaming at the mouth, and she died soon afterwards. An elderly man, named Tawell, supposed to be a quaker, who was last seen with the deceased, and who had left Slough suddenly for London, was apprehended, and was examined before the Coroner. The result was the adjournment of the inquiry till Saturday (this day).

CARDIGAN.—The friends of F. O. Taylor, Esq., of the North and South Wales Bank, in this town, consisting of some of the most respectable merchants in this town, invited him to dinner at the Black Lion Hotel, when the mayor, R. D. Jenkins, Esq., presided, and William Phillips, Esq., acted as vice-president. The dinner was served up in sumptuous style, by Messrs. Weston and Parker. The evening was spent in the greatest conviviality, and Mr. Taylor was highly eulogised for his attentive services in the Bank.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The interest attached to the meetings of this body becomes "small by degrees and beautifully less." On Monday the association met as usual, with Mr. Neil Daunt in the chair. There was another long speech from Mr. W. S. O'Brien, in which he exhorted the Repealers to attend to the registries. The rent was under £200.

DEATH OF THE MEMBER FOR DOWNPATRICK.—A vacancy has occurred in the representation of this borough by the death of Mr. David Kerr, which event took place on Monday, at his seat in the county of Antrim. Mr. Kerr, who had been long in declining health, sat for many years in Parliament, seldom, however, taking any more active part in its business than in merely recording his vote. He was a supporter of the present Ministry.

RAILWAYS IN IRELAND.—Another new Irish railway is projected, namely, one for connecting Armagh, Coleraine, and Portrush. The "first sod" was raised on Tuesday by the Duke of Leinster, on the line of the Cashel Railway, near Adamstown Castle, in the presence of a large company, and all the work-people and labourers who have been engaged for the work. The scene was a very cheering one. His Grace stripped off his coat, and in his shirt sleeves handled the spade. Having dug up six sods, he threw them into a wheelbarrow, and rolled them off in a style which excited the admiration of all the surrounding Patlanders, who cheered him most vociferously. Tents were pitched for a handsome luncheon, ordered by the directory, of which a numerous company partook. All the work-people were also regaled with a substantial and plentiful repast. The occasion was an interesting one, as the first important beginning of the railway system in Ireland.

MURDER IN ROSCOMMON.—The Roscommon Journal says:—"A most brutal and inhuman murder was perpetrated a few days since midway between this town and Strokestown. The victim was a well conducted industrious man of the name of Patrick Shiel, whose only offence was having advanced twopence per barrel in the price of corn in that locality, in which he trafficked, and disposed of in Longford."

MURDER IN KERRY.—The Tralee Chronicle contains the following:—"On the night of Saturday last, one of those barbarous crimes which are the fruit of intemperance, took place near O'Dorney. It appeared from the facts, as detailed in evidence upon the inquest, that a quarrel took place between two brothers, named Cornelius Murphy and John Murphy, while labouring under the effects of intoxication. John Murphy was urging his brother to go home, and on his refusing he struck him a blow on the head, on which Cornelius stabbed him with a pen-knife in different parts of the body. John Murphy shortly after expired. The jury found a verdict of 'Died of wounds inflicted by Cornelius Murphy,' who has not as yet been apprehended."

ANOTHER ATTEMPT AT MURDER.—A frightful attempt at murder has been made near Borrisokane, County Tipperary, at a place called Torryglass. The occurrence is thus described in a letter from Borrisokane:—A Mrs. Going (a widow) was some time ago ejected from a small farm, which she held at or near Carrigahovig. A respectable farmer named Cleary got into possession of it. He was served with threatening notices, but did not mind them. While going to his own house, and quite hard by it, a gun, charged with a vast quantity of heavy shot, was fired at him. At the moment the deadly weapon was discharged Cleary had his hands in his breeches pockets, and in his left hand—the one next the assassin—he held a bunch of keys, with some pence and some halfpence, which he had just got from a neighbour. The shot struck his left hand, carried off three of his fingers, smashed the ring of the keys, battered the money, and tore away his pockets and linen. The abdomen is untouched, but his left thigh is much lacerated. Hopes are entertained of his recovery; and never was there so narrow, so providential an escape.

SCOTLAND.

OPENING OF THE DIRECT RAILWAY BETWEEN AIRDRIE AND GLASGOW AND EDINBURGH, &c.—The opening of this undertaking, which will form a direct line of communication between Airdrie and Glasgow, by Coatbridge and Kirtintilloch, took place last week, under the superintendence of the Directors of the Edinburgh and Glasgow and Ballochney Railway, and other influential gentlemen. Exactly at half-past 12 o'clock, the train left Airdrie, and it reached the terminus in Queen-street, Glasgow, at a quarter past one; this experimental trip being performed in three-quarters of an hour.

SUPPOSED INCENDIARY FIRE AT DUMFRIES.—On Wednesday week the extensive premises occupied by Messrs. Beck and Son, coach-builders, at Dumfries, with their dwelling-houses, were entirely consumed by fire. The houses were insured in the Union Insurance Office for £900, and the houses, stocks, &c,. in the Alliance Office for £2680. There are strong reasons for believing that the fire was not accidental, but wilfully produced. It broke out in several different places at or about the same time; and a wood shed on the east side of the premises which was not burnt down contained strong evidence that the hand of an incendiary had been actively at work. This shed also was observed to be on fire early in the morning, but the flames were speedily subdued, and the general fire did not reach it. On examination several bundles of straw were found, over which turpentine, or some similar inflammable substance, had been poured; and numbers of staves had also been prepared for combustion in a similar manner.

During a recent boar hunt in the forest of Coucy, (France) the young Duke de Guise had a very narrow escape. The Duke having dismounted from his horse, the boar suddenly charged him with such violence as to throw him on the ground, grazing his right leg, and then, seeing him down, the infuriated brute turned to make a second attack, which would, undoubtedly, have been attended with most alarming consequences, had not the Duke, with remarkable agility, sprung to his feet, and killed the animal with his sporting knife as he approached. Of seven boars killed by the party this was by far the most powerful; he had, during the chasse, killed three dogs and wounded six others.

Mr. John Kerr, her Majesty's Consul at Adrianople, died on the 7th of December.

A fire broke out at Ibrahim Pacha's sugar manufactory at Cairo on the 13th ult., and property to a considerable amount was destroyed.

Letters from Florence mention an extraordinary incident. The Countess Z——, of St. Petersburgh, who is known for the many male enmities she has kindled, had just entered her carriage in order to go to the promenade, the horses were about to start, when perceiving that she had forgotton something at home, she descended and re-entered her residence; but she had scarcely passed the door when a tremendous explosion blew the carriage to pieces and killed the coachman. An infernal machine had been introduced into the body of the carriage. This horrible attempt is imputed to a young man who had sworn to be conspicuously revenged on the celebrated Countess.

STATISTICS OF THE UMBRELLA.—A provincialist having arrived at Paris ona very wet evening, asked a Parisian if it always rained on Sunday evenings, to which the latter replied that the present was an exception to the general rule, as the rain generally began in the morning. The umbrella, says a facetious French writer, plays an important part in the existence of a Frenchman. An eminent statistical calculator, he says, has proved that every Parisian passes at least two years of his existence in opening and shutting that useful article.

GREENWICH RAILWAY.—This railway has ceased its strife with the Croydon Branch, and quietly passed into the hands of the Dover Railway, the directors of which have purchased it on lease for 999 years, at a rental of £30,000, to be increased £1000 per annum until it arrives at £40,000 per annum. The Dover Company took possession on the 1st inst. This railway originally cost above one million sterling, or £300,000 per mile. Its shares have realised £27 10s.!!! have been sold as low as £3 10s., and are now to be purchased for £9 15s.! which in ten years will make the present share worth £14 13s. 9d., paying the whole time four per cent. in perpetuity.

PEDESTRIANISM.—On Christmas-day, the Scotswood-road, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, was thronged to witness a series of foot-races. The first was contested by Rt. Angus, of Newcastle, and Joseph Blake, of Monkseaton, distance 120 yards, for £5 a-side. The Newcastle man was the winner by about two yards. The next race was between R. A. Martin and John Bucton, of Whickham, distance 130 yards, for a like amount. After a hard struggle Martin was the victor. Another race of 110 yards, for £3 a-side, was run by Frank Robson and Peter Melross, which ended in a dead heat. Other races were also run between younger aspirants for pedestrian laurels.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.—A clever engineer residing in the vicinity of Calais has recently made an improvement upon the atmospheric railway of Messrs. Clegg and Samuda. The mode contrived by them for attaching the carriages to the piston, was to make a groove along the tube, covered with a leathern flap, which being weighted and covered with wax, allows a cable or bar, connecting the piston with the carriages, to traverse—opening with ease to admit passage of the cable, and closing after it, so as almost, but not entirely, to prevent the admission of air. The improvement of M. Hallette is in providing a means of opening and closing the longitudinal groove, so as to prevent the loss of power by leakage. M. Hallette has made artificial lips, by disposing along the parallel edges of the longitudinal groove two little cylinders, cut laterally, so that the concave of one cylinder is opposite to the concave of the other; and, filling each cylinder with a kind of hollow gut or tube, of leather or other material impermeable to air, which tubes, being filled with compressed air, and lying in close contact with each other, form a kind of elastic lips, that open like the lips of man, and allow a bar or cable to pass along them without admitting any air into the large tube. If the invention should realise the expectations formed of it, all the advantages of the present atmospheric railway will be rcalised in a higher degree.

A Scotch paper tells the following anecdote to exemplify the voracity of a cod fish. One must have almost as good a swallow as the fish, to believe it. There was taken into Mr. Bain's curing-yard, Findhorn, on Tuesday se'nnight, a cod, which, on being opened, was found to contain a bird of the duck species, measuring sixteen inches from bill to tail, and twenty-eight inches across the wings. It had every appearance of being swallowed alive, being quite entire.

John Plummer, Esq., of New Parks, the owner of Alice Hawthorn, has generously proposed to give the whole of the money which this celebrated mare may realise in 1845, to the inhabitants of Easingwold, provided they will construct a branch railway from that town to the Great North of England Railway.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

THE SONG OF THE STOKER.

Rake, rake, rake,
Ashes, cinders, and coal;
The fire we make
Must never slake,
Like the fire that roasts a soul.

Hurrah! my boys, 'tis a glorious noise,
To list to the stormy main;
But, nor wave-lashed shore,
Nor lion's roar,
E'er equalled a luggage train.

'Neath the panting sun our course we run,
No water to slake our thirst;
Nor ever a pool
Our tongue to cool,
Except the boiler burst.

The courser fast, the trumpet's blast,
Sigh after us in vain;
And even the wind
We leave behind,
With the speed of a special train.

Swift we pass o'er the wild morass.
Though the night be starless and black,
Onward we go,
Where the snipe flies low,
Nor man dares follow our track.

A mile a minute, on we go—
Hurrah for my courser fast;
His coal black mane,
And his fiery train,
And his breath—a furnace blast.

On and on, till the day is gone,
We rush with a goblin scream;
And the cities, at night,
They start with affright
At the cry of escaping steam.

Bang, bang, bang!
Shake, shiver, and throb;
The sound of our feet
Is the piston's beat,
And the opening valve our sob.

Our union-jack is the smoke-train black,
That thick from the funnel rolls;
And our bounding bark
Is a gloomy ark,
And our cargo—human souls.

Rake, rake, rake;
Ashes, cinders, and coal;
The fire we make
Must never slake,
Like the fire that roasts a soul.

AN AMERICAN FAT LADY.

It is said, in a New York paper, that there is a lady in Pulteneytown so awfully fat, that the carters grease their cart wheels with her shadow!

THE SIAMESE TWINS REALLY MARRIED.

An American paper asserts that the reported marriage of the Siamese twins to two sisters, which was supposed to be a hoax, is a literal fact, and that Mrs. Chang and Mrs. Eng have presented their lords with heirs to the name and property of Chang and Eng. It is further asserted that, being now married men with families growing up, the twins intend to resume their exhibition by way of increasing their store and providing for their interesting progeny.

VARIABLE CLIMATE IN NORTH AMERICA.

Every one who has been in America, though he may have been neither a physician nor a philosopher, must have been struck with surprise at the extraordinary and sudden vicissitudes of temperature, and likewise at two very remarkable circumstances touching the climate of the United States. We refer to its being colder in winter and hotter in summer, by several degrees, than at the same parallels of latitude in Europe, as well as in Asia and Africa upon the coast of the Mediterranean. This is more remarkable in the extent of country lining the shore of the Atlantic Ocean. Thus, taking Salem in the State of Massachusetts, and Rome, being places of nearly the same latitude, an extraordinary difference is observable.—Colonial Magazine.

POMPEY'S PILLAR.

Abd Allalif, the old physician of Bagdad, relates of some ancient Arabian writers, that they asserted that the column, called Pompey's pillar, stood upon a pivot in the earth, and that when the wind blew, stones placed beneath it, were, by the force of its motion, ground to powder. Mr. Borrer, in his "Journey from Naples to Jerusalem," asserts that the whole of this column, which is eight feet in diameter at the base, is sustained upon a prop of stone only four feet square.

A DOUBTFUL POINT.

Lord Denman, at the last Huntingdon Assizes, addressed one of the gunners, who was there as a witness against a man for stealing a bow-net—"Apply your mind to the question, my man;" and then added his lordship, having evidently a doubt upon the subject "if you have one."

AN AMERICAN DESCRIPTION OF A TEETOTALER.

I once travelled through all the state of Maine with one of them ere chaps. He was as thin as a whippin post. His skin looked like a blown bladder after some of the air has leaked out, kinder wrinkled and rumpled like, and his eye as dim as a lamp that's livin on a short allowance of ile. He put me in mind of a pair of kitchen tongs, all legs, shaft and head, and no belly; real gander-gutted looking crittur, as hollow as a bomboo walking-cane, and twice as yaller. He looked actually as if he had been picked off a rack at sea, and dragged through a gimlet-hole. He was a lawyer. Thinks I, the Lord a massy on your clients, you hungry, half-starved looking crittur you, you'll eat 'em up alive. You are just the chap to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel, tank, shank, and flank, all at a gulp.

LITERARY TASTE OF LOUIS XVIII.

It was the opinion of some that Louis XVIII. was fond of reading: one of the garde de corps, a young Irishman, being asked if this was the case, desired the person to come to the Tuileries the next day, when he should be there on duty, and he would show him the royal library. The invitation was accepted; the young garde de corps led the way to a place which commanded a view of one of the lower apartments, where there was a cook in a white dress spitting larks. "That is the king's library," said the young soldier; "I know no other nearer than the Rue Richelieu,"—referring to the great national library of France.

THE LAWYERS OUTWITTED.

In 1784 the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple brought an action against a lighterman of the name of Kennet for driving his craft against this wall, and damaging the same. When the case came on for trial it was found (we copy from a newspaper paragraph of the time) "that they had sued in London for an injury done them in Middlesex, and a non-suit ensued, attended by a hearty laugh at the luminaries of the law."

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

The Hangman is the title of a new sheet published in Boston (United States). It is decorated with the representation of a gallows in actual operation, and is designed to advocate the abolition of capital punishment.

THE NEW YEAR.

The year was old that day. The patient year had lived through the reproaches and misuses of its slanderers, and faithfully performed its work. Spring, summer, autumn, winter. It had laboured through the destined round, and now laid down its weary head to die. The New Year, like an infant heir to the whole world, was waited for, with welcomes, presents, and rejoicings. The New Year, the New Year! Everywhere the New Year! The old year was already looked upon as dead; and its effects were selling cheap, like some drowned mariner's aboardship. Its patterns were last year's, and going at a sacrifice, before its breath was gone.—The Chimes, by Charles Dickens.

A SLY "BET."

Miss Elizabeth Peabody offered to lay a wager, on the Presidential election, with any eligible young man, viz., that if Polk were elected, she was the winner, and should have her opponent for a husband; but if Polk were defeated, then her opponent was the winner, and would be entitled to have her for a wife!

ALLEGED DECLINE OF FEMALE INTELLECT.

According to the "Quarterly Review," the conversational power, as well as the graceful craft of letter-writing, for which the last century was famous, has vanished. The range of conversation generally has been sadly contracted; and the field remaining open to women has been still further circumscribed by the wanton and not very brilliant ridicule which men are accustomed to throw upon the learning of the quicker sex The women, in truth, have been fairly laughed out of their wits. They have gradually receded from all the best topics of conversation—except indeed, the highest and most difficult of all—we mean the grand subject called "Nothing."

THE CONTEMPLATION OF NATURE.

To the natural philosopher there is no object in nature unimportant or trifling. From the least of her works he may learn the greatest lessons. The fall of an apple to the ground may raise his thoughts to the laws which govern the revolution of the planets in their orbits; or the situation of a pebble may afford him evidence of the state of the globe he inhabits, myriads of ages ago, before his species became its denizens.

AN IDEA OF SPACE.

According to a recent writer, to get an idea of space one must shut his eyes and think of nothing.

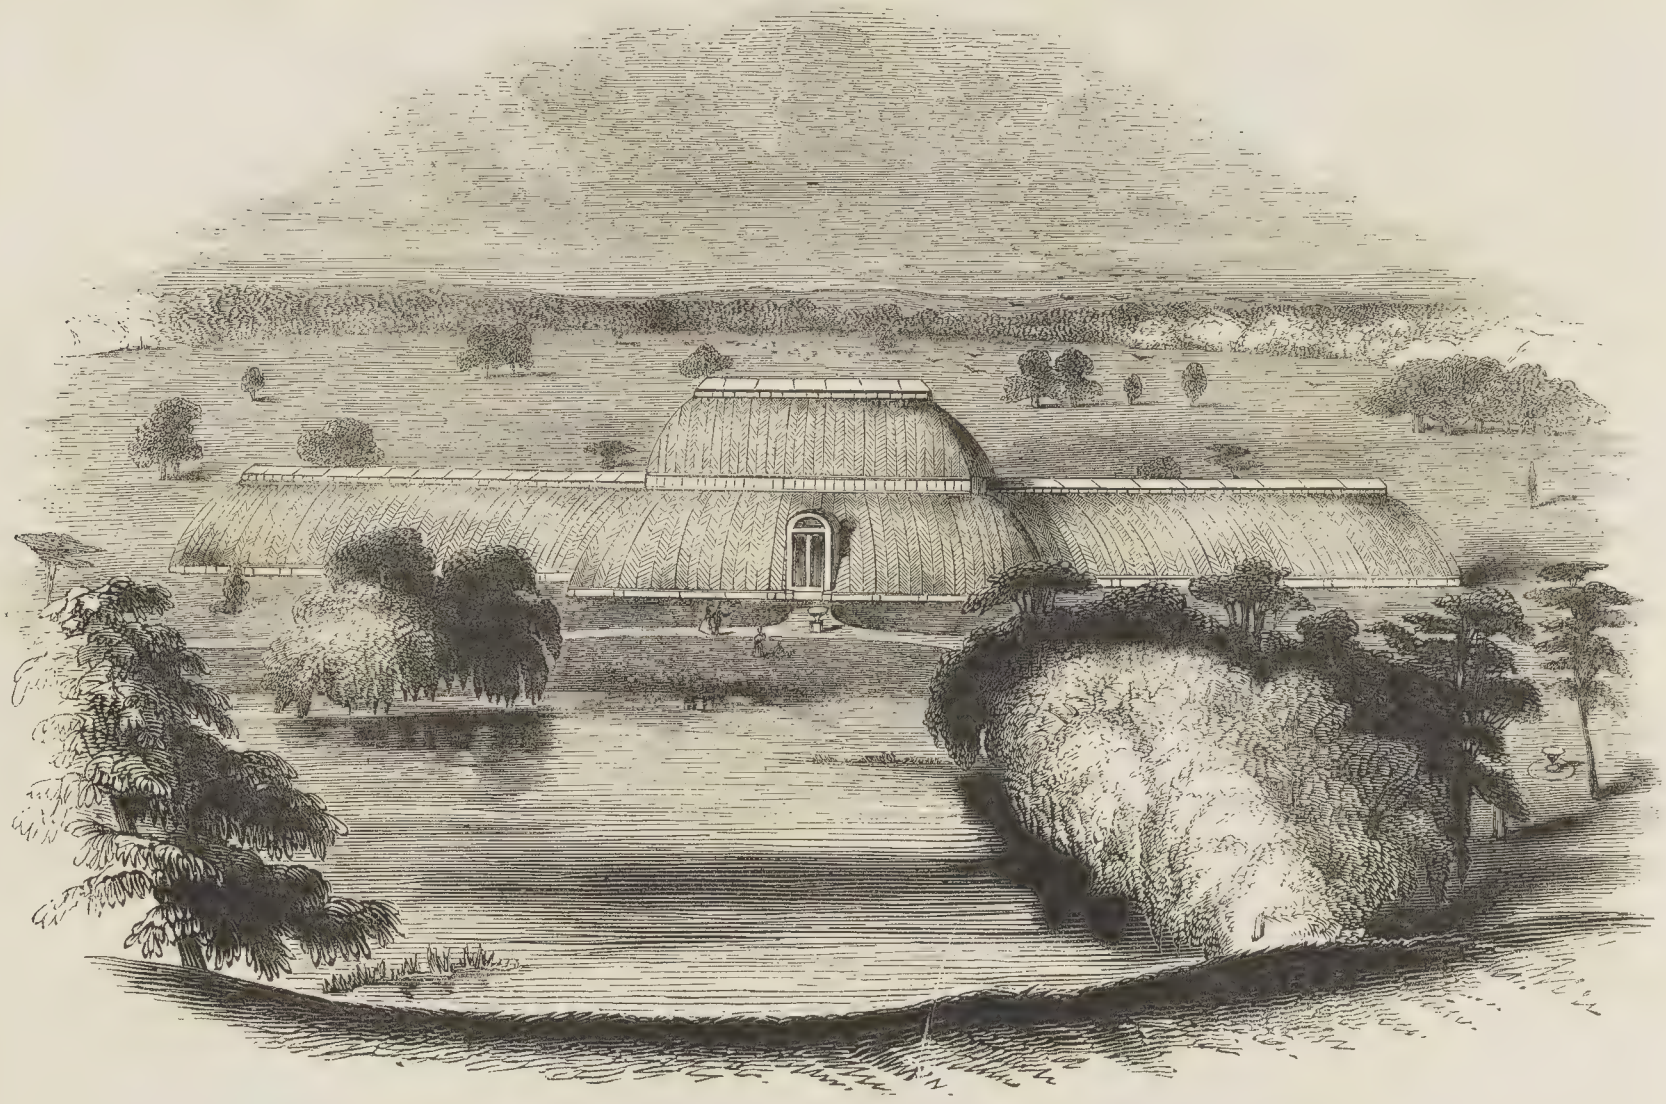
DIRECTIONS FOR FINDING A POLICEMAN.

Look down every area in the street; if you do not by accident see one, ring the bell and inquire if the policeman is in the kitchen. Repeat this at every door, and you cannot fail eventually to find one.

MILK-AND-WATER WIT.

"This must be a very inconvenient town to live in," said a Cockney to an inhabitant of Ryde; "for I understand you have to get all your milk from Cowes?" "Not so bad as London," replied the Isle of Wight wag, "for they tell me you get all your milk from Wells!"

FINDING YOURSELF.



John Reeve, the comedian, died at the early age of 40. Social habits led to habits of intemperance, and poor John was the Bottle Imp of every theatre he ever played in. "The last time I saw him," says Mr. Bunn, in his "Journal of the Stage," "he was posting at a rapid rate to a city dinner, and on his drawing up to chat, I said, 'Well, Reeve, how do you find yourself to-day?' His answer was, 'The Lord Mayor finds me to-day.'"—Fraser's Mag. for Jan.

TOAST FOR BACHELORS OR BENEDICTS.

There's a purple half to the grape, a mellow half to the peach, a sunny half to the globe, and a "better half" to man.

A MELANCHOLY REFLECTION.

A coquette is a rose from which every lover plucks a leaf—the thorns are reserved for her future husband.

THE GREAT PALM-HOUSE, AT THE ROYAL GARDENS, KEW.

THE GREAT PALM-HOUSE AND MONSTER CACTUS, AT THE ROYAL GARDENS, KEW.

The Palmæ, which number nearly fifty genera, and upwards of two hundred species, are truly the "princes of the vegetable world"—for they surpass all other plants in the magnificence of their foliation and in their general height and bearing—but, notwithstanding such great and manifest attractions, they are scarcely known to the public. The cocoa-nut and date-palms define the limits of popular acquaintance with the family; the splendid Pandanus, the graceful Chamærops, the aspiring Attalia, the charming Euterpe, and a long train of fanciful and beautiful varieties, remain to be revealed. To put the public in possession of this noble family, has been for the last twenty years the ambition of many governments, and of many princes. The great Maximilian of Bavaria, aided by his scientific travellers, Spix and Martius, led the way; the French in the Conservatories of the Jardin des Plants, the Spanish in the Gardens of the Escurial; and in our country, Messrs. Loddiges, at Hackney, and his Grace the Duke of Devonshire, at Chatsworth, followed with much—but necessarily limited—success. The great attempt to rear the entire family in one vast establishment has been reserved for the English Government. To accomplish this most interesting project, a great conservatory, or Palm-house, is now in course of erection in the Royal Gardens of Kew, of sufficient height and extent to accommodate the most lofty or the most delicate of the tribe. Our engraving presents its external aspects, and displays at the same time the character of the very beautiful locality in which it is placed. The design is by Mr. Decimus Burton, under the botanical direction of Sir William Jackson Hooker the enlightened and public-spirited Curator of the Royal Gardens. The length of the entire front elevation is 362 feet; of the side elevation of the centre, 144 feet; width of the central pavilion, 106 feet; width of the wings, 56 feet; height of the centre, 62 feet; height of the wing, 33 feet—the latter proportions being practically increased by the depth of the pits. The ventilation and temperature of the interior will be conducted on the most scientific and easily managed principles, so as to ensure not merely a proper amount of heat, but one under instant control. When finished, and the plants arranged in natural order, we can imagine no more striking exhibition of the great Creator's works than the offspring of Terra and Phœbus, as they have been termed, will present, or one more directy calculated to raise the public taste.

In connection with this subject, we subjoin, as a suitable pendant, an account of an extraordinary Cactus, which has just been received at the Royal Botanical Gardens of Kew. It is called the Echinocactus Stainesii, and by the liberal permission of the Government it may be seen by the public.

THE MONSTER CACTUS. (ECHINOCACTUS STAINESII.)

Cactus Stainesii, Mr. Staines' Cactus, is one of those kinds of Cactus to which the name of Echinocactus is very generally given, on account of the peculiar form of the whole plant, and the copious spines, resembling the Echinus, or Sea Urchin, of our shores. These Echinocactuses flourish in the high lands of Mexico, and perhaps the district that most abounds in them is that of San Luis Potosi; and thence it is that, along with many other Cactuses of great rarity, the present individual was sent by Frederick Staines, Esq., a gentleman much attached to botany, and who has been long resident in that country, and, being quite a new and undescribed species, it has been named by the Director of the Royal Botanic Gardens, in compliment to him, Cactus, or Echinocactus Stainesii. The weight of this single specimen, when its roots were wholly free from soil, was 235 lb. Its height above the surface of the ground is 3 feet 4 inches (5 feet, including the tub), its diameter 1 foot 10 inches, and its circumference 5 feet 7 inches. The packing such a large and prickly mass for a land journey of some hundred miles through a mountainous country, before it could reach a port where it could be received by the Royal Mail steamer, was no easy task; but it was most successfully accomplished by freeing the roots entirely from the earth, and enveloping the Cactus in several folds of thick matting, made of the soft fibres of a palm common in that country, and then placing the whole in a box constructed to the exact size. In this manner it arrived at Kew in the most perfect and healthy condition possible, so that hardly a spine was injured, and it was scarcely planted in the tub in which it is now seen than it threw out, from among the spines at the apex of the plant, above 100 flowers, about the size of those of the common Opuntia Cactus, but of a colour much more inclining to orange. The brighter colour of the top of the plant, and of the top of a fine young offset from its side, indicates that it is in a growing state, but so slow is the development of the larger Echinocactuses in general, that for years it is hardly perceptible to the eye; and there is good reason for believing the present individual to be some centuries old. Next to its size and shape, one of its most striking peculiarities is the presence of long coarse fibres or hairs at the roots of the spines, not visible in our reduced figure. Although short in stature, compared to some of the Cactus tribe (especially the slender Cereus kind, which often attain a height of 30 or 40 feet); yet its great weight and bulk have entitled the individual now under consideration to the appellation of the "Monster Cactus."

PUBLIC BAPTISM AT EXETER.—Six persons (five of them females) were baptised in the river, at Exeter, on Sunday last. Mr. Chapman, by whom the ceremony was performed, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, had previously preached in the open air for above an hour, and was nearly an hour and a half in the water administering the sacred rite.

THE CAMBRIDGE RAILROAD.—The railroad from Hockerill, Essex, to Cambridge, is fast progressing. The works are carried on with such diligence as to afford reason for believing, that, with the exception of a tunnel through Lord Braybrook's estate, the whole line may be opened for traffic in the coming spring. His lordship is building a spacious inn and hotel at the Wendon Ambo station, a distance of rather more than a mile from Saffron Walden.

THE NEW POLICE COURTS.—On Monday morning the new police courts at Stones-end, Blackman-street, Borough, and Kennington-lane, Lambeth, were opened for public business.

CURIOUS ABANDONMENT OF A CHILD.—One evening last week, a newly-born infant was left at the door of St. Martin's workhouse. The infant, a female, apparently about twenty-four hours old, was enclosed in a rush basket, with one end left open. It was dressed in a calico bed-gown, muslin cap, with flannel underneath. A piece of white calico was wrapped round the body, as also several folds of new flannel; but none of those articles had any mark upon them. In the basket was found a card, on which was written, in a very neat feminine hand, the following:—"To the Parochial Authorities.—The fear of exposure and shame compels the mother to abandon for a time her infant, and commit it to the care of strangers, whose hearts she prays God to endue with pity and benevolence. In full confidence of being enabled to redeem her child hereafter, she earnestly requests that this card may be carefully preserved, that the product of an indented duplicate hereafter may serve for its identification. Please to have the infant christened as on back of the card." On the other side of the card was written, in a bold hand, "Maria H. M., born December 26, 1844." The child is placed with a wet nurse, and is now doing well.

LITERATURE.

THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE, No. XXI.

This is an excellent New Year's Number, richly illustrated by Kenny Meadows, Phiz, and other artists. The papers are well chosen, i.e. they are seasonable, the staple subjects being Christmas and the New Year. Craven's Tale, "Fatherland," is continued with a spirited chapter—"The Land and the Loom," opening with the knot of village politicians, admirably portrayed by Phiz, in our engraving:

"THE CROWN" AT KING'S OVERSLEY.

It was committee-night, and the great room of "The Crown" was occupied by a more numerous and miscellaneous society than ordinary on such an occasion. A stranger whom chance had introduced would have found little difficulty in conjecturing that the matter which brought the company together was neither of a social nor a peaceful character. Individually, the members had as little to recommend them as it is possible to conceive; collectively, they formed as truculent looking a band as ever aspired to Botany Bay. The president was in good keeping with the general grouping; while his whole man, or tout ensemble, according to the polite phrase, conveyed to the eye a concentration of such exceeding scoundrelism, so great a breadth of rascality, that you felt assured he was entitled to the strong relief he enjoyed as chairman. This was the village attorney, who had recently relinquished an Old Bailey practice of several years' standing—or rather ups and downs—in consequence of some impertinent interference on the part of one of the judges, touching a fee with which he had forgotten to retain counsel to defend a gentleman labouring under an imputation of picking pockets. Around the table, at the head of which sat the lawyer, was attracted, as aforesaid, a far from prepossessing circle. On the right hand of the chair sat Hoskins the higgler, a philosopher who held it was the duty of philanthropy, should it see friend or foe on the ground, to help them up, by the watch-chain. This free moralist was supported by a party, with heads and shoulders apparently constructed for the destruction of the cudgels that should come in contact with them. These were trampers: gipsies, vagrant tinkers, and mixed vagabonds of all denominations. The locality itself was principally represented by a knot of loose-looking young fellows in velveteen jackets and leathern gaiters, who made the drinking vessels dance on the table at any allusion to the slavery of the game laws, and the inherent right of every man to the wild birds and animals of chase. There were, however, a few yeomen that seemed to belong to a substantial class, but who took no part in the proceedings beyond smoking their pipes, and taking their pull in turn at the tankard; and, at the further end of the table, lounged an old soldier with a wooden leg and a Waterloo medal; beside whom was a youth who evidently sought to avoid observation. Such was the company which, at midnight, held hot debate upon the political economy of the day at the sign of "The Crown," in King's Oversley.

The next engraving, an extremely felicitious creation by Phiz, illustrates the following paper, entitled

OUR DREAM.

We have dreamt a dream—a jolly dream—a Christmas dream! Never was there such a dream. Bottom's dream, that had no bottom, was nothing to it. Not that it had anything to do with a Midsummer Night's Dream. It was a Midwinter Afternoon's Dream, and it was, like the cold weather, seasonable—very seasonable.

To explain and describe this dream would be bootless. The pencil is more apt for such a task than the pen. And the pencil has achieved the feat. The cunning hand of the artist hath seized the phantasmagoria of the vision. With a spell which genius draws from black-lead, he hath arrested the flying, flitting, glancing creatures which surrounded our venerable head as with a halo. Our dream is there in black and white—all the little men and women are in limbo—all the world may see them dancing on the paper as erst they danced in thin air—we can answer for the very portraits. The dream is there, then—Marry study it. We shall not describe it—but we shall tell how it came about—how it stole upon our raptured senses—how it fluttered over our marble chimney-piece.

And thus it was:—

The time was dinner-time—after dinner, in fact. The place was our parlour—the very snuggest of snug parlours. Everything about was snug. The curtains were snugly drawn—the table was wheeled snugly to the fire—the burning black diamonds crackled and blazed with a marvellously snug voice—the whole parlour was rich with the essence of snuggery.

We said that we had dined. A comfortable winter's dinner had gone the way of all dinners—a comfortable winter's appetite having officiated as unseen high priest at its sacrifice. The odours of good things were yet rich in the balmy air. The smoke of the Irish stew yet curled aloft—a spicy vapour. Talk of smoke wreathing over a hollow beech tree, with a woodpecker tapping it; or rearing its rolling columns streaming from the censer upward to groined Gothic roofs, and turning ghost-like round clustered pillars; or rising up in a black column of dissolved essence of genies melted into air by the spells of Solomon, as it did from the copper vessel in the "Arabian Nights," when the poor fisherman looked on with greater astonishment than if he had caught a whale; talk of all these—talk of any picturesque sort or degree of smoke you like, from the smoke of a magician's charm to the smoke of a Pickwick cuba, there is no smoke like the smoke of a good dinner!

So did we deem as we inhaled it, bursting in a gush of fragrance from the uncovered dish. And still its breath lingered around, rich and luscious, feeding the almost satiated nostril with a balmy content.

But it had a friendly enemy to combat with. Wine—rich, red, and rosy. The cork had leapt out of the bottle with a "melodious twang," as the old ghost seer described the sound with which an "apparition at Cirencester" vanished, and a captivating, titillating, odorous richness proceeded from its glass prison, at first hardly perceived, then spreading palpably abroad the treasure of its influence.

The room was sombre—nearly dark. No candles or unhallowed gas glared unflinchingly upon us. A holy shade was everywhere. So ought a winter after-dinner-time to pass. The fire gives light enough, and a hearty, healthy, ruddy light, redolent of broad Rembrandt-like gleams, and deep dim shadows.

'Tis a light and a time favourable for musing—quiet, pleasant musing—not brain-racking. Thinking, for example, what sauce goes best with goose; or what would be a pretty dress for Jane's complexion; or dimly passing in mental review the jokes in the last farce; and imagining—you are sure to do that—that you could make better ones, if you had been the author. 'Tis a time for making yourself intensely comfortable—for hugging yourself mentally—for muttering lowly, "Oh, that this twilight calm would last!" After dinner, before the candles come, is the time for all this. Ask Leigh Hunt, or read his "Sonnet to the House-Cricket;" that is a most eloquent answer.

Well, we were acting then—that is, upon the occasion of the dream—as we are preaching now. We were leaning back—oh! how luxuriously!—in that old, easy, yielding, springing arm-chair. Our feet were upon the fender—the tiny blazes danced in jets from between the grate-bars, as if to look at their supple forms reflected in our polished slippers; our eyes were half shut; the glass darkened with its brown treasure in our hand; a few buttons of our waistcoat—no use in saying how many—luxuriously set free; and so we sat in delicious reverie—our half-sleeping gaze mechanically fixed upon the burning embers.

We hate people who don't enjoy themselves after dinner. We hate people who don't enjoy themselves at dinner: affected prigs who pretend they don't care whether the fare be split peas or venison pasty; the drink—sour swipes or Lafitte of the vintage of twenty-five. These men and women are spoiled in the making. As rational beings they are failures—pitiable, contemptible failures—the neck of a woman of the sort is like a scrag of mutton: the hairs of a man like the bristles of a dry blacking brush. The contour of their forms is angular and scratchy. They are always bilious, and perpetually putting on bad faces as if they had their noses at a bottle of black draught. To sum up all—they never get fat, and they invented trousers tight in the waistband.

But we are of a different mould; we felt it; we never felt it so deeply, so passionately, as on the evening of the dream. There we sat; we gazed pensively on the fire; the little flaming jets burst out, and the smoke curled. It was soothing, a moral opiate. We thought of Christmas coming, of panto mimes, of carols, of compliments of the season, of boxing night, of rows in the gallery, of flagons of beer, of beer bills, of Lord Brougham. We don't know how we came to lug him in, but we don't pretend to coherency after dinner. Well, we thought of this, and still gazed wistfully on the fire. Two little jets of flame were playing in front of the bars, and a nasty-looking piece of Wallsend, of slaty appearance, was near them. The jets played, the slate crackled, and we mused. Gradually the jets became jets no longer, but were palpably and evidently Adèle Dumilâtre's legs—without a body—dancing the pas d'ombre, and the ugly piece of slate took to itself the exact form and shape of Lord Brougham's nose without a face. The legs danced, and the nose twitched: never was anything so remarkable. We were highly pleased with the exhibition. The nose appeared to approve of the legs, and sniffed its satisfaction. We agreed with the nose, and were faintly murmuring "bravo!" when suddenly the members of the dancing girl on the one hand, and the feature of the speaking man on the other, were pushed aside, and a face—an actual red laughing face, with a merry squint and a sparkling eye, and a conical cap on the top of all—was protruded from the grate, and the eyes winked audaciously at us from between the bars—first the one, and then the other.

We were astounded; but we were doomed to be still more so. The face suddenly disappeared amid the glowing coals; then shot out again—but this time jumping clear away from the grate—followed by the body too, and the next moment there was a small hobgoblin sitting on our toe; his conical red cap cocked jauntily, his arms coolly crossed, his legs dangling, and his audacious eye winking.

Never was such a hobgoblin; we thought we were in the Adelphi, looking at Wieland through the big end of a telescope, but he looked even funnier than Wieland. We know a number of goblins by sight, but this was a new one—quite a stranger.

We gazed on him; he did on us.

"Merry Christmas!" said the goblin.

"The same to you," said we. "How did you leave them all below?"

"Tolerably jolly," replied the diminutive demon; "I'm jolly myself. [Do you want a Christmas-box?"

OUR CHRISTMAS DREAM.—DRAWN BY PHIZ.

"Don't we wish we may get it?" murmured we with a sigh.

"Yes, you shall," screamed the imp; "here goes; I'll let you see my show-box—free gratis, and for nothing. It's in the fire, there," he continued, giving a jerk to his head; and almost with the same motion, to our utter horror, jerking himself between the bars back into the blaze.

"Just a-going to begin," he screamed, from a red-hot cavity among the coals.

And the deuce take it if he didn't begin to whirl all the burning fuel out of the grate.

"Hillo, hillo!" shouted we, in a furious state of alarm; "you'll burn the house down, and it's not insured."

But not a button did he care, even although he burnt the street down.

In a moment the grate was empty, but the coals did not fall on the floor. Ah, he was too knowing for that. Did you ever see a street conjuror keeping up a flying circle of balls? Of course you have. Well, our goblin friend did the same with the blazing coals. Our eyes were dazzled with the sparkling whirl. It circled round us, a halo of flashing fire-balls—the old room, the pictures, the books, jolly folios, were illuminated with the strange flickering dancing glare. We gazed, spell-bound. All at once the goblin screamed out—

"Presto, change."

The grate faded from our sight; its diabolical tenant disappeared; the fly-ng coals flew, but no longer as coals. They became little men and women, symbols and shapes, types of Christmas. They were all dancing, rollicking, coming—going—appearing—vanishing, at once. Snapdragons, and mistletoe-boughs, invitations to Christmas dinners, and grisly crowds of Christmas bills, country dances, and prize beef, champagne bottles, and fat cooks, jolly old codgers, and buxom young girls, tempting tit-bits, and—but hold—we said we would not describe our dream. It is done for us. Behold it! As you see it, it flickered round us, as you see us we placidly smiled, the smile of the contented. Jumped and danced the airy little men and women; bounced the phantom champagne corks, till the sight fled and the vision sped, when a voice, a female-housekeeping sort of voice, rung through our sleeping ears—

"Please, don't you want tea?"

Among the more noticeable papers are a lively batch of "Travel and Talk," by Luke Roden; "Past, Present, and Future," by a Wizard of the West; "A Legend for Christmas Times," by Angus B. Reach; "The Story of Jasper Brooke," by Charles Whitehead; and "The Adventures of a Scamp." Altogether, this is the most attractive miscellany of the month, and must greatly tend to advance the "Illuminated Magazine" in public favour.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Letters from Constantinople of the 11th ult., announce that on the 9th one of the Sultanas was confined of a Princess, to whom the name of Munire (Brilliant) was given. The Hasnè Vekili, Arif Pasha, proceeded to the Sublime Porte to announce to the Grand Vizier the happy event. The birth of the Princess Munire was celebrated with public rejoicings.

M. Sauvard de Maupas, a young man of highly respectable family, has been tried before the Court of Assize at Paris, for having stabbed a carpenter in the Rue Laffitte, on the afternoon of the 7th of November last, by which the unfortunate man lost his life. The prisoner, was acquitted of the homicide, but was sentenced by the Court to pay a sum of 1000 francs, and an annuity of 600 francs for the joint lives of the father and mother of the victim.

The work of laying down the electric telegraph on the South-western Railway, from London to Gosport, is nearly completed. The posts for sustaining the wires, which are fixed at about 50 yards distance, are put down nearly the whole distance, and the fixing of the wires is being rapidly proceeded with. The cost of the work, about £24,000, is, we understand, borne in equal proportions by the Company and by the Board of Admiralty.

The Universal German Gazette states from Berlin, that the daughter of Tschech, the man who attempted to assassinate the King, has been sent away from that city by the authorities, after having been for some days in custody. It appears that by the laws of Prussia she could have been kept in prison for life as the child of a person guilty of high treason.

A Mulhausen journal says that the demand for calico goods in that town is so great, that the manufacturers are all actively employed, and that within a short period 3000 new handlooms have been set up in the neighbourhood.

Another writ of Habeas, endorsed by Mr. Baron Rolfe, has been served upon Mr. Kandich, the gaoler of Jersey, in the case of Mr. Carus Wilson. The writ is returnable on the 18th of this month.

The King of Prussia, on the recommendation of Meyerbeer, has ordered that Weber's opera of "Euryanthe" shall be performed in the new Opera House at Berlin. The receipts arising from the performance are to be presented to the committee recently formed at Dresden, for erecting a monument to Weber.

Prince Alexander Golutzin, formerly Minister of Public Instruction in Russia, which office he resigned in 1842, from ill health, died on the 4th ult, at one of his estates in the Crimea.

Dr. Wolff was on his way from Teheran to Erzeroum, according to the latest accounts.

A letter from Marseilles dated Dec. 23, states that Lord Brougham has pompously inaugurated his recent acquisition of forest land in the south of France by a grand hunt. La Croix de Gardy, the name by which the forest is known, was for three successive days the scene of many a noble exploit. Two wild boars, three wolves, several badgers, are the trophies of the war. The palm of the hunt was by right awarded to Mr. Leader, Member for Westminster. This apt and intrepid sportsman drove four foxes to their earths and killed them. A brilliant ball terminated the festivities, which will long form an epoch in the annals of the chateau of Lord Brougham and the forest of La Croix de Gardy.

It is said that Mr. Solomon Heine, the banker of Hamburg, whose death has been already announced, has left property to the amount of upwards of a million sterling. He was a man of very humble origin, and upon his earliest visit to Hamburg from the place of his birth (an obscure village in the kingdom of Hanover), he had to struggle with difficulties which extended even to his means of obtaining the first necessaries of life.

The King of Hanover, says a German journal, has ordered that a monument, similar to that of Queen Louisa of Prussia, and which will cost 200,000 dollars, shall be erected, in honour of his late Queen, in front of the Palace of Herrenhausen, near his capital.

Mr. Galloway the engineer, has just left Paris for Egypt, to commence the Suez Railroad, which was projected by his brother, the Bey, ten years ago. This work must be looked upon as the first link of the grand chain of railway communication from the Mediterranean, so likely to be useful to England and her Indian possessions and her recently-acquired colony in China.

It is in contemplation by Government to send out another expedition to the Arctic regions, with the view of discovering the north-west passage between the Atlantic and Pacific; and the Council of the Royal Society, having been solicited to give their opinion as to the desirableness of such an expedition, have stated that, independent of the great object to be attained, the benefits that would accrue to the sciences of geography and terrestrial magnetism render such an expedition peculiarly desirable.

Letters from Bessarabia have brought intelligence that the Russian fleet on the coast of Circassia has lately captured a Turkish slave ship, on board of which, besides a quantity of ammunition, there were several chests of English arms for the mountaineers. The Russian army had gone into its cantonments. There was already much snow on the mountains, which, however, did not hinder the mountaineers from paying an occasional visit to the Russians.

The trial of a woman for poisoning her husband took place at Splingen, in Wurtemburg, the other day, and has excited the greatest interest throughout Germany. Christiana Rudhardt is a woman of 40, well born, her father having been a physician, her mother noble. Her husband, Rudhardt, was a goldsmith, who spent his means in looking for the philosopher's stone, or the perpetual motion. She gave him poison three times. Her condemnation is expected.

A letter from Carlsruhe of the 21st December says—"The Roman Catholic clergy of the Grand Duchy of Baden have just addressed a collective petition to the Government, requesting it to forbid the plying of steam boats on the lake of Constance, and all travelling on the railway in the Roman Catholic parts of the Grand Duchy, on Sundays and holydays, that the devotions of the faithful may not be disturbed. In consequence of this step, the shares in the railways and steamers have experienced a slight decline."

The late Miss Clara Webster sustained a very narrow escape from the falling of the platform in Prince's-street, Edinburgh, during the Queen's visit to the Scottish capital. On that occasion she was precipitated from the highest point of the scaffolding; but though several persons died from the injuries they received, Miss Webster escaped almost unhurt.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Most of the vessels so long detained by the thick weather and contrary winds, are now making their passage; but as their samples had been previously forwarded and sold, very little fresh English wheat was offering to-day; still, however, the demand for that article was in a very depressed state, and Monday's quotations were with difficulty supported. In foreign wheat only a limited business was doing, and the rates were stationary. Although the supply of barley was small, the demand for that article was very dull, and previous figures were not supported. The demand for superfine malt was steady, but the middling and inferior parcels were a mere drug. The increase in the supply of oats produced a very heavy inquiry for that grain, in which scarcely any business was doing. Other grain as on Monday.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 3480; barley, 3920; oats, 4510 quarters. Irish: wheat, —; barley, 300; oats, 17160 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 720; barley, 1210; oats, — quarters. Flour, 4010 sacks; malt, 5240 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 39s to 47s; ditto, white, 44s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 37s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 32s; distilling, 28s to 32s; malting ditto, 35s to 38s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 61s to 62s; brown ditto, 57s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 63s to 64s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s, potatoe ditto, 24s to 25s; Youghal and Cork, black, 21s to 22s; ditto, white, 22s to 23s; tick beans, new, 36s to 37s; ditto, old, 40s to 42s; grey peas, 36s to 37s; maple, 35s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s, per quarter. Town made flour, 45s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lb. Foreign.—Fine wheat, 38s to 54s; Dantzig, red, 40s to 47s; white, 42s to 49s. In Bond.—Barley, 27s to 29s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 15s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, Canadian, 21s to —; Baltic, 20s to —, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—With the exception of the best linseed and rape cakes commanding a ready sale at full currencies, the seed trade is heavy, at barely previous quotations.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto, foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d, per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 6d; barley, 34s 3d; oats, 20s 10d; rye, 31s 9d; beans, 35s 7d; peas, 35s 5d.

Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 45s 4d; barley, 34s 8d; oats, 21s 8d; rye, 31s 8d; beans, 37s; peas, 38s 11d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 4s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 5s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—We have to report rather an extensive demand for most kinds of tea, especially low congous, which have advanced ½d per lb—the value of other kinds being steadily supported. The stock in London is now 27,424,000 lb, against 28,316,000 lb at the same time in 1844. The deliveries for the past year for home consumption in the United Kingdom have been about 41,[illegible],000 lb. The stock in the kingdom is about 2,000,000 lb more than at the close of 1843.

Sugar.—For West India sugar, we have to report a very steady demand, at full prices. Other kinds of raw sugar are somewhat inactive, though not cheaper. Supplies are now rapidly coming in from the East and the Mauritius. The refined market is active, and the rates are 6d. to 1s. per cwt. higher; standard lumps having produced 74s. per cwt.

Coffee.—Very little is doing in any description of coffee; nevertheless, prices are supported.

Indigo.—Owing to the approaching public sales, very little is doing privately, yet the quotations are supported. The quantity advertised, is 6761 chests.

Provisions.—In Irish butter very little has been doing, yet the quotations are supported. Cork has produced 96s to 100s; and Carlows, 96s to 104s per cwt. landed. The supplies of foreign butter being on the increase, that article is a dull sale, and somewhat cheaper. The best Friesland may be had at 116s., and Kiel, 110s. to 114s. per cwt. In bacon, comparatively little is doing. Waterford, landed, is producing 46s to 48s, and heavy, 44s to 46s per cwt Prime small hams are quite as dear. Other kinds of provisions about stationary.

Oils.—Linseed oil is in fair request, at the late advance. In other kinds of oils, a steady business is doing.

Tallow.—The market for Russian is quiet, yet prices are supported. Purchases have been made at 40s 3d to 40s 6d, on the spot. For forward delivery very little is doing. Town Tallow is rather heavier, and 41s to 41s 6d has been paid for small parcels. The imports from Sydney, during the past year, have exceeded 7000 casks.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 10s; useful do. £4 12s to £5 4s; fine upland do, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 14s to £1 16s; wheat straw, £1 16s to £1 18s per load.

Wool,—The best qualities of English Wools are in active request, at a trifle more money. In other kinds comparatively little is doing.

Potatoes.—Considerable fluctuations, in consequence of the late non-arrivals, have taken place in the value of potatoes since our last, and prices are not expected to be supported.

Hops (Friday).—As we have long since anticipated, our market has become somewhat active for bags of last year's growth, at rather more money, and this, too, notwithstanding the liberal supply brought forward. Old Sussex and Kent bags are likewise selling at extreme rates. The [illegible]ckets we have only a moderate demand; still prices are supported in every instance. Sussex pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £6 18s to £7 10s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £8 0s to £9 10s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 12s; Mid Kent bags, £7 15s to £8 15s; East Kent ditto, £11 0s to £12 0s.

Coals (Friday).—Acorn Close, 25s; Bell and Brown, 26s; Heaton, 26s; Wharncliffe, 26s; Seymour Tees, 26s 6d; South Durham, 26s 6d; Evenwood, 25s 6d; Killingworth, 25s; Adelaide, 27s per ton.

Smithfield—(Friday).—Although our market to-day was by no means heavily supplied with beasts, we to have to report a very inactive demand for that description of stock, and Monday's reduced figures were with difficulty supported. There were on sale 8 beasts and 14 sheep from Holland; and 200 horned and polled Scots from Scotland. The numbers of sheep were small, yet the mutton trade ruled dull, at about stationary prices, at which a clearance was effected. Prime small calves sold steadily, but other qualities were a dull inquiry. In pigs, rather more business was passing, but no improvement took place in value. Milch cows sold slowly, at from £16 to £19 each, including the small calf.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 0d to 4s 2d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 4d to 4s 0d; prime small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; neat small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; sucking calves, 18s 0d to 30s 0d; and quarter old store pigs, 10s 0d to 20s 0d each. Beasts, 748; cows, 150; sheep, 2450; calves, 154; pigs, 207.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—Prime beef and mutton were in fair request, at full prices. In other kinds of meat, the supply of which was good, exceedingly little was doing. Per 8lbs. by the carcass.—Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; large pork, 2s 6d to 3s 4d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; small pork, 3s 6d to 4s 0d. ROBERT HERBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Market was flat at the beginning of the week, speculators selling upon the presumed liability of England's being drawn into the dispute between America and Mexico. Consols receded to 100⅛. On Tuesday some improvement occurred, and the past week's prices were nearly attained; but Wednesday's market was flat, from an absence of business, joined to the fact that the Government Broker has ceased to invest on the public account. The latter cause, of course, tends to render the market less firm, although Consols close at a slight advance on Monday's price. Bank Stock has advanced during the week, notwithstanding the state of the other description of securities. Its closing price is 211½. Three per Cents. Reduced quote 100⅜; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. Reduced, 103⅜; Long Annuities, 12⅛; India Bonds, 77, Exchequer Bills, 63 to 65; Consols for the Opening, 100⅛ to ¼.

From private advices received by the last mail from America, and emanating from the most respectable sources, there appears to be an anxiety among the monied class of the United States to remove the odium that repudiation has so justly called down upon them. The state of Illinois has already turned its attention to the best mode of redeeming its credit; and Pennsylvania, it is confidently asserted, will pay the next dividend, and enter into arrangements for the liquidation of those overdue. The prosperous state of the Federal treasury, which is boasted of in the President's Message, supports the hope that these good intentions will be carried into effect at the earliest possible date.

The Foreign Market partook of the depressed state of the English Funds at the beginning of the week, but on Tuesday much buoyancy was perceptible; Mexican, which had been flat at 35¼, rallied, and quoted 35½ to ⅝, and Spanish Three per Cents. advanced to 38⅛ to ¼. Portuguese has maintained its advanced price, and closes at 59⅜ ex. div. Spanish Three per Cents. have also since advanced a point, and at closing quote 36⅝ ex. div; the Actives are 27⅜. Columbian quote 14¼; Mexican, 35¼; the Deferred, 15¼; Peruvian, 29; French Scrip, 1⅜ to 1 pm.; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents. are 63⅜ ex. div.; Four per Cent. Certificates, 97¼.

The settlement in the Share Market was one of the heaviest known for some time past, and money becoming dear, except upon the best class of railway securities, very heavy rates were paid for continuations. The feverish state of the market has been greatly added to by the announcement of the Board of Trade, on the subject of the new railways in connection with the South Western and Great Western. The decision in favour of the latter has been, generally speaking, considered satisfactory; and one benefit has already begun to result from the manner in which the investigation appears to be conducted, which is that much of the reckless speculation latterly entered into appears already to be seasonably checked. The publication in the Gazette of the decision is also considered satisfactory. Great Western and Bristol and Exeter have both advanced in consequence: the former closes at 154, the latter at 78. By the rejection of the Yeovil and Exeter all competition is prevented with the Bristol and Exeter. South Western old shares have been tolerably well supported, and close at 75 to 76. The new shares, however, have receded from 8¼ to 3⅜. A large number of shares in the Great North of France line was purchased on Wednesday at 2¼ prem. It may be well to remark, that the Company have not yet secured the right of making the line, and that two powerful competitors are in the field. Considerable dealings still continue on the French lines, which close as follow:—Boulogne and Amiens, 5; Lyons and Avignon, 2⅜; Orleans and Bordeaux, 7⅜; Paris and Lyons, 3½; Paris and Orleans, 43⅜; Paris and Rouen, 41; Rouen and Havre, 24⅜. The English lines close as follow:—Bristol and Gloucester, 43½; Caledonian, 4½; Churnet Valley, 4; Eastern Counties, 15; Lancaster and Carlisle, 14⅜; Birmingham Stock, 228; Blackwall, 7⅜; Brighton, 52½; Greenwich, 9⅜; London and York, 4½; Manchester and Leeds, 125½; Midland, 116½; North British, 7⅜; Norwich and Brandon, 14; Rugby, 1⅜; Dovers, 41½; Trent Valley, 10⅜; York and North Midland, half shares, 32; Glasgow and Dumfries, 18s. 6d.; Sheffield and Manchester, 97½.

SATURDAY MORNING.—There was no alteration worthy of record in either the English or Foreign Markets yesterday. In the Share Market considerable fluctuation occurred: Bristol and Exeter were done at 80, but closed at 76½; Great Western advanced to 157, and South Western improved to 77; Croydon also advanced to 17. The French lines were not so much dealt in.

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

TUESDAY, DEC. 31.

RAILWAY DEPARTMENT, BOARD OF TRADE, WHITEHALL, DEC. 31, 1844.—Notice is hereby given, that the Board constituted by the minute of the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council for Trade, of the 24th of August, 1844, for the transaction of railway business, having had under consideration the following schemes for extending railway communication in the district comprising the counties of Cornwall and Devon, viz.:—the Cornwall and Devon Central Railway, the Cornwall Railway (Plymouth to Falmouth), the Great Western and Cornwall Junction Railway, the West Cornwall Railway, the St. Ives Junction Railway, the North Devon (Crediton and Barnstaple) Railway, the Exeter and Crediton Railway, the Torquay and Newton Abbott Railway; have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the Cornwall Railway (Plymouth to Falmouth), the West Cornwall Railway (up to the junction with the Cornwall Railway), the St. Ives Junction Railway; against the Cornwall and Devon Central Railway, the Great Western and Cornwall Junction Railway; and recommending the postponement until a future period of the North Devon (Crediton and Barnstaple) Railway, the Exeter and Crediton Railway, and the Torquay and Newton Abbott Railway. And the Board having further had under consideration the following schemes for extending railway communication in the districts of Berkshire, Hampshire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, and Devon, lying intermediate between the Great Western, Bristol and Exeter, and London and South Western Railways, viz.:—the Reading, Basingstoke, and Hungerford Railway (Great Western), the Wilts and Somerset Railway, the Bristol and Exeter (Durston and Yeovil Branch), the Southampton and Dorchester Railway, the Basingstoke and Didcot Junction Railway (London and South Western), the London and South Western (Salisbury to Yeovil), the London and South Western (Hook-pit Deviation), the Salisbury, Dorchester, and Weymouth Railway; have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the Reading, Basingstoke, and Hungerford Railway (Great Western), the Wilts and Somerset Railway (subject to the condition of applying to Parliament in a future session for an improved line of communication towards Bath and Bristol), the Bristol and Exeter (Durston and Yeovil Branch), the Southampton and Dorchester Railway; and against the Basingstoke and Didcot Junction Railway (London and South Western), the London and South Western (Salisbury to Yeovil), the London and South Western (Hook-pit Deviation), the Salisbury, Dorchester, and Weymouth Railway. CAUTION! CAUTION!—TO THE PUBLIC.—No sooner is a Medicine well established in Public Favour, than a host of Imitators arise, who, for the sake of gain, not only wrong the Proprietors of the Genuine Medicine, but inflict a serious injury on the unwary purchaser of their base counterfeit trash. These observations apply with increased effect to the medicine which is now so well known as "PARR'S LIFE PILLS." This famous remedy has been established by undoubted proofs of its efficacy, and by a mass of Evidence and Testimonials which no other medicine ever yet called forth. These facts have had the effect of producing a very large sale—more than 15,000 boxes per week. When this large sale came to the knowledge of some unprincipled persons, who, for the sake of gain to themselves, and reckless of the injury it may do to others, are attempting to foist on the incautious various imitations, and in order that purchasers may be able to detect these frauds, care must be taken to look at the Government Stamp pasted round each box, and be sure it has the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS" in white letters on a red ground engraved therein, and forms part of the stamp; also that "T. ROBERTS and Co., Crane-court, Fleet-street," is printed with the directions wrapped round each

PANORAMA of the RIVER THAMES.—This Large and Splendid PRINT, varnished for Subscribers, and neatly mounted like a map, on black roller, 5s. 6d.; on mahogany roller, French polished, 7s. 6d. COUNTY FIRE OFFICE, 50, Regent-street, London, Jan. 1, 1845.
THE Directors of this Office beg to notify to all Persons whose Renewals became due at Christmas, that the 15 days allowed for payment expire on the 9th instant. They take the present opportunity of informing the Public that the Condition requiring the certificate of the Minister and Churchwardens, in cases of claims, has never been inserted in their Policies, and that it is their universal practice to indemnify parties suffering a loss by Fire, and insured in the County Fire Office, with promptitude and liberality.
J. A. BEAUMONT, Managing Director.

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are apprised that Agents continue to be appointed in London and Country Towns by the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, for the sale of their celebrated TEAS (Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate-street). They are packed in showy leaden canisters, from an ounce to a pound, with the prices and weight marked on each packet, and but little trouble is occasioned by the sale; the license is only 11s. per annum, and many, during the last nineteen years, have realised considerable incomes by the Agency, without 1s. let or loss. Application to be made (if by letter, post-paid, as above.

CHEAP SELF-SNUFFING CANDLES.—PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES, which burn without snuffing like the finest Wax, are now retailed throughout the country, at or under One Shilling per lb. But care must be taken to prevent any imitations being passed off as the Patent Candles; this attempt being made, and with too frequent success, by some Dealers, on account of the greater profit upon the imitations. The Trade may obtain them wholesale from EDWARD PRICE and Co., Belmont, Vauxhall, and PALMER and Co., Sutton-street, Clerkenwell

PALMER and CO.'S DECIMAL PALM CANDLES (10 to the lb.) give the light of Three ordinary Tallow Candles, require no snuffing, and can be used in any Candlestick. Sold by every Oilman, Grocer, &c., at 7½d. per lb.—It will be seen by the following statement of Mr. J. HAWKINS, at the late Meeting of the British Association, that these Candles are by far the cheapest light at present in use.—"With regard to PALMER'S and the common Dip,—when the latter was not snuffed oftener than about every ten minutes, it took four to be equal to one of the former; and when unsnuffed altogether, it required eleven pounds to be equal to one pound of PALMER'S. After alluding to further experiments with candles and also with oils, he concluded by recommending the self-snuffing candle in preference to oil."—See "Athenæum," Oct. 19, 1844.—PALMER and CO.'S Mid-size Lamps, and Candles of the same description as the above, may be had of all Ironmongers, Lamp Manufacturers, &c., in the kingdom.

SCENE FROM "THE CHIMES," AT THE ADELPHI THEATRE.

SCENE FROM THE DRAMA OF "THE CHIMES," AT THE ADELPHI THEATRE.

Our illustration is from the Second Quarter of this impressive drama—the scene that in which Trotty Veck having brought home Will Fern and Lilian, the orphan, joins his daughter Meg, in setting before them the hospitality of their humble home. We cannot do better than quote the original story, of which, indeed, the drama is a reflex:—

Trotty, in a breathless state, set the child down before his daughter in the middle of the floor. The little visitor looked once at Meg; and doubting nothing in that face, but trusting everything she saw there, ran into her arms.

"Here we are and here we go!" cried Trotty, running round the room and choking audibly. "Here! Uncle Will! Here's a fire you know! Why don't you come to the fire? Oh here we are and here we go! Meg, my precious darling, where's the kettle? Here it is and here it goes, and it'll bile in no time!"

Trotty really had picked up the kettle somewhere or other in the course of his wild career, and now put it on the fire: while Meg, seating the child in a warm corner, knelt down on the ground before her, and pulled off her shoes, and dried her wet feet on a cloth. Aye, and she laughed at Trotty too—so pleasantly, so cheerfully, that Trotty could have blessed her where she kneeled: for he had seen that, when they entered, she was sitting by the fire in tears.

MR. KEELEY, AS TOBY VECK, AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

"Why father!" said Meg, "You're crazy to-night, I think. I don' know what the Bells would say to that. Poor little feet. How cold they are!"

"Oh they're warmer now!" exclaimed the child. "They're quite warm now!"

"No, no, no," said Meg. "We haven't rubbed 'em half enough. We're so busy. So busy! And when they're done, we'll brush out the damp hair; and when that's done, we'll bring some colour to the poor pale face with fresh water; and when that's done we'll be so gay, and brisk, and happy—!"

The child, in a burst of sobbing, clasped her round the neck; caressed her fair cheek with its hand; and said, "Oh Meg! oh dear Meg!"

Toby's blessing could have done no more. Who could do more!

"Why father!" cried Meg, after a pause.

"Here I am, and here I go, my dear," said Trotty.

"Good Gracious me!" cried Meg. "He's crazy! He's put the dear child's bonnet on the kettle, and hung the lid behind the door!"

"I didn't go to do it, my love," said Trotty, hastily repairing this mistake. "Meg, my dear?"

Meg looked towards him and saw that he had elaborately stationed himself behind the chair of their male visitor, where with many mysterious gestures he was holding up the sixpence he had earned.

"I see, my dear," said Trotty, "as I was coming in, half an ounce of tea lying somewhere on the stairs; and I'm pretty sure there was a bit of bacon too. As I don't remember where it was, exactly; I'll go myself and try to find 'em."

With this "inscrutable artifice," Trotty withdraws to purchase the viands; the meal is prepared, and here is the joy of the little party—

Trotty's occupation was, to see Will Fern and Lilian eat and drink; and so was Meg's. And never did spectators at a city dinner or court banquet find such high delight in seeing others feast: although it were a monarch or a pope: as those two did, in looking on that night. Meg smiled at Trotty, Trotty laughed at Meg. Meg shook her head and made belief to clap her hands, applauding Trotty; Trotty conveyed, in dumb-show, unintelligible narratives of how and when and where he had found their visitors, to Meg; and they were happy. Very happy.

This is one of the most effective scenes in the homely drama: it has so many touches of domestic pathos—so much of everyday life—and is cleverly but naturally acted throughout. W. O. Smith, as Trotty, is an artistical portrait; Mr. Hudson, as Will Fern, is judiciously emphatic; and Miss Fortescue, as Meg, plays with a tenderness that gains upon the feelings of the audience.

We have engraved Mr. Keeley, as Toby Veck, in the version of "The Chimes," at the Lyceum Theatre: his personation of the simple ticket-porter is a well-sustained performance, more especially in the "here we come, here we go" business.

An American paper states that President Tyler and his lady are expected to visit England in May next.

The new dry dock at Alexandria, which has for some time been under construction, was opened on the 28th of November, with all the pomp usually attendant upon novel circumstances in the East, in the presence of Mohammed Ali.

A pension of £846 per annum reverts to the country by the death of the late Earl of Limerick, which he had enjoyed since the abolition of the office of the Clerk of the Crown and Hanaper, Ireland.

MRS. AND MR. KEELEY AS "VALENTINE AND ORSON."

Our pair of portraits is sketched from the new and successful burlesque at the Lyceum Theatre; the scene being that in which Valentine and Orson engage in "terrific combat." In the sketch is depicted the terror of the wild man at seeing his features reflected in the bright shield of the warrior prince. The incident, always a favourite one in the original melo-drama, tells in the burlesque: the action is very effective, and the libretto sparkles with pun and quaint allusion.

CHESS.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Our first and best acknowledgments are due to "A Lady," for her kind communication. It would render our task most pleasing, had we a few fair correspondents.

"A. B."—The game alluded to was finished as follows:—

Black.	White.
K to Q sq	Q to K B 7th ch
K to Q 2nd*	Q to K B 6th ch
K to Q sq	Q to K 6th ch
	Kt mates at K B 7th

 Black might have prolonged the game a few moves had he moved to his sq. The expression, "Mate in four moves," was apt to mislead: it should have been, "Mated in four moves."*

"S. R. C.," "Rusticus," "T. Burrow."—If the King moved to Q R 7th, instead of capturing Bishop, White could effect the mate in four moves—thus:—

White.	Black.
Bp to Q R sq	K to Q R 7th
Rook to Q Kt 4th	King moves
Kt to Q B 3rd	Pawn must move
Rook checkmates

The solution given in our paper is, in our opinion, quite as good as Mr. Burrow's. His humorous letter is the only communication we remember having received from him.

"Gambit."—The habit of always castling early in the game is injudicious, but not cowardly. The act of castling is very often a lost move.

"J. S."—Problem received.

"R. S. B."—White's best move is K Kt P 1 square, and on Black Queen moving to R 4th, either bring out K Kt to B 3rd, or play B to K 2nd; if Black Queen moves to K 2nd, or Q's square, White may play Q Kt to B 3.

"Aliquis."—Mr. Staunton is daily improving in health. The precise period when the next match will commence is not yet settled.

A few games played by M. St. Amant and Mr. S. have already been printed in our paper. One reason that St. Amant lost so many games in the commencement of the match was, that he relied too much on his intimate knowledge of the French game K P 1. He soon found, however, that Mr. Staunton was as well conversant with the attack and defence of that close game.

"T. Whittard."—A Pawn can only be captured en passant by a Pawn Hoyle's rule, as quoted, is absurdly worded.

"D. C."—Game and problem received.

We are glad to perceive that our last problem, No. 54, has occasioned some little trouble to our numerous correspondents. Out of nine solutions received, noess than five are incorrect.

Mr. Kling's problem is highly ingenious, and shall receive insertion as soon as we can find room for it.

FROM THE "CAMBRIDGE CHONICLE."—We have been favoured with the following interesting game, lately played blindfolded by a member of the Cambridge Chess Club. Black plays blindfolded, and gives Q's Rook.

The Solution in our next.

THE PRECINCTS OF WINDSOR CASTLE.—A question has arisen with respect to the claim set up by persons residing within the precincts of a Royal residence of a privilege from arrest. A few days ago a gentleman residing within the precincts of Windsor Castle, was taken in execution, by an officer of the Sheriff of Bucks, at the suit of Mr. Lawrence, for a debt of between £2000 and £3000, and taken to the county gaol, at Reading. The defendant caused a summons to be issued out, calling on the plaintiff and the sheriff to show cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of custody, upon the ground of the caption being illegal and a breach of privilege, having taken place within the verge of the Queen's palace. After hearing argument, Mr. Baron Rolfe dismissed the summons with costs, thereby establishing the legality of the arrest. In this case, however, the Lord Steward gave permission to have the writ executed, and, it is asserted, that without such permission, an arrest within the Royal precincts would still be illegal.

ACCIDENT ON THE NEWCASTLE AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.—The course of this line has been suddenly interrupted by the falling in of the tunnel between the Riding-mill and Corbridge stations. It appears the company were engaged in widening the tunnel in order to form a double line of railway, it having been originally made single in this part, and the shores put in having been insufficient to support the superincumbent mass, it fell in suddenly on Saturday last, only a few minutes after the passage of a train. Fortunately no lives were lost, but the injury to the works is so great as completely to interrupt the traffic on the line.

TRAGICAL EVENTS AT YORK.—Considerable excitement has been occasioned in York by the awful deaths of two persons of the name of Coultate, a mother and her son. The son was a young man, in the situation of a groom, and it was suspected that he had been poisoned by some one having mixed a large quantity of laudanum with his ale, in a low public-house. From the evidence of the medical men, however, it appeared that the deceased had died from the effects of a severe injury on the head, which might have been of two or three days' standing, and no trace of laudanum was discoved in his stomach. The same night that the deceased was taken home, the mother, who was seventy years of age, was so much shocked by the death of her son, from poison, as she supposed, that in about an hour she herself expired. The jury returned a verdict that she had "Died from excessive grief, and the shock occasioned by the melancholy death of her son, John Coultate."

MORE COLLIERY EXPLOSIONS.—The Gurney pit, Black Boy, near Bishop Auckland, exploded in the waste, two P.M., on Monday week, and eleven (one local paper says twelve, and another twenty) men and boys were severely burnt—some of them dangerously. One man, named Thomas James, died within twenty-four hours; and a lad was hardly expected to recover. All the others were considered out of danger. Upwards of a hundred individuals were at work at the time of the explosion, which was caused by a fall of the roof in the pillar workings. Mr. Forster, of Haswell, is the viewer. An inquest has been held at Coundon, by William Trotter, Esq., and adjourned.

REVENUE AND TAXATION.

TO PART of the policy of the present Government has been more successful than its finance. Sir R. Peel succeeded to office with an immense deficiency in the Revenue, as compared with expenditure, and at the present moment, his Chancellor of the Exchequer is rejoicing in a large surplus, and the question is being raised of what taxes the Ministry can afford to take off, not of what imposts their necessities will compel them to put on. This result the friends of the party in power attribute to the ability and skill of the Premier; his opponents assert that good luck has had as much to do with it as good management. Neither assertion is wholly correct, for the truth seems to be that both ability and good fortune have co-operated. The Minister called on the nation for extra exertion, at a time when it had become absolutely necessary; and the effort the nation has made has been seconded by two good harvests, and a revival of trade and commerce, which had for some time been depressed. The last years of the official existence of the Whigs were years of embarrassment, from which no Government could have saved the country. America was convulsed, England was suffering, our people were unemployed, masses of them, indeed, in a state bordering on insurrection. This state of things continued during the first year and a half of the present Government, and without the two better harvests, the revival of the Foreign Trade, and the consequent employment of the people, even the Property-tax would not have saved us from public distress. It must always be borne in mind that the improved condition of the people is the greatest, best, and surest cause of an increased Revenue; a Property Tax has only got to be levied with a sufficiently strong application of the "screw," and a surplus Revenue may always be obtained, even if we had a war on our hands, as we have had ere now. A mere surplus of Revenue, then, is not an infallible index of national prosperity. It depends entirely on the sources from which that Revenue comes, whether it can be taken as a test of this kind or not.

It is for this reason we so heartily congratulate the country on the last Revenue returns. There is increase in every department; not merely in those of direct taxation, in which a Minister may always have an increase, if he has boldness enough to impose it, to a large amount, and exact it with sufficient severity, or (which is, of course, understood) can procure the authority of Parliament to do so. The Executive has powerful machinery in its hands, and can always make the people pay, but cannot compel them to consume. This is regulated on quite another principle. The Assessed Taxes might be raised in amount, and the Property Tax might be made fourteenpence in the pound instead of sevenpence; and those who had the property could not escape the contribution. But no power can make a people consume more tea, or more sugar, or import more tax-paying articles from abroad than they are able to buy; an increase in these departments of the Revenue is an unfailing proof of an improved condition in the masses of the people, and that increase the present returns exhibit; as we before said, we congratulate the public on the fact. We trust we have entered on a cycle of prosperous years; and, blessed with a continuance of peace, it is scarcely doubtful that the Revenue will again be supplied in the manner which, in a time of peace, it ought to be—by the ability of the people to use not only the necessaries that merely support life, but the luxuries that add comfort to it.

That this ability is returning has been evident, from the Revenue returns of the three quarters preceding the one just ended; and the present return affords a still stronger proof of it. The increase in the Customs for the year is £1,300,000; in the Excise, £350,000, over the year preceding: the people have spent thus much more money than has found its way to the Exchequer, it being, of course, necessary that they should first have it to spend. The power of gaining this fund, from the expenditure of which so much public and social good is derived, should be the object of every statesman to secure to the people.

As the Revenue of the State now exceeds the demands on it, the Government will be pressed for a remission of Taxation. Every class represented in Parliament has its "favourite aversion" in the shape of a Tax which it will be greatly for the public interest and their own to have removed. The Agriculturists will try hard to get rid of the Malt Tax, against which they have been labouring for years: meetings have already been held to resolve on pressing the question in the ensuing session. But the amount raised by it is so large, that, even with the Income Tax, it could not be spared; and, without it, must be retained from the sheer impossibility of laying on a Tax equally productive anywhere else. Some of the Assessed Taxes—the Window Tax for instance—might be taken off with advantage; for they are unpopular, troublesome to pay and to receive, and not very productive after all. Our Import Duties might be revised with safety, as a reduction in them is by no means synonymous with loss to the Revenue, increased consumption at the lower rate soon making up any temporary deficiency, and bringing the produce of the tax up to the old amount, or even beyond it. The enormously high duties on tobacco, for instance, are defeating themselves; they encourage smuggling, injure the fair trader, deteriorate the article, and are introducing extensive frauds into the trade in it. The duty on tea used to be levied on the ad valorem principle; for some reason this plan was given up, and the tax is now uniform. The consequence is, the poor consumer is taxed much more highly than the rich one: the best qualities of tea pay far less in proportion to their price than the inferior kinds. Taxes on the raw material imported to be used by us in manufactures have been pronounced bad in principle by Sir Robert Peel; and it is more than probable he will take advantage of the favourable state of things to take them off altogether, especially as the amount raised by them is not so large as to admit no possibility of being made up in another direction.

Against all these taxes there will be some kind of agitation in Parliament and out of it; and, as Ministries seldom err on the side of too great a readiness to make reductions, those who expect many of them run the risk of being disappointed. But one tax there is, the continuance of which will create universal dissatisfaction. The Income Tax was imposed from necessity, which, happily, no longer existing, the tax itself may surely be suffered to cease at the period the Act fixes for its expiration. This is the first question to be settled by the Budget of the year: if it should be thought necessary to keep the machinery of the Act together in readiness for future emergencies, at least the tax may be reduced in amount, and some distinction drawn between real property—which is safe, certain, and transferable from generation to generation—and the income made by professional exertions, which is as variable as individual talent, and as uncertain as death and disease, either of which can destroy what is wealth to-day by paralysing to-morrow both the skilful hand and the busy brain that directed it. There is nothing fairer or more just than a Tax on Property; but to lay the same amount on the income created by skill only, is to create a manifest inequality, which we know has acted oppressively, and will continue to do so as long as the tax remains as at present fixed. The time has arrived for a readjustment of it, and we trust it will be effected with all the prudence of a wise statesman, and with some of the generosity of a just one.

GREAT "DEMOCRATIC" MASS MEETING AT NEW YORK.

THIS is an imposing demonstration of one of the old parties in New York—"the Democrats"—whose conduct, according to the New York Herald, has given rise to "a new organisation of the people, having for its basis a mixture of good sense, religion, practical utility, and some small portions of intolerance and folly." "The movement," states this journal, "originated singularly enough within the bosom of the democratic party, and grew out of the tampering of the democratic leaders with a certain portion of naturalised citizens who happened to be banded together in consequence of their being born in Ireland. The 'native' portion of the democratic party saw, year after year, little beggarmen rising up, hunting after the Irish vote, sometimes for one purpose and sometimes for another, and began to doubt the policy of such conduct. And then, very naturally, when, on a certain occasion, Bishop Hughes and the Irish attempted to exercise a direct control in the political affairs of the country, these native democrats broke away, and formed the nucleus of the 'native' party. This movement, then, took its rise in the abuses perpetrated by 'native' leaders of the democratic ranks; but it has grown and thriven by an appeal to the general feeling of certain classes belonging to all parties, and may be now justly regarded as embracing within its limits the great masses of the two old parties in this city. Among the democrats, so far as regards the local ticket here, there is a strong spirit of disaffection already, particularly in relation to the exclusion of the Bible from certain schools."

Our Illustration shows one of the Mass Meetings of this party—the Democrats—in the Park, with Tammany Hall in the distance splendidly illuminated. The night was dark, and the rain was pouring down, notwithstanding which, showers of rockets, serpents, and Roman candles were fired from the hustings, where the speaker is surrounded by boys holding torches; another orator, on the pavement, is similarly attended. At the moment chosen by our Artist, a great procession, with music, banners, &c., was passing before the hustings.

At page 20 will be found Illustrations of the great gatherings of the two other parties in New York—the "Natives" and the "Whigs:" all from laborious and very minute sketches by our Artist at New York.

Our Correspondent assures us that it is scarcely possible for pen or pencil to convey an idea of the wild oriental beauty of these Park Meetings. Two Drummond lights shed a silvery radiance over the congregated thousands; Roman candles ascended perpendicularly from the City Hall, and rockets from the three different hustings; while, glittering through the dark trunks of the trees, and winding its mazy way through the dense crowd, a fairy-like procession of countless banners and lanterns gave an indescribable air of enchantment to the whole.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Of all melancholy events, perhaps none can surpass in poignancy that of seeing a man in the zenith of his power and glory, and charged with the interests of thousands, struck with mental aberration.

It is but two years since that the excellent Baron Maltzhan (the father of Lady Beauvale), the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Prussia, experienced such a dread visitation.

The case of M. Villemain, which has just occurred, is still more lamentable. Those who have become acquainted with French literature—not through its modern novels and other impure sources, but through the classical channels—are aware that M. Villemain is the Quintillian of France. Never was his pen dipped in gall or impurity; the greatest critic of France, his powers of oratory have likewise had no drawback but the hesitation of a taste difficult to satisfy—of one who would give no utterance to aught that could wound either the ear, the judgment, or the feelings of his auditors. His double talents, as writer and orator—the estimation in which M. Villemain was held as a man—led to his being gradually withdrawn from his first career of literature—soon he was beheld a Minister of State, although possessing no influence, and utterly no fortune, but his abilities. Disappointed, like so many other men are, in his first affection, M. Villemain married the accomplished daughter of a general, a lady also without fortune. After giving birth to three daughters, this lady gradually betrayed symptoms more and more marked of mental hallucination. The husband, loth to believe the terrible truth, humoured her caprices, and strove to appease her outbursts; and long after the complaint had taken the most formidable aspect, he refused to have recourse to the seclusion and coercion which, at last, became imperatively necessary. The arduous duties of his office was the refuge in which this great literary character found, for a time, partial oblivion for his bereavement; but this solace was ordained to cease. The Project of Law for Instruction, in France, caused the last parliamentary season, which agitated all educated classes, and was destined to be re-produced this season, rested entirely upon M. Villemain's responsibility. All parties, in the meantime, and particularly the Jesuits, assailed him, and worked upon his sensitive feelings and his conscience, and with such baneful effect, that, a few days since, he suddenly became the prey of mental alienation—another example how nearly allied to madness is genius. His malady has reached the utmost bounds; and now, it is hoped, he will become daily more placable, and ultimately recover. In the meantime, without the least fortune, burthened with a wife, herself insane, his only solace are three daughters, on whom the misfortune of their parents will ever weigh most heavily. The Duchess de Cazes is going to take charge of the children; and the State will do its duty, it is to be hoped, towards so great and glorious a member of the commonwealth. But still the case is one of the most painful interest to all who love genius and literature. To show the source of M. de Villemain's aberration, I must state that, when he leapt out of window a few days since, he called out that the Jesuits were pursuing him; he refused to take food for three days running, imagining that the followers of Ignatius Loyola were tampering with his food, as destining him to the same premature fate as the amiable Pope Ganganelli, and the philosopher Emperor Joseph II. But he has lucid intervals: he told his attendants that they had been right to prevent his access to his shaving apparatus and razors; and soon after he exclaimed in a tone that moved all present to tears, "Alas! my three poor children, with a mad father, and a mad mother!"

Let us now turn to a more pleasing topic. Balls are beginning to be more frequent here, and society is taking a brighter aspect. The Countess d'Appony has fixed on Monday as her day of receptions, and she gives every week a ball or a rout. The Wednesday is engrossed by Madame Pazzo; the Sunday evenings by the Sardinian Embassy, where the Ambassadress, Madame de Brignolles, enchants every one by her graceful hospitality. The Bavarian Embassy will soon give soirées dansantes every Wednesday. Nothing would be better adapted to promote the sociability and ease which form the charm of Parisian society than this habit of receptions on a particular day, which extends also to morning visits. By this means, instead of the tediousness of a round of calls—in which, as I have often heard your fair countrywomen say, you always miss the persons you most wish to see, and find yourselves tête à tête with those who are almost strangers—you are not only sure of finding your friends at home, but also meet all your acquaintance at the house you visit. Besides the soirées I have already mentioned. Mrs. Tudor has commenced her balls for the season with great brilliancy.

Much anxious expectation is excited amongst our belles, by a projected fancy ball at the house of the Baroness Delmar, in which they are to appear in the costumes of the Court of Queen Anne. The Ministers will also, it is expected, perform their part in the festivities of the season. Amongst the diplomatic réunions, one of the most brilliant will, probably, be the fête of the President Sauzet, which he was prevented giving last year by the death of his father. The splendid rooms of the Duke de Nemours are being fitted up with great magnificence, in preparation for the Court balls, which will this year be given by the future Regent, instead of the King, to whom these ceremonies are becoming too fatiguing. The receptions, however, at Court have been very brilliant. Amongst all the foreign costumes, the one which excited the most attention was a Highland uniform, worn with scrupulous accuracy by a Scotch lion, Mr. M—— G——. The toilettes of the ladies were surpassingly splendid. Madame Liaderès wore a satin dress covered with lace, of such peculiar magnificence, as to attract the attention of one of the Princesses, who complimented her upon it. At a short distance from her stood Madame Lebon, who had returned to the fashion of our grandmothers, her hair being covered by a light powder. The beautiful Duchess d'Istrie and her sister, the Countess de la Ferronaye, dressed one in pink, the other in light green velvet, attracted all eyes, both by their personal charms and the fantastic contrast of their costumes. None of the ladies present, however, equalled, in the splendour of her diamonds, your fair countrywoman, the Marchioness of Aylesbury: she was literally covered with them. Her dress was in blue velvet, trimmed with guipure. Much interest was created by the youthful Duchess d'Aumale, on whose arm the Queen leant, as she presented her to the more favoured of her guests. The hair of the Royal bride is of that peculiar yellow, or rather golden tint, which is so uncommon in southern climates. The Queen wore on her shoulders a splendid Moorish scarf, exquisitely embroidered in gold, silver, and purple silk.

By-the-by, letters received from Washington bring a brilliant account of the prospects of the season, under the auspices of Mrs. Polk, the pretty and graceful wife of the new President. The fair Presidentess, who has the greatest love for the pleasures of society, will, it is expected, bring back the days of the cheerful and sociable hospitality of Mrs. Maddison, which rendered the society of Washington so attractive.

The rumours afloat concerning the change of Ministry, must have, ere this, reached you; and you have, perhaps, also heard the report that the King himself had taken a secret part in the intrigues practised against the Cabinet, in the idea that a new Ministry might have greater success in bringing forward the law for the dotation of the Duke de Nemours.

This report, which appears to be perfectly false, originated in the fact that M. Edmond Blanc, a Deputy and Inspector of the Civil List, having just lost his very lucrative situation, attempted to revenge himself by intriguing against the Cabinet; and some of these wiseacres found out in this a deep-laid scheme, fostered by the King himself. Louis Philippe, however, put an end to all doubt on the subject, by his cordial reception of M. Belleyme, and his expression of disapprobation of those dupes or intriguants who presumed to doubt his sincerity. The word intriguants faithfully reported to MM. Thiers and Molé, has caused the greatest irritation.

One of the literary novelties which at this moment creates most interest, is a curious "Histoire Intime," of the reign of Charles I., by M. Philarète Charles, a Professor of the College de France. This melancholy page of history, utterly exhausted, as regards the narration of public events, yet required, to fill up the picture, a fuller detail of minute circumstances, and of those trivialities which, although they escape the notice of the general historian, may be often traced as the causes of the greatest and most important events.

The high court of judicature, Cour Royale, in which such dire contention took place last year, between the Judges and the body of lawyers practising in the court, has become, once more, the scene of discord. The numerous officers of the Crown, in the former quarrel, had been the arbitrators, and had brought the belligerents to terms of peace; but the lawyers have not forgotten that their royal brethren had inclined towards the Judges, and they seized the first opportunity of a revenge. The Court is now discussing and preparing the law of prison discipline, and whatever the law officers and King's Counsel propose is at once contradicted and negatived by the remainder of the body. Hence, heart-burnings and gnashing of teeth.

The courts of justice are the theatres whose performances are the most sedulously and most eagerly attended.

The trial of M. de Maupas for assassination has been a choice performance.

The conjugal fraças witnessed by the public, betwixt an opulent sculptor and his beautiful wife, was expected to afford great recreation to the fair and fashionable frequenters of the law courts; but the application made by the husband was only for separation, and no defence was made; so the affair terminated without the expected treat to the lovers of scandal.

To compensate for this disappointment, a gentleman of great repute for his handsome person, agreeable manners, and witty conversation, and moving in literary and fashionable society, will very shortly undergo his trial for being connected with a most dangerous band of robbers.

As to myself, I consider Paris as the choice abode of infallible novelty, and that an earthquake would take place, if all other means of creating a sensation had ceased to exist.

FRANCE.

The great topic of interest and discussion in Paris is the position of the Ministry, and, as may well be imagined, very different views are promulgated.

The Ministerial papers express their confidence that they will have a majority on the Address; whilst the Opposition press asserts that many Conservatives have joined their ranks.

The Presse states confidently, that, on the three great questions which must necessarily be discussed during the debate on the Address in the Chamber of Deputies—viz. 1st, the right of search; 2nd, the occupation of Tahiti; 3rd, the treaty with Morocco—the majority of the Chamber has never been in perfect accord with the present Ministers.

According to the Siècle, M. Guizot is himself persuaded of his inability to avert the threatened overthrow of his Cabinet. That paper goes on to observe:—

"The Ministers, in order to gain time to reduce the refractory Conservatives to obedience, had proposed to retard as much as possible the debate on the Address. The examination of the documents with respect to the treaty with Morocco and the affair of Tahiti might have afforded a pretext for an adjournment, if M. Guizot had not taken care to select the documents to be laid before the Chambers. It was likewise suggested that time might be gained by calling on the Chamber to occupy itself immediately with the examination of the Budget, which was distributed to the Deputies on Monday. We advise the Ministers if ever they entertained such an idea, to abandon it. It is not the custom of the Chamber to commence its labours until the existence of the Ministry shall have been established, provisionally at least, by the vote on the Address. If the Minister is of opinion that the debate on the regular business of the Chamber is about to commence at too late a period, he has two legitimate modes of remedying the inconvenience. The first is, by advancing the opening of the session; the second, by hastening the debates, which ought to terminate by the judgment of the majority."

On Monday, the Committee of the Chamber of Deputies on the Address held a meeting, at which M. Guizot gave some explanations as to his foreign policy, which, according to the Débats, were very satisfactory; but, according to the Constitutionnel, were so much the reverse, that the Committee insisted upon having further papers laid before them, which M. Guizot promised to do.

Admiral Dupetit Thouars received, on Tuesday, the deputation charged to offer him the sword of honour. The Admiral thanked them for their good intentions, but refused this mark of public sympathy, declaring that he had done nothing but obey the orders of his Government, and that it was for it to blame or recompense him.

The illness of M. Villemain continued to excite great sympathy in Paris, and we are happy to find that the Débats entertains great hopes of his recovery. That paper says:—

"It is with the liveliest sentiment of interest that the public inquires after the health of M. Villemain, and indulges in the hope of soon seeing this eminent man, as elevated by the qualities of his heart as by the faculties of his mind, restored to health, to the blessings of repose, to the consolations which he found in his children, and to the literary works which have rendered him illustrious. The misfortune which strikes a great citizen is a public grief, and on this ground no person could meet with more sympathy in all ranks of society than the eloquent professor, whose language and knowledge have so long charmed and instructed youth, whose writings have so much contributed to disseminate and maintain a noble style of writing, and who, after having served with glory the cause of education and literature, devoted himself with so much sincerity to the defence of our institutions and our liberties. We are convinced that so fine an organisation, fatigued for a moment by so many struggles and so much occupation, will eventually triumph over the accidents which we all lament so deeply; and we learn with the greatest satisfaction that already the calm and intelligent cares with which he is surrounded have notably ameliorated the state of the illustrious patient."

It was understood that Count Molé would, in the debate on the address, repel the attack made on him in the Ministerial journals, of having been "at the head of an intrigue."

The Commerce announces that the French Government has concluded a second treaty of commerce with the Belgian Government. The object of this treaty is to extend the period for admitting Belgian linen cloth and thread into France at a reduced duty, the existing treaty having but two years to run.

SPAIN.

It appears by the letters from Madrid of the 1st inst., that the meeting of the Chamber of Deputies had been again postponed until the 6th, to afford M. Mon time to terminate the Budget and mature his financial plans. The reports of modifications in the Ministry had nearly subsided. The Minister of Finance had ordered the officers of his department to collect all the materials necessary to prepare a new Customs' tariff. The accounts received from all parts of the country were of a favourable nature, the most perfect tranquillity prevailing everywhere.

It was reported in Madrid that accounts had been received there of the safe arrival in Portugal of General Zurbano. He was escorted to the frontier by strong parties of contrabandistas, who relieved each other alternately from post to post; and who faithfully performed their engagement to conduct him safely out of the Spanish territory, notwithstanding the immense reward they knew they were sure of if they had betrayed him to the Government.

El Castellano announces that Major-General Shelley had been appointed Captain-General of Catalonia, and would be succeeded in the government of Seville by General Warleta, the temporary commander of the province.

PORTUGAL.

We hear from Lisbon, under date of the 31st of December, that the Cortes were to be opened on the 2nd of January by the Queen in person. In the meantime, Costa Cabral has made a new batch of eight peers, of which he himself is one, the others being—1. His colleague of Foreign Affairs, Gomez de Castro; 2. Piemental Freire; 3. F. Caldeira Pinto Leitno; 4. Don Carlos de Mascarenhas, Commander of the Municipal Guard, and brother to the Marquis de Fronteira; 5. Don Manuel de Portugal: 6. Baron de Vargem; and, 7. Count Sabugal. Of the eight new peers, only one, M. Pimentel Freire, has been taken from the Lower House, excepting, of course, the two Ministers, who were both members of it. To fill up the vacancies thus left, new elections will be proceeded with, though it is scarcely worth while to take that trouble, as the ensuing session will be the last of the Chamber of Deputies; and three votes will not be missed out of the large majority which the Government can command in it.

Another monster company, with a paper capital of 40,000 contos, about eleven millions sterling, was in process of formation. Zurbano was said to have been in Portugal, and to have found means of leaving that country.

UNITED STATES.

By the packet-ship St. Patrick, which arrived at Liverpool, New York papers have been received to the 18th ult. The news they communicate is important. There have been some rather serious abolition riots in Ohio, originating with slave-owners, and a struggle on the part of some negroes to escape from bondage, the latter being aided by a party of American Abolitionists.

A paper published at Georgetown, near Cincinnati, in Ohio, gives an account of the riot as occurring between some Kentucky negro-hunters and a number of Abolitionists residing in the Red Oak settlement. The runaway negroes had been secreted in the houses of Robert Miller and Absalom King.

Miller's house was searched, and two of the slaves discovered, who attempted to escape, and while Miller was in the act of aiding in their escape, he was knocked down and stabbed repeatedly by the incensed Kentuckians. He lingered but a few moments and died. The two slaves were then bound, when they proceeded to the house of King, where they were met by four or five armed men, who declared their determination to resist any search of the house. Both parties being well armed, a horrible conflict ensued. A son of Colonel Towers was killed immediately. King, while reloading some of the fire-arms in the house, was shot by some one through the window, in the back part of the house, and was not expected to survive. The sheriff and his posse arrived and checked the riot, and the ringleaders of each party were arrested.

But another band of Kentuckians soon arrived, and commenced another scene of bloodshed. One of the slaves was hung without ceremony, for resisting a brother of Colonel Towers, who had captured him. The houses of Miller and King were burned to the ground, with all their contents. They then went to the house of Mr. Alexander Gilliland, tore him away from his family, and beat him until his life was despaired of.

The Telegraph says, "The number of the Kentuckians is increasing hourly, and the whole neighbourhood is up in arms."

The Washington Constitution says, a report has reached Washington that Mexico has closed her ports against the United States. No other paper, however, mentions such a rumour.

The proceedings in Congress on the 16th were important. The House of Representatives has suspended the ordinary rules, in order to permit Mr. Duncan to introduce a bill for the extension of the United States jurisdiction over the Oregon territory. This is, in point of fact, giving permission to this gentleman to introduce a bill for American occupation of the country in dispute.

Objections were started to the introduction of the bill, and a division of the house took place on a motion to suspend the rules, and the votes stood 129 against 53. Accordingly the rules were suspended, and the bill reported, and read a first and second time, and referred over to the Territories Committee.

The New York Herald mentions a rumour that the French have taken possession of the islands of Wallace and Fortuna.

The Americans in the Oregon Territory have formed themselves a Government, elected executive and legislative officers, and established courts of justice.

The annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of American finances has been presented to Congress. It is a very lengthy document, occupying five closely printed columns of the New York papers. It sets out with a long dissertation on the subject of the public faith, which Americans must look upon as a capital sort of joke, seeing how wholly at variance the recommendation of head-quarters is with the actual conduct of the people.

It states the public debt to be 24.745,188 dollars. The resources of the United States for revenue in the public lands are dwelt upon, and it is proposed to anticipate the redemption of the United States Stock. The report does not recommend any immediate reduction of the tariff. It suggests a general revision and reduction, and leaves time for obtaining such information as may allow the change to be made wisely, considerately, and gradually.

The receipts of the late fiscal year are stated at 30,381,000 dollars. The balance in the Treasury, 12th of January, 1842, was 10,424,507 dollars, making a total of 40,818,287 dollars.

The expenditure of the fiscal year was 32,958,827 dollars. The balance in the treasury is, therefore, 7,857.379 dollars.

A resolution was also carried inquiring the amount of the public debt of Texas. It was remarked by the introducer of the resolution, that if Texas was brought into the Union, it would be expedient to assume her debt.

Private letters from the best sources of information speak of the late differences between Mexico and the United States, as being mere bluster on both sides, and that there is little chance of any war growing out of it. As usual, the American papers are making the most of it, and all sorts of ridiculous rumours are being propagated.

In regard to the annexation of Texas, the accounts agree that there is no immediate chance of its success. There are now two bills before Congress providing for the annexation; one introduced by Mr. M'Duffie, the other offered by Mr. Benton.

The papers contain the message of Governor Ford, of the state of Illinois. It is confined almost entirely to the local affairs of the State, and contains very little encouragement to the holders of Illinois Bonds to hope that they will ever receive their due. The debt of the State is represented as still increasing.

The commercial news is unimportant. There is no alteration to notice in the rates of uncurrent money. There was rather more inquiry for cotton, and prices were a little firmer. The Stock Market was flat, and prices generally ranged a trifle lower than noted in previous quotations.

Exchange was firm, but with a limited demand.

Bills on England, 110 to 110¼; on Paris, Five per Cents, 21½ to 22½.

SPEECH OF THE PRESIDENT ELECT

The Nashville Union, of the 30th December, gives the following report of a speech delivered by the President elect, Colonel Polk, on the previous day, on the occasion of his reception at Nashville. In reply to an address from Mr. Nicholson, he rose and spoke as follows:—

"I return to you, sir, and to my fellow-citizens, whose organ you are, my unfeigned thanks for this manifestation of the popular regard and confidence, and for the congratulations which you have been pleased to express to me, upon the termination and result of the late political contest. I am fully sensible that those congratulations are not, and cannot be, personal to myself. It is the eminent success of our common principles which has spread such general joy over the land. The political struggle through which the country has just passed has been deeply exciting. Extraordinary causes have existed to make it so. It has terminated—it is now over; and I sincerely hope and believe has been decided by the sober and settled judgment of the American people.

"In exchanging mutual congratulations with each other upon the result of the late election, the Democratic party should remember, in calmly reviewing the contest, that the portion of fellow-citizens who have differed with us in opinion, have equal rights with ourselves; that minorities as well as majorities are entitled to the full and free exercise of their opinions and judgments; and that the rights of all, whether of minorities or majorities, as such are entitled to equal respect and regard.

"In rejoicing, therefore, over the success of the Democratic party, and of their principles in the late election, it should be in no spirit of exultation over the defeat of our opponents; but it should be because, as we honestly believe, our principles and policy are better calculated than theirs to promote the true interests of the country.

"In the position in which I have been placed, by the voluntary and unsought suffrages of my fellow-citizens, it will become my duty, as it will be my pleasure, faithfully and truly to represent, in the executive department of the Government, the principles and policy of the great party of the country who have elevated me to it; but, at the same time, it is proper that I should declare that I shall not regard myself as the representative of a party only, but of the whole people of the United States; and I trust that the future policy of the Government may be such as to secure the happiness and prosperity of all, without distinction of party."

THE WEST INDIES.

The Forth, West India mail steamer, has arrived with the following dates:—Tampico, Nov. 22; Vera Cruz, Dec. 1; Havannah, Dec. 10; Honduras, Nov. 21; Jamaica, Dec. 9; Carthagena, Nov. 21; Demerara, Dec. 4; Trinidad, Nov. 26; Barbadoes, Nov. 9: Grenada, Nov. 18; St. Thomas, Nov. 15; La Guayra, Nov. 21; and Bermuda, Dec. 21.

One very unfavourable piece of intelligence is given, viz., the occurrence of several instances of incendiarism.

The weather is described as having been extremely favourable for the crops.

In Barbadoes the rains had been abundant, and the weather was, at the departure of the mail, fine and fair. The planters were well pleased, and the weather was considered favourable.

The Forth brought 24 passengers, 117,000 dollars, £14,000 in gold' 2437 oz. of gold dust, and doubloons 10,414 oz.; 43 lb. of platina, £600 value in pearls, 22 serons of jalap, and 19 of cochineal.

MEXICO.

The West India steamer the Forth has brought important intelligence from Mexico. It confirms that previously received by way of New York, and published in the papers of that city. General Paredes had taken up his quarters at Largos. He is described as about fifty years of age, of determined valour, and very popular in all parts of the country; notwithstanding, it is generally admitted he is not likely to hold the reins of Government for a long period. He has already lowered the import and export duties to 50 per cent. in those States on the western coast which have pronounced in his favour. He has also taken off the contributions for the impending war with Texas—a measure that had given great satisfaction. General Paredes's army consists of about 2500 men, only one thousand of whom are old soldiers, the rest being raw recruits, many of whom enlisted as volunteers. He has only five pieces of cannon, and those are of small calibre. Santa Anna's troops, on the contrary, consist of about 10,000 men, principally infantry, with a small proportion of cavalry, and 30 pieces of ordnance. It is, however, much doubted whether the troops will remain firm to him, especially on going into action, although he has taken the precaution of making them swear allegiance. Otherwise, with this overwhelming force, it is likely that Santa Anna will succeed in defeating General Paredes. He marched with his troops toward Lagos just before the Forth sailed, and the report prevalent there was that General Paredes, hearing of his approach, had made a retrogade movement.

The state of Guanaxuata had not declared for either party; it is a very important one in comparison to the others, and the fate of Santa Anna will much depend upon its declaration for or against the revolution.

This revolution may be considered as the most popular that has ever broken out in Mexico. The whole country, to a voice, is in favour of it; and in case of a failure on the part of Santa Anna in his attack on General Paredes, an important change will take place.

THE BRAZILS.

H.M.S. [illegible] Commander Lewis commander, has arrived at Falmouth with the English mail from Rio de Janeiro. Her dates are to the 11th and [illegible] Rio the 20th of November. There is no news of particular importance by this conveyance. Matters remaining in statu quo at the latest dates. At Monte Video there had been some little outbreak of the [illegible] party, to check which a new President, Signor Lopez Gomez, and a considerable number of troops, had been dispatched in the Rosario corvette, two brigantines, and two steamers, and it was calculated the province would be speedily pacified.

The English brig John Dalton, from Sydney, was driven on shore in gale of wind on Cape Negro, 16th of November, and the mails, which were transmitted next day to Rio Janeiro, are brought to England by the Crane. Her Majesty's ships, Frolic, Viper, and Spider were ordered to proceed to render assistance, and by the latest accounts ere the Crane sailed, the vessel was expected to be got off with little damage. A lady passenger, reported to be called Stevens or Stevenson, had been unfortunately drowned.

The treaty with England closed on Nov. 11, without any particular demonstration or show of feeling; it was remarked that every facility had been afforded by the Government for the clearance of goods, prior to the operation of the new tariff. The election returns were decidedly favourable to the Government. Politically there appears to be nothing new.

POLICE.

TOO LOVING BY HALF.—At MARLBOROUGH-STREET, on Monday, Ann Nunn, a well-dressed woman, between thirty and forty years of age, possessing no very remarkable attractions, was charged with having importuned William Simmons, tailor, of No. 200, Oxford-street, with so much pertinacity as to create a serious annoyance to himself and an obstruction to his business. From the statement of Mr. Simmons, it appeared that the female laboured under the delusion that he intended, or else that he ought, to marry her. She constantly presented herself at his shop, conjuring him, in the most pathetic way, to accede to her matrimonial proposition. It was in vain that he appealed to the police to take her away. She was no sooner free from the constable than she ran back and repeated her unwelcome solicitations.—Mr. Maltby asked the complainant if anything had occurred to sanction the defendant's delusion?—Mr. Simmons declared that no promise on his part, nor any familiarity, could warrant the female's conduct. The only way in which he could account for the infatuation was by supposing that the defendant was not quite right in her head.—The defendant, who appeared to be quite absorbed by her attachment, said, in a low voice, that the complainant would not call upon her, so she was obliged to call upon him. He had promised to marry her a twelvemonth ago, and she was resolved that he should not dally with her any longer.—Mr. Maltby: Unless you promise to keep away from the complainant's shop, I must order you to find bail.—Defendant: I'll keep away—not unless he promises to come and see me.—The complainant declared there was no truth in the assertion that he had promised the defendant marriage.—Mr. Maltby thought the father of the defendant ought to be required to restrain his daughter's behaviour, and he should, therefore, advise the constable to take her to her home and leave her in the charge of her friends.—Police-constable English took the defendant to her father's, a tailor, in Windmill-street, but very soon afterwards returned with both daughter and father, in consequence of the daughter having, as soon as relieved from custody, made her way once more to the complainant's shop in Oxford-street.—The father said he was quite at a loss to account for the infatuation of his daughter. She was sane on all points, except as far as regarded her matrimonial passion for the complainant. The origin of his daughter's attachment was from the circumstance of her having worked as waistcoat-maker in the same shop where the complainant was formerly employed.—After some expostulation, the defendant gave a half promise that she would not go to the shop in Oxford-street again. The complainant quitted the court. The defendant, on being released, was observed to break away from her friends and to follow the complainant.

THE ATROCIOUS OFFENCE OF GOUGING.—At QUEEN-SQUARE, on Monday, William Woodham, a plumber and glazier, living in Ellis-street, Chelsea, was charged with a ferocious assault upon Benjamin Williams, a gentleman's servant. It appeared from the statement of the complainant, whose left eye was in a dreadfully inflamed state, that, on Friday last he went into the Woodman, in Doyley-street, Chelsea, with two friends, and while they were drinking some gin-and-water defendant came up, and, without the slightest provocation, nudged complainant's elbow intentionally, and spilt some of the liquor. Complainant took no notice of this the first time, but, on its being repeated immediately afterwards, endeavoured to fling the remainder of the gin-and-water at defendant. Defendant then attacked him with great fury, and complainant defended himself as well as he could. They fell on the ground, when defendant, who was uppermost, held complainant's head down, and forced his thumb into his eye, turned it right out on his cheek. Complainant cried out for assistance, and his friends took defendant off him.—Defendant, in reply to the charge, said he had no animosity to the complainant. He (the defendant) had been drinking very freely, and, being under the influence of liquor, might have pushed up against complainant's elbow by accident, as he left the house. He complained that he had been much hurt in the fray, and said that complainant must have received the injury of which he had spoken by accident.—Mr. Burrell said he should fine the defendant £5, or commit him for two months, in addition to which he should call upon him to find good bail for the next twelve months. The penalty was paid.

BURGLARY AT BLACKWALL.—At the THAMES Police-office, on Monday, two men, named James Francis, a hatter, and Thomas Salt, a labourer, were charged with committing a burglary in a private dwelling-house belonging to Messrs. Brendel and Roberts, proprietors of the Artichoke Tavern and White Bait House, at Blackwall, and stealing property to a considerable amount therefrom.—Inspector Rutt said he had no doubt the thieves obtained an entrance into the house by means of one of the skeleton keys found on the prisoners. He also found upon Francis a box of lucifer matches, a comb, and a short pipe.—Mr. Broderip asked the prosecutors if they had found their property?—Mr. Brendel said the only thing missing was an old silver watch.—The prisoners had nothing at all to say in their defence, but Francis was very anxious for the restoration of the comb taken from him, to combe his hair.—Inspector Rutt said it was a new tortoiseshell comb, and the produce, he believed, of another robbery.—Mr. Broderip said the Inspector must not part with it, and committed the prisoners for trial.

THE ALLEGED ATTEMPT TO MURDER THE DUKE OF NORMANDY.—At HAMMERSMITH Police-office, on Monday, the self-styled Duke of Normandy, attended by a considerable number of persons connected with his establishment at Fulham, made a statement relative to the attack alleged to have been made upon his person, as detailed in our paper last week. The "Duke's" narrative of the eventful history was to the same effect as the particulars which have already appeared; and Mr. Tucker, and others of his "household," went into details in confirmation. In addition, written declarations were put in from two Frenchmen, named Compellier and De Lotz, to the effect that they had overheard some foreigners say that the Duke would be done for before the 10th of January; but the language of Compellier was so extraordinary, as to raise doubts of his sanity. On being pressed by the magistrate, Mr. Clive, the "Duke" said he had no doubt that the person who fired at him was connected with his political enemies elsewhere (meaning, of course, in France), and that his intention was both to kill him, and blow up the building in which he was at work at the same time, inasmuch as the great light showed that the instrument which exploded, whatever it might have been, was charged with a quantity of combustible matter, different from mere powder. The upshot of the affair was, that the magistrate said that he must have Compellier before him, and the police were ordered to continue their investigation.

STRANGE SCENE ARISING FROM A FORCIBLE EJECTMENT.—On Monday, Wilmington-square and its neighbourhood were for some hours the scene of great excitement, in consequence of the ejectment of a Jewish family, who, by their screams and shouts, attracted a mob of more than 1000 persons. Arising out of this affair, Mr. Solomon Lyons, broker, residing in Gray's-inn-lane, a Jew, was charged at CLERKENWELL Police-office, with obstructing the police in the execution of their duty, and with exciting a mob against the police. It appeared from the evidence, that a Jewish family, named [illegible], had resided for a considerable time in Tysoe-street, Wilmington-square; and, falling into large arrears of rent, they were served with [illegible] notice to quit, which expired on Christmas Eve last, but [illegible] the feelings of humanity, allowed the family to occupy [illegible] until [illegible] last. [illegible] have a written promise [illegible] the house was to be called upon. The house [illegible] that morning called upon to evacuate, but refused, [illegible] The whole family, ten in number, and among [illegible] small children, assembled in front of the door, [illegible] The [illegible] mob was forthwith attracted, whose sympathies were at once enlisted in favour of the helpless little ones. The landlord [illegible] were the subjects of execration. The prisoner, who chanced to be passing, interfered on behalf of the ejected family, and applied language of a very offensive nature towards the constables; who, seeing that the encouragement of a respectable-looking man was likely to inflame still more the passions of the mob, took him into custody. The prisoner denied that he had used bad language towards the police, but admitted that he was much interested on behalf of his Jewish brethren, and that he knew nothing of the circumstances of the case, but accidentally mingled in the mob.—Mr. Combe said, if the police had been injured, he would, undoubtedly have sent him to the House of Correction for a month, without a fine; but he would, however, fine him 10s., or ten days' imprisonment.—The fine was paid at once.

CHARGE OF LORD HUNTINGTOWER AGAINST MR. DUCKETT.—At SOUTHWARK Police-office, on Wednesday, Mr. J. P. Duckett attended to answer a charge made by Lord Huntingtower, of using threatening language against him, and also of obtaining possession of a bill from his Lordship by threats of violence if he refused to deliver it up. A solicitor attended for Lord Huntingtower, and Mr. D. Keane, the barrister, on behalf of the defendant. Lord Huntingtower's statement was to the effect, that, having business with a person in the Queen's prison, on Saturday evening last, while he was in conversation with him, the defendant came up and asked him some questions relative to a Captain White, and as to whether he knew if he had his acceptance? Lord Huntingtower replying that the bill was in his possession, the defendant then said that he was robbed of it, applied the epithet of "scoundrels" to him and Captain White, and used other language of an irritating description, and finally threatened to break every bone in Lord Huntingtower's body if he did not give him up his acceptance. The latter individual exclaimed against such a summary proceeding being adopted, and said that he had given a consideration for the bill, and that, as it was his property, he should not part with it. The defendant, upon this, became very much excited, clenched his fists, and seemed to be preparing to make use of them, when his Lordship, according to his own account, being apprehensive that, from the threats used, he would have been assaulted, resigned possession of the bill to the defendant. Lord Huntingtower added that the bill was for £47 odd, and that he had it from Captain White, and a consideration was given; that it was accepted by the defendant, and endorsed by Captain White. In answer to a question, the complainant said that nothing but the dread of being assaulted on the occasion by the defendant, who was a much more powerful man than he was, induced him to give up the possession of the bill.—At this stage of the inquiry, the defendant's counsel observed that a document was in the possession of Lord Huntingtower which would at once explain the whole transaction, and show that there was not the slightest ground for the imputed charge against his client, that of obtaining possession of the bill by threats of personal violence.—After some hesitation on the part of the complainant's solicitor, the document was handed to the magistrate, who, on perusing it, said it did very materially alter the complexion of the case; and he then proceeded to question Lord Huntingtower, who admitted that he had written it on the occasion of the meeting between him and the defendant in the Queen's Prison. It was a written indemnification to him, on his delivering up the bill to the defendant, from all proceedings for its subsequent recovery, by action or otherwise. It was signed by the defendant.—Mr. Cottingham asked Lord Huntingtower if he got the document in question subsequently to the alleged threats of violence used towards him, and he admitted such to be fact; "but still," added he, "I have reason to apprehend that the defendant will commit an assault upon me, if not restrained by the law."—Mr. Cottingham said, it was extraordinary that Lord Huntingtower should now come forward and complain of being apprehensive of personal violence from the defendant, after having received the document just produced immediately after he had given up the possession of the bill. Had his Lordship been deprived of the bill by threats, as he asserted, he ought to have complained to the nearest police-court; instead of which, by his own avowal, he accepts of a written undertaking from the defendant to bear him harmless from any future proceedings for its recovery, on his delivering it up to him.—Mr. Keane then entered into the defence of his client, by describing that the defendant had, on a recent occasion, received a letter, stating that the bill in question had improperly come into the possession of Lieutenant, not Captain White, and, as it was his (defendant's) acceptance, he went up to Lord Huntingtower, to make inquiries on the subject. That the latter individual, admitting that he had it, when it was demanded, refused to give it up, but ultimately resigned the possession of it, on defendant giving him the document produced in court. It was not true that threats of the nature adduced had been made use of by the defendant, who was perfectly satisfied to have got back his acceptance; and, instead of having any disposition to come in contact with Lord Huntingtower, his wish was to avoid him in future, and, therefore, had not the slightest intention of threatening or assaulting him—he need not be afraid.—Lord Huntingtower: The bill, I still maintain, was extorted from me by threats. I do go in bodily fear.—Mr. Cottingham said that, taking the whole of the circumstances into consideration, instead of making the defendant find sureties to keep the peace, he should merely call upon him to enter into his own recognizances, in the sum of £100, not to use any language of a threatening nature towards Lord Huntingtower.—Mr. Duckett, having entered into his own recognizances, was immediately discharged.

ANOTHER ATTEMPT TO EXTORT MONEY FROM BANKERS.—At the MANSION-HOUSE, on Wednesday, a man, whose name appeared on the prisoner's list as Sinops Kent, was brought before the Lord Mayor, upon self-accusation of a very serious offence. Mr. Bush, of the firm of Bush and Mullins, Solicitors to the Committee of Bankers for Protection against Forgeries and Frauds, attended for the prosecution. The prisoner, who was undefended, seemed to be in a state of extreme dejection.—Robert Stirling, policeman No. 157, of the A division of Metropolitan Police, stated that, at twelve o'clock, on Tuesday night, at Charing-cross, the prisoner, after looking at him for a moment, said, "I can bear it no longer, you must take me in charge." Witness asked him upon what grounds; to which he replied, "for sending a threatening letter to Messrs. Prescott and Grote, the bankers." The prisoner then put into his hands a seal, with which he said he had impressed the wax on the letter he had sent to the bankers. Witness took the prisoner into custody. The prisoner likewise said, on being taken into custody, that it was to save other parties he had done it. Mr. Bush stated that the following extraordinary letter had been received by a gentleman in the establishment of Messrs. Prescott and Co. The post-mark was eight at night, 6th January, 1845:—

"December 6.

Messrs.—A plan has been arranged for the purpose of firing your bank, and which you cannot prevent, however strict you may keep watch, unless you consent to pay the party one hundred pounds within one month, namely, fifty pounds immediately, which you must enclose in a letter directed to Mr. John Wright, and send without fail to-morrow morning, by twelve o'clock, to the Angel Inn, Islington, to be left there until called for. Unless this is complied with, woe betide you. It will be folly of you attempting to discover the parties; for if you do so, you will be placing your lives at stake. Avert the fate which now hangs over you. I say, be warned, and comply with the demands now made

Yours, &c., "SINOPS KENT."

Messrs. Prescott and Grote."

Mr. Bush also produced the seal which the prisoner had given up, and upon which was engraven a coat of arms. It was a very remarkable seal.—Mr. George Tucker, principal clerk in the banking-house of Messrs. Prescott and Grote, stated that he had received the letter read by Mr. Bush, at half-past nine o'clock in the morning of Tuesday, by the last post, and he had put a mark upon it, and delivered it to the partners.—Mr. Bush said that there was an Act framed to meet this particular sort of offence, of which the prisoner was accused; and he had been directed by the bankers to bring the case before his Lordship to be treated according to law. It was, he added, the firm intention of the Committee of Bankers to prosecute in every instance in which a threatening letter was received, which was written for the purpose of extorting money. It would be necessary, in order that opportunities might be afforded for ascertaining something about the prisoner's state of mind, that the case should be remanded.—Previously to the appearance of Mr. Bush, who had been but just informed of the apprehension of the prisoner, Kent was put to the bar, and the Lord Mayor showed a desire to know something about a person who had acted in so very strange a manner, and asked him where he resided?—The prisoner: I have no fixed residence.—The Lord Mayor: Are you connected with the law?—The prisoner: I have copied for a lawyer, but I am not one.—The Surgeon of the Compter is to examine the prisoner before his next examination.

GREAT "NATIVE" MEETING IN THE PARK, AT NEW YORK.

GREAT NATIVE MEETING AT NEW YORK.

THIS enthusiastic demonstration, termed, in the New York journals, "the Great Mass Monster Meeting of the Natives," took place in the Park, at New York, on the night of Monday, October 22. It is necessary to be thus explicit as to the designation of the meeting, since the high state of parties and the political excitement at New York, at the present moment, call forth demonstrations of every shade of opinion; and "the madness of many" has in it most extraordinary method. The "Natives" are, for instance, violently opposed, in the assertion of what they consider their rights, both to the Whig and Democratic parties; and, to quote the New York Herald, "they declare their unalterable purpose to be to go on their own hook—to make no compromises or coalition with any party; but they are ready to absorb within their capacious bosom the rank and file of both the whole parties. According to all appearances, the whole Native congressional, senatorial, and assembly tickets will be carried by overwhelming majorities; but how Polk or Clay will come out in this city, is a greater mystery than ever."

This Great Meeting, the object of which was to respond to the nominations on their county ticket, had been postponed, in consequence of the inclemency of the weather, on the previous Friday. On Monday, the preparations were on the most imposing scale. The city flag was hoisted all day—three immense platforms were erected in the Park—fireworks on the most magnificent scale were erected, and in all Wards the enthusiasm and excitement amongst the "Natives," were indescribable. About six o'clock, there probably were three thousand persons on the spot, many of them being females. On the balcony of the City Hall, a large Drummond light shed its dazzling radiance on the multitude, lighting up the crowds, the trees, and the Fountain, making the whole scene almost as clear as noon-day.

About half-past seven o'clock the meeting was organised by the appointment of a chairman, General Lloyd, who said, on taking the chair, that it was a great source of honour to him that he stood in such an honourable position before such a large concourse of American citizens. When he came there he expected to see a few of the citizens of New York; but, behold! they had got the Union with them in spirit and purpose. (Tremendous cheers).

About twenty Vice-Presidents were then nominated amid loud shouts and a cry of "There ain't enough of them."

Mr. Richard Warren then reported on the part of the nominating committee, that they had selected George Folsom as the senatorial candidate. Mr. Folsom's letter of acceptance was then read.

Here the invited guests from Philadelphia passed the principal stand in three carriages, escorted by Alderman Cozzens, Major Prall, and other distinguished "Natives." They were greeted with three loud cheers.

Mr Warren then proceeded to read the Report and Address of the Senatorial and Assembly Nominating Committees of the American Republican party for the city and district. It is a most enthusiastic document, setting forth the great principles of the party. A resolution was then passed in favour of the several nominations; and Mr. Baller, of Philadelphia, addressed the meeting at great length.

The public singer of the "Native" party, Thomas De La Ree, was then called upon, and sang three songs in succession, which strongly denounced the Irish.

Mr. Folsom, the candidate for Senator, then addressed the mass, and concluded with this emphatic declaration:—"This movement has commenced in consequence of the outrage committed upon us by your Legislature, and it is incumbent upon us to act in the spirit of that constitution, founded by the wisdom of our fathers and cherished by the patriotism of successive generations. (Loud cheers). We shall rescue it from the hands and ruthless grasp in which it has fallen, and hand it down to posterity. I would proceed with my remarks, but I will not detain you at this hour of the night any longer, but I shall only urge the importance of carrying out the principles we profess, and we shall go forth to the battle field with the Bible in one hand, and our country in the other, and vindicate the rights and liberties of American citizens." (Immense cheering, which lasted for some time).

At the conclusion of this speech Major Harper, who was recognised on the balcony of the City Hall, was loudly cheered, when two blue lights were ignited at either end, and in very magnificent fireworks from the balcony were displayed the words "Americans their own rulers"—after which the different Wards mustered at the place appointed, and then re-entered the Park, which they crossed, and filed off in procession.

While these animating proceedings were going on upon the principal stand, addresses were delivered from the stand in the rear, by Mr. Oakley, one of the candidates for Assembly, and Mr. Woodruff one of the candidates for Congress.

Another meeting was also organised near the Park-gate, opposite Tammany Hall, which (we regret to state) was interrupted by showers of stones, shells, and other missiles, which fell thickly upon the stand, and wounded several individuals—none, however, very seriously. Addresses were delivered from this stand by Messrs. Corman and Booes, of Philadelphia, when the meeting was dissolved and joined that collected around the principal stand.

A procession was formed, and moved by Park-row up Broadway through the principal streets of this city. The "Empire Club," which had assembled at Tammany Hall, shouted, loud, long, and vociferously "three cheers for Polk and Dallas" as the "Natives" filed off from the Park, and a "row" was expected, but fortunately no breach of the peace took place. After much enthusiastic cheering for Polk and Dallas, the meeting at Tammany Hall separated.

THE BIRKS OF ABERFELDY.

OF all the varied scenes of Scottish landscape, none are more worthy of a visit by the tourist than the celebrated waterfalls of

THE BIRKS OF ABERFELDY.

Moness, in the neighbourhood of the village of Aberfeldy, in Strath Tay. They occur in a deep and narrow chasm behind Moness House.

Pennant, the celebrated tourist, calls them "an epitome of everything that can be admired in the curiosity of waterfalls." "They consist," says Anderson, in his "Guide to the Highlands," "of a succession of falls, comprising a perpendicular height of not less than a hundred feet, and occupying, in length, a space of more than the like number of yards. A prolonged sheet of descending water, alternately perpendicular and slanting, is before us. From the edge of this lengthened cataract rise abrupt rocky acclivities, covered with moss and fern, whence shoot up tall slender pines and elms. These partially veil two lichen-clad mural cliffs—converging towards the uppermost fall, above which they rear two high vertical lines; on the top of these cliffs are serried groves of pine and birch, while a row of airy birches move on the slanting summit of the bank which closes in the rocky gap. The last and highest cascade is a perpendicular fall of about fifty feet, but possessing no particular interest."

Burns commemorated this fine place in his well-known song of "The Birks of Aberfeldy."

GREAT WHIG MASS CONVENTION, AT NEW YORK.

OUR third Illustration of the state of American political feeling is sketched from the general mass assemblage of the "Young Whigs," from New York, and the surrounding States, which took place on Oct. 25, in the city, under one of the most smiling skies that ever blest the lower world on any side of the Atlantic. The moonshine during the night meetings was also superb.

This may be said to be the first organisation of that portion of the Whig party who are attached to Daniel Webster.

The excitement commenced at sunrise, when the national ensigns were hoisted from the different Whig head-quarters, and a salute of one hundred guns was fired at six o'clock. At about ten o'clock, the streets were jammed up with delegations, carriages, carts, cabs, omnibuses, and crowds of spectators, all flocking to the grand centre point, where the procession was to form. At ten o'clock, Grand Marshal Augustus S. Foster, Esq., escorted by a large cortège, all well mounted, rode up and halted at the Bowling-green, and took their places in front of the procession.

The cavalcade wore Clay badges, and at the head of the procession. they moved along up Broadway, followed by the first division of the "Young Men's Clay Association," preceded by the "Young Guard," who carried a very superb white silk banner, on which was represented a full-length portrait of Mr. Clay, with the inscription, "Justice to Harry of the West." This banner was presented to them by the ladies.

We have not space to detail the procession or its banners. On one of them were inscribed, "Here lie the remains of the lamented Lawrence: remember his last words, 'Don't give up the ship.'" Elsewhere was a placard, with the words—"We bid foreigners welcome to partake of our pudding, but not to cook it."

The Whigs of the Western Hotel were followed by an open carriage drawn by six horses, which contained invited guests and Revolutionary heroes. Some thirty carriages followed, each drawn by four horses, and were decorated with flags and banners—the horses being mostly covered over with the American flag, in the shape of body cloths, which gave them a very imposing appearance.

A large concourse on foot followed, four abreast, consisting of the mass of the Whig Associations. Their banners bore the inscription, "Protection to American Industry;" and a car followed, on which was a printing-press, apparently in working operation.

The particulars of the Delegations and Clubs, and the inscriptions on their banners, occupy several columns of the New York Herald.

We must, indeed, pass on to the scene of our Engraving—Gothic Hall. A splendid arch, made of timber work, was thrown across Broadway, from which were suspended several wreaths and festoons of flowers, with a well-executed profile of Mr. Clay. The shouting here was immense and prolonged. Broadway, near Canal-street, was completely jammed up during the time the procession was passing.

After passing along by the Astor House, and wheeling by Park-row, the Grand Marshal, accompanied by his staff and a band, pulled up, and the whole passed in review, the band playing several lively and appropriate airs; when, after considerable delay, the Park was filled up, and the three stands which had been erected, were soon crowded to excess, as well as the whole area and steps in front of the City Hall. The windows were filled with ladies.

Thousands were congregated in the Park awaiting the return of the masses in the procession. A dense mass of human beings occupied the portico of the City Hall, and the balconies, and every window was crowded with spectators.

We cannot find space for the speeches. They all touched on the questions of the tariff, Texas, and the old beaten ground taken by the Clay speakers. The principal orators were Cassius M. Clay, Esq., of Lexington, and J. W. Fowler, Esq., of Otsego—the latter being the best speaker on the occasion—a good orator—brilliant and versatile. Neither Mr. Webster nor Mr. Choate, though announced, appeared.

A second platform was erected in front of the eastern wing of the City Hall, where, shortly after the proceedings commenced at the others, a meeting was organised. Among the humours of the crowd was a person in the Park singing—

Alas! poor Cooney Clay,
Alas! poor Cooney Clay,
He never shall be President,
I hear the people say.

There was a third platform, where two speakers addressed the crowd from either end; and the whole business having terminated, the crowds dispersed, the Park was cleared out, and the platforms taken away, leaving "not a wreck behind."

In the evening, the triumphal arch in Broadway, opposite Masonic Hall, was illuminated with variegated lamps, as also the front of Masonic and National Halls, which with the Tabernacle, were filled with speakers and listeners; but the whole of the proceedings terminated at an early hour.

The decorative details of the illustration are, certainly, very tasteful. The immense banner suspended above the arch was of thin gauze, and represented the American flag, with red and white stripes, and upon the latter was the inscription, in black letters. All the flags upon the arch were of the gayest colours, and the wreaths beneath of dahlias and leaves, the medal of Clay being framed in dahlias. The arch was a graceful ellipse, composed of red and blue open bars, alternately; in the distance was a large clock. The pavilion (seen in the engraving) was an immense car, about twenty feet long, and very lofty, thickly decked with flags, and hung with every variety of native manufacture—rich carpets, festooned printed calico, &c.; the carriage was drawn by eight bay horses, draped with the American flag, and each horse bearing a small one on the forehead, and a larger one on the collar. This pavilion was preceded by an immensely long car, decorated with American flags, and containing blacksmiths at work, with forge, anvils, &c., together with stonemasons, &c.: this car being drawn by eight white horses.

GREAT RUNNING MATCH FOR TWO HUNDRED POUNDS.

On Monday, the long-pending Great Foot Race, between Sheppard and Jackson (alias the American Deer), came off near the Duke of York, Gannick-corner, near Barnet. The terms of this match were, that each man should start at one time, and whichever ran over the greatest distance of ground within one hour, to be deemed the winner. Both men have acquired great celebrity, and were considered two of the fastest pedestrians (for a long distance) in England. In betting, 6 to 4 were freely laid on Sheppard, and perhaps on no other running match was so much money speculated. One mile of road was measured, over which the match was to be decided. The competitors started at about the rate of one mile in six minutes. They continued nearly together till the eighth mile, when Sheppard appeared at an advantage. Upon the approach of the tenth mile, Jackson increased his speed, and pressed his opponent; and, on the turn of this mile, Sheppard staggered and fell, completely exhausted. Jackson then ran during the remaining seven minutes, and ultimately came off the winner, having run eleven miles all but 100 yards, in one hour, over a heavy road.

GREAT TEN-MILE FOOT RACE IN AMERICA.

This extraordinary feat is described in the New York Spirit of the Times as "The Fastest Race ever Run in the World—Old England A-head—Ten Miles in 54 min. 21 sec." The match had long been projected in New York, and it accordingly came off on Tuesday, Nov. 19, before the largest assemblage of spectators ever gathered upon an American race-course, the arena being the Beacon Course, Hoboken. According to the Spirit of the Times, a single steamer from Albany brought down four hundred; New Jersey, Long Island, and the river towns on the Hudson furnished immense crowds; while New York sent over materials for an army three times larger than that with which Napoleon made his Italian campaign. From the head of the quarter-stretch quite around to the drawgate, the enclosed space was so densely crammed as to render it nearly impossible to clear a space wide enough for the pedestrians to run through, though they were preceded by a dozen men on horseback. Thousands filled the stands, but it would have required the Amphitheatre of Titus to have accommodated all.

The runners were two New Yorkers, two Americans, one Connecticut man, one Indian, one Irishman, and two Englishmen—Barlow, at the head of our ten milers, and a trainer of pedestrians; and Greenhalgh, among our best runners at short distances. The names of the runners were:—John Barlow, Englishman; John Steeprock, Indian; Thomas Greenhalgh, Englishman; John Gildersleeve, New Yorker; Thomas M'Cabe, Irishman; J. P. Taylor, Connecticut; Joseph T. L. Smith, New Yorker; John Underhill, American; Thomas Jackson, American.

THE RACE.

After a few false starts, in which Barlow went off with a bulge like a quarter horse, Mr. Barker (who stood on the course nearly in a line with the men) gave the word "go." The two Englishmen jumped off with the lead, and, in a few moments, the whole nine were out of sight, the railing and both sides of the course being densely thronged, so that, even at the start, the pedestrians had to "run the gauntlet." The judges could only note the position of the leading men, by watching that of several horses abreast.

FOOT RACE NEAR BARNET.

We have not space for the details of the running of the several miles, except for the TENTH MILE.—It was apparent that Barlow, barring accidents, had the race safe, upon his commencing this mile. Upon commencing the second quarter of this mile, it was evident that Barlow was increasing his pace; but Greenhalgh, who had not yet run a yard at his best, was now going like a scared dog. Gildersleeve, by a tremendous effort, "hurried the mourners" around the first quarter of a mile, where Greenhalgh ran up to his side, turned full upon him, exclaiming, "Good-by, Gilder!" and left him as if he were standing still. The next three quarters of a mile were run by Greenhalgh faster we are persuaded, than the same distance was ever performed in this country. He gained forty seconds upon Barlow, though the latter ran this mile ten seconds quicker than he did the ninth, that is, in 5:25. Greenhalgh must have run this mile in about 4:48! Barlow beat Steeprock exactly 173 yards, while Greenhalgh was less than 90 yards behind him. Gildersleeve was a bad fourth, being about 212 yards behind Greenhalgh. M'Cabe was a long way behind, and Taylor had not reached the head of the quarter stretch, when Barlow came through.

Thus terminated, amidst the most tremendous cheers from all parts of the course, one of the most extraordinary pedestrian performances on record.

It should be added that, in the United States, the race-courses are entirely inclosed by a high fence, the charge for admittance within which is 24 cents, or an English shilling. There is another inclosure, with high gates all round the Grand Stand, the admittance within which is 25 cents. The point of the Race represented, is that at which Gilders is passing the two Englishmen.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1845.

AN acquaintance with fact is the great corrective of the false impressions of fiction. The great gatherers and disposers of facts in the present age are newspapers, and, accordingly, we find that they are the principal media through which we receive the strongest shocks to those romances we have suffered ourselves to weave about distant countries, other nations, and great men as yet unseen.

To thousands, even now, Spain appears in the colouring of Ballad and Romance, as a "sunny land," where cigars, grapes, and guitar-strings are the great necessaries of life, and whose people inherit something of the chivalry and bravery described in the "Cid." An account of Sir John Moore's retreat would set them right as to the climate; and for the people, all we have read of them lately exhibits them as men, who, if they can be judged from the deeds they permit in their rulers, have preserved few of the advantages they once possessed from civi[illegible] the better influences that spring from Christi[illegible]ligion seems to have eradicated nothing of the sav[illegible]rage which, even in the savage, has been esteeme[illegible]rtue. The governing party in Spain, and their [illegible] exhibited the two worst qualities of the brigand—an insatiable greed for money, and indifference to the shedding of blood to procure it, or the power that can be converted into it. The Spaniard has terribly degenerated in character and power since the time when a Phillip sat on the throne, with an Alba for his Minister. But, even in their best days, there was something dark and fiercely cruel in the national character—a bloodthirstiness that scarcely asked the poor motives of passion or revenge, as an excuse for spilling it. Among no other people could such a power as the Inquisition have been established; the French would not tolerate it; even the Neapolitans rebelled against it; the Spaniards found something congenial in its policy, which was at once secret, unscrupulous, and cruel. The power and greatness of Spain—for she was both great and powerful—have perished, but the same taint exists in the character of the people. Cruelty and lawlessness stain both public and social life; a private enemy is dispatched by a stab, and a political opponent is got rid of by shooting him; party warfare is not a conflict of principles, but a battle of lives. This fierce spirit is inherent in the race, and breaks out wherever Spaniards have settled, and that with indications of deeper degeneracy. At this moment, as for the last eight years, the Spanish Colonies of South America are the scene of atrocities that could not be surpassed by the most barbarous savages the old voyagers ever discovered. The public has heard something of the Argentine Republic, and its present military ruler, Rosas. He is now engaged in a war with Monte Video, and, not long since, attempted a blockade of that port, which has grown to a place of considerable trade with Brazil, America, and England. So weak are the wretches who devastate the provinces unhappily overrun by them, when opposed with any vigour and skill, that "one or two guns from the United States frigate Congress, dissipated what was called the Blockading Squadron of the Argentine Republic in half an hour, and any well armed merchantman might have done the same." But by land the war has been ferocious beyond all parallel, though, as yet, unsuccessful; and, with the interference now promised, of the English and Brazilian Governments, it is to be hoped that Rosas and his ruffians may be checked. To give a notion of his character, we extract some details from the Times, which, it were to be wished, could be disbelieved. Rosas attained supreme power in 1835, and

One of his first acts, on the 8th of July, 1836, was to cause 110 Indians, who had been brought down from the Pampas, to be put to death; and, in order to strike terror into the population of Buenos Ayres, they were taken out in dozens, and shot before all the people. Four of their chiefs were brought to the barracks, where they had their throats cut, along with two little children!

And he has ever since proceeded as he commenced; "things bad begun make strong themselves by ill." He has now governed nine years; what he has done during that time appears from a work with the appropriate title of Tablas de Sangre "Tables of blood," published by a Signor Indarte. It is shown that down to the end of 1843, Rosas and his followers "had put to death by poison, four persons; by cutting the throat, 3,765; by shooting, 1,393; by private assassination, 722; whilst in the murderous civil wars of the last ten years, nearly 15,000 men have been slain, every battle being followed by a butchery of prisoners, and 1,600 captives or wounded men have been put to death by the lance."

Unchecked by the public opinion of Europe, too remote to be heeded, and beneath the burning sun of the south, all the worst qualities inherent in the Spanish blood have descended through several generations, assimilating more and more to those of the savage, at each remove from the old stock. Only of such a race could deeds like the following be narrated:—

The word "Resbalosa" was invented by Rosas to convey to his infernal agents, a particular mode of despatching their victims. It meant that they were to be tied up naked, with their hands behind their backs, whilst the assassins cut their throats slowly, with knives or a saw; and this horrible torture was accompanied by a song made for the occasion. The slightest trifles afforded a sufficient pretext for these monstrous cruelties, which partook rather of the amusements of cannibals than the known practices of wars or persecutions even in the most fanatical age. One man was shot in prison, for wearing a fancy dress on his way to see his mistress; another for having steered a Montevidean bark: in the month of October, 1842, the Masorqueros repaired every night to the city of Buenos Ayres, from Rosas's camp, or rather Golgotha, called the "Santos Lugares," hard by the walls, to murder and pillage the inhabitants, no less than 400 of whom were slaughtered in their houses by these ruffians, in three weeks.

These cruelties were practised on his subjects, and what notion does it convey of him when we are told that in war, they varied and doubled in atrocity against his foes? Commerce has brought many of our countrymen in close contact with these horrors. They are becoming known, and will, we hope, be checked by the interference of civilized Governments with a man whom it is a charity to suppose the possession of unbridled power has deprived of reason.

THE only stir in Home politics is confined to Ireland, and there a Church controversy seems to be taking the place of more secular questions. The Charitable Bequests Act has divided the Catholic Hierarchy, Mr. O'Connell taking part against many of the Bishops. For the present Repeal is not the one sole topic of discussion.

The Foreign intelligence continues, under these circumstances, to attract more attention than it would at a more busy time; and even this may be briefly summed up. The French Ministry has stood the shock it was subjected to, both from without and within; if the attack was planned by the Opposition, it was a decided failure; but it will, unquestionably, be renewed. The prevailing opinion in Paris is that the Ministry will again succeed on the Address, but that Guizot is wished out of office by those who were once among his strongest supporters, and that he will finally have to yield to the combination against him. It has been reported in Paris that the English Government has consented to some modification of the Treaties of 1831 and 1833, on the subject of the Right of Search.

The position of affairs between Mexico and the United States is growing more and more unsatisfactory. The Americans are resolved to "absorb" Texas into the Federation; Mr. Calhoun says "it is the destiny" of America to occupy that vast region; nations do not now invade or conquer; they merely "occupy," as France would have done with Tahiti; or they "increase by accretion"—a phrase which diplomacy owes to Mr. Calhoun. Mexico cannot comprehend this new phraseology, conceiving that it conceals the very old practice of conquest and aggression, and will protest against it. But the question does not wholly rest between Mexico and the United States. By throwing off the authority of Mexico, the Texians plainly enough showed they had no love for the connection; and the danger is that they will now be as ready to enter into the union with America, as the great Republic is to "annex" them. At present, Mexico possesses no actual authority over them; and, from the language of the American Secretary, it may readily be inferred the States will not scruple to use force, if Mexico persists in defending an abstract right. The following, for instance, reads like a threat of what may happen, if Mexico does not submit quietly, and ventures to call for foreign interference:—"If America should not be resisted in its course, it will probably fulfil its destiny without disturbing its neighbours, or putting in jeopardy the general peace; but if it be opposed by foreign interference, a new direction would be given to our energy, much less favourable to harmony with our neighbours, and to the general peace of the world."

THE REVENUE.

IN part of our impression last week we were able to make the gratifying announcement of the improved state of the Revenue. We now give a summary of the results presented by the official tables of the Revenue, for the Quarter ending the 5th of January.

The accounts are very satisfactory, presenting a course of improvement in all the principal heads of finance; indeed, upon all the heads, without exception, that can be accepted as indices of the prosperity and comfort of the people.

The total of the Year's income is £51,235,538.

The net increase upon the Year is therefore £1,163,595.

The total Revenue of the Quarter ending on Saturday last is £12,705,693.

The net increase upon the Quarter, as compared with the Quarter ending Jan. 5, 1844, is £493,916.

The increase of Customs on the Year is £1,305,453.

The increase of Excise is, upon the Year, £365,000—exactly one thousand pounds a day.

In all the other departments of Revenue, except the Property Tax (which presents a trifling decrease, arising from relaxation as to the time of collecting), there is more or less of increase, and the excess of this Year's Revenue over the last year would, in fact, amount to more than two millions, were it not for repayments and miscellaneous charges, which, in strictness, do not properly come into a Revenue account, being the payment of debts, not a drawback upon income.

On the Quarter, compared with the Quarter ending January 5, 1844, we find the gross increase:—

Customs		£135,167
Excise		200,169
Stamps		78,005
Taxes		11,633
Income Tax		33,125
Post-office		3,000
Crown Lands		20,000
Imprest and other Moneys		97,623
Leaving gross increase on Quarter		£577,723
From this deduct decrease—
Miscellaneous	£2,727
Repayments of Advances	£1,080
		83,807
Nett increase on Quarter		£493,916

It is particularly gratifying to observe that the main items of improvement, both on the year and on the Quarter, are from Customs, Excise, and other departments, which are looked on as in some measure a test of the prosperity or depression of the mass of the community.

THE WEATHER.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

IN your paper of the 28th December last, you had a paragraph setting forth that Mr. Murphy had foretold that the 8th of January would be the coldest day of the winter. You will receive this on the 8th, and your own feelings will prove to you, that Mr. Murphy predicts the weather on a false principle. The 7th is mild; my thermometer out of doors is now (11 A.M.) at 46 deg., and I foretell that the 8th will be mild also. But the 9th will be colder. The weather will be mild till after the 20th; but afterwards extremely cold, stormy, and severe, with snow. The 24th very cold, and the 29th severe also.

In your paper of the 28th Dec., you also noticed "an earthquake of some violence in Savoy, during the night of the 10th Dec." This you will see was foretold by me in the "Literary and Scientific Register," as the following extract will evince:—

"Electrical Phenomena.—There will be furious storms from the 10th to the 12th, with extreme electrical excitement, and in some places earthquakes, more violent than usual."

I have predicted the weather many years before Mr. Murphy, who is only right when he follows my system.

Yours, &c., R. J. MORRISON, Lieut. Royal Navy.

P.S.—If you think it will interest your readers, I will give you the daily weather, according to my system, which, when the Electricity of the Atmosphere is not affected by the presence of Comets in the vicinity of the Earth, will be correct five days in six. The following is for January:—

11th. Changeable, windy meteors	21st. Stormy, colder
12th. Stormy, hail and rain	22nd. Frost, windy
13th. Fog, frost, snow, showers	23rd. Sharp frost, meteors
14th. Unsettled, foggy air	24th. Very cold, sharp frost, fog
15th. Frosty, dull, stormy	25th. Snow showers, frost
16th. Frost, stormy air	26th. Severe frost, snow
17th. Cloudy, rainy	27th. Changes, frosty
18th. Fairer, but meteors or lightning	28th. Changes, storms, frost
	29th. Very cold, dull, hard frost
19th. Stormy, yet mild air	30th. Stormy and cold, snow
20th. Fair and warm	31st. Dull, cold fog, or snow

DISTRESSING ACCIDENT AT WOOLWICH.—On Wednesday, while a bricklayer's labourer, named Mahoney, was engaged in carrying slates on his head to the top of the new Marine Barracks, now building at Woolwich, the ladder broke, precipitating him from a height of about forty feet, with frightful velocity to the earth. He was immediately removed to the Royal Marine Hospital, where he received every attention, but there is very little hope of his recovery.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Manchester and Leeds Railway.—On Wednesday, a Special General Meeting of the Manchester and Leeds Railway Company, was held at the Palatine Hotel, Manchester; Henry Houldsworth, Esq., in the chair. After a long discussion, it was agreed to form a branch line from Todmorton to Burnley, eight and a half miles in length, to join the Burnley and Blackburn line, and perfect the connection between the Valley of the Calder and the populous manufacturing district round Blackburn and Preston; another branch line from Oldham to Mumps, one mile and a quarter in length; another line from Oldham to Bury, for the purpose of connecting Rochdale, Oldham, and other towns lying eastward, including Wakefield by a direct communication with Bury, and the important district round it; another line to go from the Manchester and Leeds line at Hunt's Bank, to the Manchester and Birmingham line through the town of Manchester, to connect the north and south lines together; a branch line to Guide Bridge, from the Sheffield line; and another line, 47 miles in length, from Halifax to Dewsbury, Leeds, and Bradford. Capital to the amount of £1,400,000 was granted, and every power given to the Directors fully to carry out their plans.

The Murder of the Gamekeeper at Croome.—The Jury impanelled by the Coroner of Worcester (B. Hyde, Esq.), to inquire into the cause of death of Thomas Staite, who died in the Worcester Infirmary on the 24th ult., met on Tuesday, to resume their inquiry, which was adjourned from the 27th December. In the meantime, as we have already stated, several parties have been apprehended on suspicion of having been concerned in this murderous outrage, and two of them (Francis Dingly and Joseph Turvey) are now in the Worcester county prison. After diligent inquiry, the Jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder against Joseph Turvey and Francis Dingley, and some other persons to the Jury unknown." The Jury wished to append to their verdict a declaration, alleging the evil effects of the Game-laws, but to this, of course, the Coroner could not consent.

Attempt to Poison a Family at Manchester.—On Monday evening last, an atrocious attempt to poison his wife and two children was made by Benjamin Anderson, a millwright, living in Long-street, Ancoats, Manchester. It appears that, for several days past, Anderson, who is in the employ of Messrs. Fairburn, the engineers, had been drinking, and, on Saturday, spent the entire of his wages in liquor. On Monday afternoon he came home about half-past three o'clock, and asked his wife to let him have some tea. Mrs. Anderson told him that the kettle was on the fire, and as soon as she had made some for her daughter, who worked in a factory, she would make him some. He immediately became very abusive, and told both his wife and son (a boy about eleven years old) that they should not stop in the house; and, under a threat of being beaten, they went into the street. Anderson then bolted the door, and refused to allow them to come in. As she stood near the window, Mrs. Anderson saw her husband go to the cupboard, and take a quantity of onions out, which he placed in the window. After doing something else at the cupboard, Anderson opened the door and left the house, without getting any tea. As soon as he was gone, Mrs. Anderson again ventured in, and made some tea, sweetening it with brown sugar, which she noticed was speckled with white spots, but did not suspect any harm. Upon tasting the tea, however, she was much surprised at its nauseous taste, which was accompanied by a burning of the mouth. She had remarked to her son that the sugar was covered with white spots. She then made some more tea, which she sweetened with sugar from the same basin as before; and, finding that the tea had the same burning, unpleasant taste, she sent for a neighbour, named Cooper, who likewise tasted the mixture. They then made a little coffee, sweetening it with sugar which was wrapped up in the cupboard, and found it entirely free from any offensive taste. Upon examining some flour and meal, which were also in the cupboard, they were found to contain a plentiful admixture of the same sort of ingredient which had been found in the sugar. After consulting with Mrs. Cooper, Mrs. Anderson took the white powder off the sugar to a druggist, who at once stated that sugar of lead had been mixed with it. Information was then given to the police, and the husband was apprehended and brought up to the Borough Police Court, before D. Maude, Esq. The prisoner was remanded to a future day, when the flour, meal, and sugar will be subjected to an analysis.

Execution of Two Murderers at Kirkdale.—On Saturday last, the execution of the two murderers, Thomas Stew and George Evans, took place at Kirkdale. The prisoners were condemned at the last Lancashire Assizes. Stew, it will be remembered, murdered a young woman, named Alice Nolan, at Manchester, in July last, and, after having cut her throat with a razor, he made an attempt on his own life, which confined him to the infirmary, and prevented him from being tried at the Summer Assizes. The other culprit was convicted of murdering his landlady, an elderly lady, named Millen, with whom he lodged, for the purpose, it would seem, of merely plundering the house. Both persons confessed their guilt. In Stew's confession he said:—"I courted Alice Nolan for a little more than four months. She was as decent a young woman as any one could wish to keep company with, and I thought we should have lived comfortably together. About a month before her death, I made her a promise to marry her in five weeks (the wedding-day was to have been the Sunday after the day on which she died), but could not keep my word in consequence of getting into bad company, and spending all I had. As, therefore, we could not live together on earth, I thought we might be happy together in heaven. I borrowed a razor, as appeared on my trial, to take her life and my own. With this razor in my pocket, I took her on her way home, as I had been in the habit of doing, and when we reached a bank, the name of which I forget, very near to her house, we stood to talk together, as we had usually done before. She asked me if I was going to do what I had promised (namely, to marry her). I answered, 'No, I cannot, for I have been drinking very hard. I have left Stephen Bill's, through drinking on Saturdays, and not looking after my horses on Sundays; but I got another place on Wednesday last, but it does not suit me so well as Stephen's face, for it will not be so constant an employ.' She said, 'Well, then, you must do as well as you can.' 'I then said, 'I am very badly vexed that I should have left the last place, and that I cannot put things forward as I could wish to do.' She said, 'Give me a kiss,' and I put my arm round her neck, and gave one. She said, 'Shall we meet again at Sally's on Monday night?' (meaning Mrs. Shepherd's.) I said, still with my arm round her neck, 'No; I hope we shall meet in heaven next.' I then drew the razor across her throat, upon which she exclaimed, 'Oh, my love, Tom!' Then I left her, and walked at my usual pace across a corner of a bank, along George-street, and down Brewery-street, and so along the several streets to Mrs. Shepherd's. Down the entry, about half a yard from the door, I went on my knees, and I said, 'I hope her is in heaven, and I shall soon meet there there. I then drew the razor across my throat, after which I got up and fell against the door, which flew open, and I fell down into the house." In Evans's confession, he said the idea of murdering his landlady suddenly flashed across his mind, when they were in the house together. She had previously taunted him for not having received an answer to a letter to his friends applying for money. The procession emerged from the chapel at twelve o'clock. Stew appeared to die instantly; the rope caused his wound to bleed afresh, and the white cap drawn over his face was discoloured by the blood. Evans, on the contrary, from his stronger frame, struggled hard before he died. A few minutes, and the crowd quietly dispersed. Many thousands were present. The ages of the malefactors were—Stew, twenty; Evans, twenty-two. Stew had a boyish aspect. They were dressed as mechanics.

Murder at Leeds.—An investigation before Mr. Blackburn, Coroner for the borough of Leeds, relative to the death of Elizabeth Illingworth, the wife of William Illingworth, clock-maker, Wortley, Leeds, whose death had been caused by arsenic, was brought to a close a few days ago, by the Jury, who had been sworn to inquire into the circumstances of the case, returning a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against Ann Simpson, a woman with whom the husband of the deceased had long lived. She was committed to York Castle, for trial at the next Assizes.

Chapter of the Order of St. Patrick.—The Lord Lieutenant, as Grand Master of the Most Illustrious Order of St. Patrick, held a Chapter on Saturday, at Dublin Castle, when the Earl of Rosse and the Marquis of Waterford, having received the honour of knighthood, were admitted as Knights of the Order, with the usual formalities. The Primate, Lord John Beresford, read the declaration, which was subscribed by the new Knights. During the investiture, the Lord Primate sat and stood alternately on the right of his Excellency the Grand Master, and on his left was placed his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin.

IRELAND.

Her Majesty has signified her Royal pleasure that her name should stand at the head of the list of contributors to the repairs of the Cathedral and Chapter-house of St. Patrick's, Dublin, with the munificent donation of £200.

The Repeal Association.—Mr. Mullen was the Chairman of the meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday. He spoke with great confidence about Repeal, and denied that there was any apathy abroad on the subject. He said he had been lately in Meath, and there he found the same feelings in full activity which existed at the time of the great meeting on the memorable 15th of August, at Tara. (Cheers.) Mr. Ray read a letter from the "Liberator," in which he stated that he had been so busy upon the Charitable Bequests Act, that he had not had time to prepare his promised address to the Irish people, but enclosed £51 from himself and thirty-five members of his family, as a contribution to the Repeal rent. (Hear, hear.) He was desirous, on returning to town, which he would do so soon as he could tear himself away from that delightful place, to make arrangements which would prevent Repeal members from attending Parliament, which he thought quite a useless employment for them. Mr. O'Brien moved a vote of thanks to Mr. O'Connell and the numerous members of his family who had made this handsome contribution to the funds. This being carried, Mr. Ray read a letter from Mr. Thomas Steele, giving an account of his pacific embassy and tour to Cavan, Leitrim, and other parts. The envoy represented himself as having done wonders in quieting disturbances wherever he went. He had only, in fact, to come, to see, and to conquer. Mr. W. Smith O'Brien made another oration about Repeal. He touched upon the question whether the Irish Repeal members generally should attend in Parliament or not. He (Mr. O'Brien) felt that they only exposed their weakness by appearing there. And as to inducing John Bull to concede Repeal, they might as soon expect the wolf to give up its prey. (Hear, hear.) The Vice-Agitator then touched on a great variety of topics. Mr. O'Brien then contended that Mr. O'Connell had not lost his influence, but was now, as ever, the undisputed leader of the Irish people on the subject of Repeal. (Hear.) The Charitable Bequests Act, he admitted, had served as a diversion, and caused great division among the Irish people; but yet he trusted that the Irish people would not lose sight of Repeal. The Repeal rent must be kept up and collected, not upon some sudden impulse, but coolly, regularly, and systematically. He affirmed that there was no ground for desponding. The Repeal Committee were, one and all, most sanguine on the subject. He did not want to get within the clutches of the Attorney-General—he was not ambitious of an indictment thirty yards long to be preferred against him; but he did aspire to see the day when Ireland would have an army of her own, to fight for the British Empire, if necessary; but, at all events, for the liberties of Ireland.—The Repeal rent for the week was about £220.

A Parrot Examined as a Witness.—A very extraordinary instance of the examination of a parrot as a witness occurred a few days ago, at the College-green Police-office, Dublin, under the following circumstances:—Mr. Jones H. Davis summoned Mr. Moore for detaining a parrot, his property. Mr. E. Fullam appeared for the defendant.—The magistrate (Mr. Hitchcock) asked: Did you lose a parrot, and when?—Complainant: Yes, your worship, I lost a parrot, and a very good one too.—Mr. Fullam: The parrot is here, or at least outside the court. Complainant: Then bring in the bird, and I'll engage I'll soon prove my case by his evidence. (Laughter.)—Mr. Hitchcock: If the bird is to be examined as a witnes, he ought not to be in court; he must be subject to the rule of other witnesses. (Laughter.)—Complainant: Never fear, your worship; he'll not say a word except the truth. (Renewed laughter.)—Mr. Hitchcock: Well, go on, and let us hear your evidence, at any rate.—Mr. Davis said, on Sunday evening, the 28th of April last, he lost the bird, and did not see it after that until Friday evening last. (Here an immense cage, covered with cloth, was carried into the board-room, amid a shout of laughter. The cage was placed in the dock.)—Witness: I will give up the whole matter if the parrot will not prove my case. He is my principal witness. (Roars of laughter.)—Mr. Fullam: And do you swear, Sir, that Mr. Moore stole him?—Witness: No, certainly not, for I don't think he did; but it may have been stolen by some person, and sold to Mr. Moore. I lost it, at all events; and it was either stolen or taken away, which comes to the same thing in the end, so far as I am concerned. The bird is now in court, and let me take him on my finger, and ask him two or three questions; and if he don't answer to my satisfaction and that of all present, I will give up the case. (Loud laughter.)—Mr. Fullam: Do you intend to have him sworn? If you do, I'd like to know on what book, as it is very likely he is a heathen or a Turk (Laughter.)—A voice behind: Get him a Koran, then—(laughter); in the middle of which the parrot commenced whistling, "Take your time, Miss Lucy," amid a scene of the most boisterous mirth.—Mr. Fullam: Let him be examined by you, and then I have a right to cross-examine him. (Laughter.) What words did you teach him?—Here the cage was uncovered, and the parrot stared about the board-room for some time, until Mr. Davis stepped over to him and said, "Come, old fellow, give me a kiss." The bird, which is a very pretty one, thrust its neck out and kissed Mr. Davis with great apparent fondness, whilst the bystanders were almost convulsed with laughter. A fat young fellow here came forward, and said that the bird would do the same to any one in the room, and therefore it was no proof that he belonged to Mr. Davis. Mr. Davis said that the parrot would not kiss any one but himself, and cautioned the lad not to try the experiment; but the advice was unheeded, and the boy, stepping over to the cage, asked for a buss also. The bird looked at him for a moment, bristled up its feathers, stretched out its neck, and seized the boy by the lip, out of which it nearly took a mouthful before it could be loosened; and the shouts of the lad, mingled with the laughter, had a very excellent effect indeed. Mr. Davis requested any other gentleman who pleased to ask the parrot for a kiss, but the invitation was politely declined by the whole of the company. He again begged the favour of a salute from the bird, which was granted with affection, and then he appealed to the Bench and the audience if the kind bird was not his property.—Mr. Hitchcock said the evidence was very strong in his favour certainly; but Mr. Fullam said that his client was by no means satisfied with the proof adduced on that point.—Mr. Davis: Very well (taking the bird out of the cage on the forefinger of his right hand), I will ask him a few questions now, and I think I will settle the matter. "Tell me, old fellow, what does the dog say?" The answer was a Bow, wow, wow, so loud and musical that one would imagine the "Kildare hounds" had run a fox into the board-room. When the laughter which followed had ceased, Mr. Davis again asked, "Well, what does the cat say?" The parrot gave a sly glance round the room, and then commenced purring a little, after which he set up mewing, which forcibly reminded every person present of a congregated meeting of all the tom-cats in the city.—Mr. Davis asked was there any more proof necessary? and Mr. Hitchcock said the evidence was quite conclusive, and he would order the bird to be returned to its original owner, Mr. Davis.—The parties then left the court, the parrot whistling "There's nae luck about the house," amid loud and continued laughter.

Alleged Conspiracy to Murder Archbishop Murray.—The Dublin correspondent of the Morning Herald asserts that there has been a conspiracy to murder the Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Murray. The statement is to the effect, that on Sunday last, the Rev. Mr. O'Carroll ascended the pulpit in Westland-row Chapel, Dublin, and previous to his sermon observed that it was his most painful duty to inform the congregation that a conspiracy had been discovered in the county of Tipperary, which had for its object the murder of the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, Archbishop of Dublin. This extraordinary statement produced considerable excitement. The rev. gentleman proceeded to observe that the intelligence of this awful design was that morning communicated to their revered prelate by a magistrate of the county of Cork. The correspondent in question proceeds to give the following explanation upon the subject. He says "It appears that an anonymous letter, with the 'Tipperary' post mark, was received by a magistrate in the county of Cork, calling upon him to go at once to Archbishop Murray, and apprise him that 'three devils' had determined to take his life. The magistrate enclosed the letter to Dr. Murray, by whom it was received on Sunday morning, and we must infer that his Grace believed the contents to be true when he gave permission to the Rev. Mr. O'Carroll to allude to it in the pulpit." It is right to add that the Correspondent of the Morning Chronicle denies the truth of the statement, and several of the Dublin papers express their doubts of its authenticity.

EVERYBODY'S COLUMN.

THE PAGE OF MURDERS.

On reading an account of three executions for murder, and two committals for trial upon one page of Tuesday's "Times."

The teeming page of news spread wide
Before us broad and bold,
We raised it with a wond'ring thought
Of what it might unfold
To the mind's curious gaze, that peers
Through all our social life,
And longs to know its hopes and fears
Its passion and its strife!

How deep absorbed the spirit grows
In morbid, mad delight,
Over the world events that stir,
Awaken, and excite!
That move the human river on
With all its changing hues,
And roll upon the greedy mind
Its living stream of Lews!

Column on column: the eye's wings
Glance on as quick as time,
And pounce, as they were equal prey,
On Folly and on Crime!
No wretched mime too frivolous!
Too dark no dreadful deed!
Through fair and good, through tears and blood,
The lust is still to read!

We took the page, like other men,
To glean its feast of food,
But with some hope while reading on,
To read for others' good.
Good-will to all mankind for us
That full broad page unfurl'd,
Oh! not in selfishness, but part
For wisdom and the world.

The Court! Philosophy may glean
Stern morals near a throne!
Fashion!—the fool-thing revels in Derision of its own—
For fools make game of fools:—the 'Change,
Fat Commerce and the Marts!
Gold, Trade and Barter still will find
Altars in human hearts!

We read, and next the glowing world
Of Politics lay bare.
It humbled all our soul to see
How Party grovelled there!
The Church! We paused and wondered how Religion reached its goal,
When Bishops struggled harder for
The Surplice than the Soul!

We turned to petty Courts of Law,
Depravity and drink,
Where Solons say so much to prove
How little they must think!
Where Magisterial voice is raised
To Wisdom's highest pitch,
To draw its brave distinctions 'twixt
The erring poor and rich!

At last a horrid march of crime,
And blood, and hate, and rage,
Lay blearing round us! There they were —Five Murders on One Page!
While two suspected wretches still Lingered untried—we saw
Three more of those who wreaked them lie
Dead in the grasp of Law!

One of the three whom Death had hurl'd,
As the last stage he trod,
Out of his dark and brooding world,
Up to the throne of God!—
Was scarce on manhood's threshold;—young,
Comely, frank-looking, fair—
'Twould take a piercing eye to find
One touch of Murder there!

Still it was proved that he had work'd
A bitter bad career,
Through all the early steps of crime,
Its plunges and its fear—
Its mad delusions—promptings fierce—
Insane revenge: all good
Was ulcered at his heart—and then,
He bathed his soul in blood!

The other was cheerful man,
Made morbid mad by drink—
Who lost in dissipation's whirl
The power to work or think.
Work was denied the drunkard—thought
Was more than he might dare;
So, with a riot in his brain,
He plunged into despair!

He murdered one he loved—because
His crime forbade him wed—
And then through suicide he sought
To join the faithful dead.
But men revived him, that the world
His bitterer end might see,
And hanged him for his ghastly deed
Upon the gallows tree!

The last—a girl—with subtle drug
Did her own father kill:
God! from what corners of the heart
Doth Crime such guilt distil?
She was a youthful murderess, too,
Flushed full of sin!—Oh Life!
Ought we to take thee while remorse
So bathes the soul in strife?

These three were hanged; the other two
Have yet to meet the doom
Which finds them foul or innocent—
More life, or felon-tomb!
But is it not a fearful stain
Upon our Christian age,
To find within one printed sheet
Five Murders on a Page?

This fearful fact go ponder o'er,
Oh Lawgivers, and pause,
To see if Wisdom may devise
Prevention in your laws;
And weigh beside if right of Death
Into your hands be given
('Gainst even one who murdereth)
By so'emn gift of Heaven!

If ye should turn the young away,
So utter crushed with sin,
And scarcely give their souls the time
For life to enter in;
Or let a hard life expiate
Its horrors in remorse—
Through penitence and punishment
To lead them to the Cross!

CONVERSION OF PEAT INTO COAL.

It is asserted that an ingenious chemist has succeeded in converting peat into coal within a short period of time. If the works of the great laboratory of nature, perfected during centuries, can thus be performed by art in a few weeks, it will indeed cause a great social and national revolution.

A DANGEROUS COOK-SHOP.

The Merthyr Guardian says, that in one of the fashionable regions of that town, the keeper of a cook-shop designates his establishment "A Hateing House."

DERIVATION OF THE WORD RUBRIC.

By the word Rubric is implied a rule or direction. It is derived from the latin word "rubrica," which signifies red earth, red ochre, &c.; and it is employed to designate the rules which are laid down in the Book of Common Prayer, to direct the minister and people in their performance of divine worship. These rules were formerly printed in red letters, to distinguish them from the prayers and other parts of the liturgy, which were printed in black letters.

IMPROVED COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA.

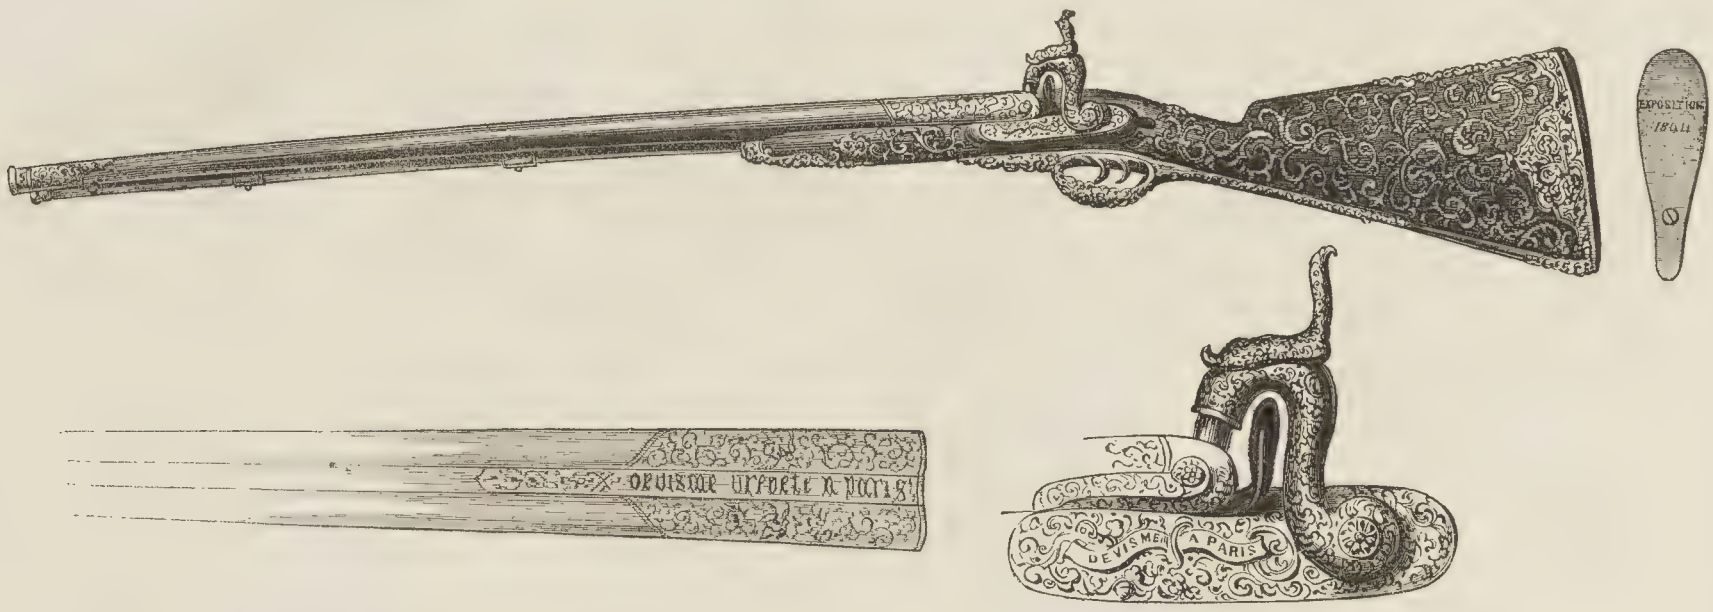
On looking over some of the papers received by the last Overland Mail, we find that the Government in India are engaged in expediting the communication between that country and England. Several steamers are in the course of construction at Bombay. The Bombay steamers are to ply monthly to and from Suez direct; no delay on account of passages or luggage is to be permitted; every consideration being postponed for the sake of the acceleration of the mails. It is expected that the distance between London and Bombay will, throughout the fair season, be on all occasions accomplished within about twenty-eight days.

BEET-ROOT SUGAR IN FRANCE.

It appears, by an official return, that the number of places for the manufacture of beet-root sugar in France is decreasing. In November last there were thirty less than at the same period of the preceding year, when the number was three hundred and sixteen. The manufactories having sugar in store, but out of work, have decreased in a greater proportion. In November, 1843, there were fifty-nine; in 1844, there were only twenty-six. But the increase of the duty has had very little influence on this decrease of the manufactories, for those that continue to work go on increasing the quantity of their produce.

A GLASS OF ALE AND A YARD OF LAND.

It is not often, perhaps, that a man thinks, when he drinks a half-pint of ale, he is swallowing the price of a square yard of land! Yet so it is. There are 31,700 [illegible] in England, the rental of which is £30,000,000. An acre, therefore, at twenty-five years' purchase, is of the value of £23 19s. 2d., or 5750 pence. Divide this by 4840, the number of square yards in an acre, and you have a penny and a fifth as the average value of a square yard of English ground!



IMPROVEMENTS OF THE DAY.

This is indeed a stirring age for improvements in every branch of human industry. At, or nearly arrived at perfection, we hear of and see admirable specimens of printing and copying fine engravings and the letter-press of books, making copyrights worth nothing! There are means of stereotyping, by which a plate may be executed in a few hours, and we believe the whole process of baking be dispensed with. It is said that the new light produced from electricity, has at length been fixed so as to continue, and shine with a lustre never yet approached by other agents.

FONTENELLE AN EPICURE.

Fontenelle was partial to asparagus dressed with oil, but he was intimately acquainted with the abbé who loved to eat this delicious vegetable with butter. One day the abbé dropped in unexpectedly to dine with Fontenelle, who had ordered his favourite dish, with great liberality ordered that half should be dressed with oil and the rest with butter. The value of this sacrifice is proved by the sequel of the story. The abbé tumbled down dead in a fit, Fontenelle without a moment's delay rushed to the top of the stairs, and exclaimed to the cook, "Dress the whole with oil—the whole with oil, as I told you before."

FOWLING PIECE PRESENTED TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT, BY HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE FRENCH.

PLAN OF THE BARREL.

THE LOCK.

FOWLING-PIECES PRESENTED TO PRINCE ALBERT AND THE PRINCE OF WALES, BY LOUIS PHILIPPE.

THE piece presented by Louis Philippe to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, is a beautifully-formed and well-proportioned double-barrelled fowling-piece. The mountings and fittings of the most superb and elegant character. The stock is of ebony, exquisitely inlaid with silver, in an elegant arabesque foliated pattern of the most chaste design and beautiful finish. The locks, which are percussion, are composed of steel and silver, elaborately chased, and ornamented with antique foliage, surrounding a gold riband bearing the words, "Devisme à Paris." On the shoulder plate, the mountings of which are carried considerably up the stock, and chased and pierced in a style of elegance corresponding with the other fittings, and which is altogether composed of solid silver, are the words "Exposition, 1844." The trigger-guard, tips, &c., are also composed of silver, ornamented with figures and antique foliage. A shield, bearing the Royal Crown, and the monogram of L. P. is placed on the lock-stock. The barrels are of grained steel, tipped at the breech and muzzle with gold arabesque foliage, and on the rib is the inscription, "Devisme, brevéte à Paris." The length of the gun is 45½ inches, the barrel being 30.

That presented at the same time to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is not so elaborate in its ornaments, but of equal beauty in its design, and excellence in its workmanship. The stock is of walnut, mounted and fitted with silver. The lock is of silver, with the "death of the stag" on one side, and boar-hunt on the other, in gold, surrounded by antique foliage, and beneath the hammer the words, "Caron arquer du Roi." The hammer is composed of a pedestal surmounting a scroll of foliage; upon which stands a boy, one arm resting on a dead boar, the other holding a dagger. The head of the hammer is a dolphin's head, the mouth of which serves as a receptacle for the nipple. The shoulder-plate and mountings are of solid silver, in elegant foliage, upon which on either side, is represented, in gold raised figures, a fox-hunt and birds. The trigger-guard and other fittings are appropriately ornamented with gold baskets of fruit, heads of hares and foxes, pheasants, &c. The barrel is of grained steel, the breech and muzzle tipped with gold, in an extremely elegant foliated pattern, and having on the one side the legend, "Caron arquer du Roi," and on the other, "Année, 1844." The extreme length of the gun is 38 inches, the barrel 25 inches. This elegant little gun has been tried by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and found to act with ease and precision.

NAPLES, BY MOONLIGHT.

(From Mr. Burford's New Panorama.)

OF this beautifully-executed addition to the holiday sights of the Metropolis, we gave a brief notice in our Journal of Dec. 28. As a specimen of the novel effect which Mr. Burford has imparted to a locality somewhat familiar, however picturesque it may be, we have selected, to our thinking, the most meritorious portion of the painting.

We should premise that the present Panorama is an attempt to combine the various effects of moonlight, and Vesuvius in eruption; when "ocean, earth, and sky, all reflecting the broad glare, a rich and gorgeous glow of crimson is thrown over the whole, which, strangely, but beautifully, mingling with the pale and quiet moonlight, form together a glorious, sublime, and extraordinary scene, awfully grand, but indescribably lovely."

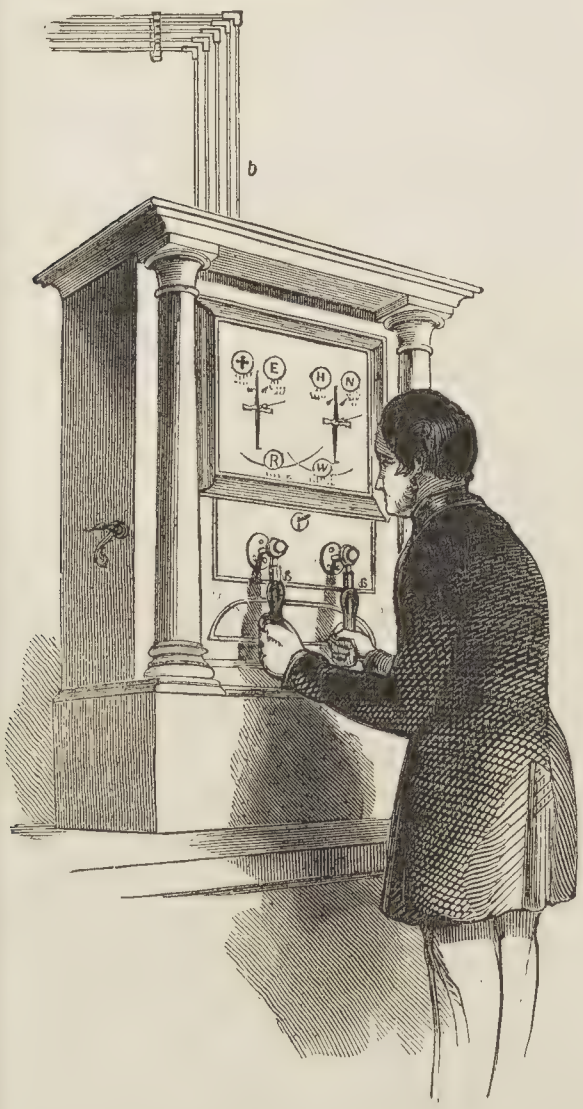
The view is taken from the Bay, immediately in front of the insulated rock, on which stands the Castle dell' Uovo; it consequently commands the entire of the two semicircular bays on which the city stands, and the thousands of objects of interest, of every period, by which it is surrounded. Towards the left is seen the long line of the Marino and Chiaja, behind which rise hill above hill, palace above palace, villas, vineyards, groves, and gardens, untill the extreme heights are crowned by the frowning fort of St. Elmo, and the extensive and romantic Convent of S. Martino or Certosa. To the west stretches an extensive suburb, backed by hills and mountains of that rich purple colour peculiar to the country, thickly studded with towns, convents, and villas, until the hill and promontory of Pausillippo terminates the land. Towards the right, the great bulk of the town presents the same mass of clustering buildings, the most commanding objects being the Royal Palace on Capo di Monte, and the Castle Nuovo, with the mole, the lighthouse, and the numerous vessels lying in the harbour; the whole backed by a long line of the Apennines, in some parts forming a graceful shadowy outline to the view, in others coming forth distinct, noble and dark—the piles they really are.

In our Engraving, the foreground shows the Castel dell' Uovo, and beyond it, the Royal Casino di Chiatamone; the dome immediately above is Le Crocelle de Chiatamone, in a line with the Soldiers' Garrison on Pizzo Falcone; the highest is the Castel dell' Uovo; to the right, the S. Martino Certosa; and further still, on the verge of the rock, the Pizzo Falcone. Immediately beneath is the Royal Treasury; and the darkened buildings in the distance, rising from the water's edge, are the great Hotel Cirella; Castel Nuovo; Santa Chiara (a large convent); and the Arsenal, and Royal Foundry; in front of which are the wet docks and basin for the King's barges. Altogether, this is a scene of unsurpassed beauty, exquisitely painted. "Vedi Napoli e poi mori," say the Italians; and, indeed, those who die without seeing it, miss one of the most enchanting scenes the world contains.

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS OF BRAZIL.

THE empire of Brazil dates only from the year 1822, when it declared itself independent of Portugal, and elected the Prince Regent, Don Pedro, Emperor. That independence was acknowledged by Portugal in 1825. In 1831, Don Pedro, having become unpopular with his subjects, and having by the death of John VI. succeeded to the crown of Portugal, abdicated in favour of his son, Don Pedro II., the present Emperor, who ascended the throne while yet a minor. The residence of a Royal Family in Brazil has attached a great number of the inhabitants to their interests, who have strenuously opposed the democratic party. Repeated convulsions have shaken the republic of La Plata and Buenos Ayres, but Brazil has remained comparatively tranquil. For an account of these atrocities the reader is referred to an article in our present number.



The Emperor was married on the 4th of September, 1843, to Theresa Christiana Maria, a Neapolitan Princess, whose portrait, with that of the Emperor, we here give. The Emperor's sister, Donna Francesca de Braganza, is married to the Prince de Joinville. The Royal Families at Portugal, Brazil, Naples, and France, are thus closely united.

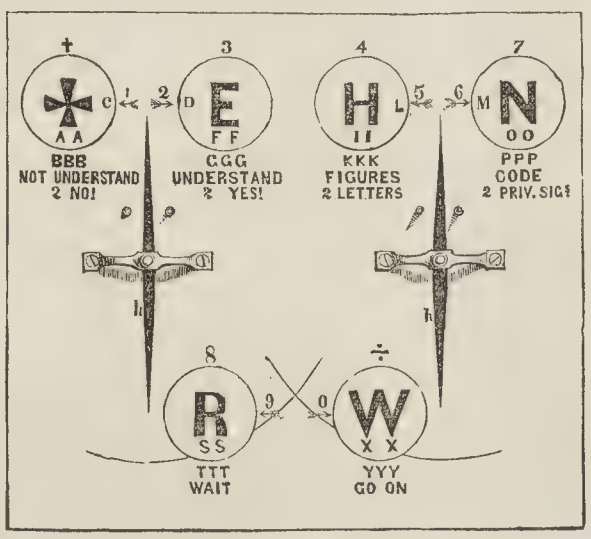
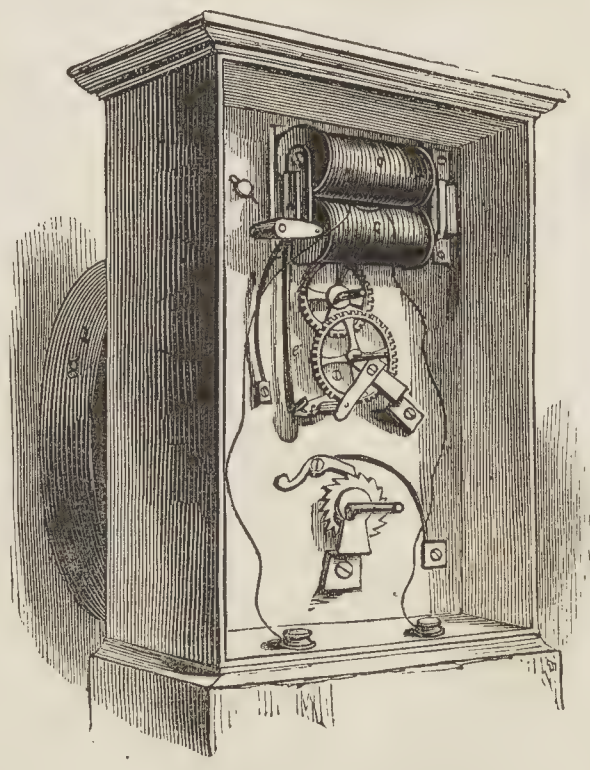
THE MURDER AT SALT-HILL.—THE ELECTRO-MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH AT SLOUGH.

AN extraordinary instance of the working of the newly-applied power of electro-magnetism will be found in the details of the "Murder at Salt-Hill," in another portion of our journal. The eventful circumstance is of such interest as to induce us to submit to our readers a series of Illustrations of the detailed means by which the intelligence of a suspected person being in a railway train, has been conveyed from Slough to the metropolis, after the train itself had started from the former place. The instrument of this important result is the Electro-Magnetic Telegraph on the Great Western Railway, between Paddington and Slough, a distance of eighteen miles, by which any communication can be made from one point to the other in an almost inappreciably short space of time. To Professor Wheatstone and Mr. Cooke we are indebted for this valuable application of electro-magnetism; they having made an entirely new arrangement of their Telegraph, by which it has been greatly simplified, and possesses considerable advantage over the former one.



THE GREAT WESTERN ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.

THE COILED MAGNETS.



We have already adverted to the performances of this Telegraph, and have engraved the exterior of the station at Slough, in which the apparatus is worked. We shall now present to our readers the details of such apparatus; before which, however, we shall relate, from the evidence on the Coroner's Inquest at Salt Hill, the steps which led to the successful employment of this novel means of communication.

THE INDEX.

The Rev. E. T. Champness, vicar of Upton-cum-Chalvey, examined. Hearing of the suspicious death of the deceased, and that a person in the dress of a Quaker was the last man who had been seen to leave the house, I proceeded to the Slough Station, thinking it likely he might proceed to town by railway. I saw him pass through the office, when I communicated my suspicions to Mr. Howell, the superintendent at the station. He left for London in a first-class carriage. Mr. Howell then sent off a full description of his person, by means of the Electric Telegraph, to cause him to be watched by the police upon his arriving at Paddington.

Mr. Howell, of the Slough Station, deposed as follows:—The prisoner left for town last night by the 7.42 train. I despatched orders by the telegraph to have the prisoner watched on his arrival at Paddington. A few minutes afterwards an answer was returned, stating that the suspected party had arrived, and that Sergeant Williams had left the terminus in the same omnibus for the City.

THE STRIKING APPARATUS.

The words of the communication were precisely as follows:—

THE MESSAGE.

A murder has just been committed at Salt Hill, and the suspected murderer was seen to take a first-class ticket for London, by the train which left Slough at 7h. 42m. p.m. He is in the garb of a Quaker, with a brown great coat on, which reaches nearly down to his feet: he is in the last compartment of the second first-class carriage.

THE REPLY.

The up-train has arrived; and a person answering, in every respect, the description given by telegraph, came out of the compartment mentioned. I pointed out the man to Sergeant Williams. The man got into a New-road omnibus, and Sergeant Williams into the same.

The Telegraphic apparatus consists of two wires suspended the length of the line, and attached at either end to the instrument as seen in Fig. 1, and a branch wire from the instrument, attached to a large metallic surface, imbedded in the earth, for completing the electric circuit. The wire at Paddington is connected with the gas-pipe, and that at Slough with the pump-engine. When the instrument is not in motion, the handles, a a, are down, as seen in Fig. 1, and the pointers remain in their vertical position. The handles are connected by an arrangement of pins and springs, with the battery and other wires.

The signals are given by two magnetic needles (see Fig. 2), or pointers, h, each suspended vertically on an axis passing through the dial. Behind the dial another pointer is fixed on each corresponding axis. A portion of the conducting-wire, many yards in length, is coiled (i k) round the galvano-meter frame, in which the magnet moves, so as to subject the magnet to the multiplied deflecting force of electric current. The motion of the pointers is limited by a fixed stop, or pin, at either side.

When a signal or communication is to be made, the operator, by turning the handle to the right or left, breaks the electric circuit, and presses the wire against pins connected with the battery poles; the coils of wire, i k, then receiving their full deflective force, attract the magnetic needles, h, to either side, according to the course of the current; thus, if the stream of electricity first passes into the coil k, then the needle will be attracted to the left, thus giving the whole motion necessary to the pointers. The movement of the handles and consequent deflection of the pointers at either end of the line are simultaneous, no noticeable period of time elapsing between the giving of the signal at one end, and its reception at the other.

The telegraph is so arranged as to give its communications, not by signs, but by letters; every word being spelt, and each letter having a distinct motion of the pointer, as will be seen by reference to the dial (Fig. 3). It is divided into five circles, each containing a number of letters and signs: h h are the magnetic needles, or pointers, by which the various letters are indicated. The left-hand needle moving to the left twice gives a, three times b, once to the right and once to the left c, once to the left and once to the right d, once to the right e, twice f, three times g. The order is then taken up by the right-hand needle moving once to the left for h, twice for i, three times for k, once to the right and once to the left for l, once to the left and once to the right for m, once to the right for n, twice for o, and three times for p. The remaining signs are made by the two needles working conjointly, so that the simultaneous movement of the two, once to the left indicates r, twice for s, three times for t, once to the right and once to the left for u, once to the right for w, twice for x, and three times for y. At the end of every word given, the left hand needle moving once to the right, to the cross, to indicate that the word is completed. If the word has been understood by the receiver of the communication, he moves the same pointer twice to the left and twice to the right, indicating yes; if not understood then the needle points twice to the right and twice to the left, indicating no, when the original word is repeated. By doubling the motions for each letter (or rather numerical letters), figures are given.

Previous to giving a signal, the operator calls the attention of the attendant, at the distant station, by the ringing of a bell, which is accomplished by means of a very ingenious and simple apparatus (see Fig. 4); c c are two coils of wire, the ends of which, passing through the bottom of the frame, are attached to the general wires of communication; d is a piece of soft iron attached to the lever e, and held firmly against the pin f; thus, immediately the magnetic current is broken, the disturbed electricity attracts with magnetic influence the iron d, releases the pin f, and consequently, by giving motion to the wheels, sets at liberty the striking hammer, which, acting upon the alarum bell g, gives the loud, clear ringing so necessary to attract instant notice.

The alarum is generally affixed to the top of the general signal apparatus (Fig. 1); but for the better explanation of its contrivance, we have removed the outer ornamental case.

It is well observed in the Times' report of the inquest, that, "had it not been for the efficient aid of the electric telegraph, both at Slough and Paddington, the greatest difficulty, as well as delay, would have occured in the apprehension of the party now in custody."

THE MURDER AT SALT-HILL.

In our last we gave an account of the murder, by poison, of a married woman, named Sarah Hart, which took place on the previous Wednesday, at the house where she resided, at Bath-place, Salt-hill, near Botham's Hotel. A coroner's inquest was held on Thursday (the 2nd instant) at the Three Tuns, Salt-hill, before John Charsley, Esq., the Coroner for Bucks. According to the evidence then produced, stifled screams had been heard to proceed from the residence of the deceased, who was found struggling in the agonies of death. Suspicion fell upon an elderly man, named Tawell, who formerly belonged to the Society of Friends, as he had been last seen with the deceased. He left very suddenly for London, from the Slough Station, but, by means of a communication by the electric telegraph, he was brought back, and examined before the Coroner. But little evidence was produced against him on the first occasion, and the inquest was adjourned till Saturday last. In our late impression last week, we gave an analysis of the proceedings on that day, and now subjoin a full report of them. The first witness examined was

Mr. Henry Montagu Champneys, surgeon, of Slough, who deposed as follows:—On Wednesday evening, shortly before seven o'clock, I was sent for to attend the deceased, in Bath-place, who, I was informed, was in a dying state. I ran there immediately, when I found her lying on her back on the floor of the room, and her head raised on a pillow. Her clothes were half-way up her legs, and her left stocking was down and torn. Her cap was lying by her side. Upon feeling her pulse, I fancied I felt three beats, but these not being continued, I imagined I must have been mistaken. Her eyes at this time were fixed. She moved her tongue and jaw slightly, but only once. I placed my hand upon her heart, but I felt no pulsation. I then saw she was dead. After some minutes had elapsed, I opened a vein, not with the idea of bringing her to life, but for the purpose of ascertaining if the state of her blood would enable me to form an opinion as to the cause of death. I then went to the Slough station, where I arrived at half-past seven o'clock, and where I saw the prisoner get into a first-class carriage, and leave for town. Mr. Howell, the superintendent at the station, at my suggestion, sent off a telegraphic communication to have the prisoner watched and traced upon his arrival at Paddington. Before I left the residence of the deceased to proceed to the station, a glass which contained a portion of pale beer, a porter bottle partly filled, and a bun, which I found on the table, I had placed on one side, in the care of Mrs. Ashlee, telling her to let no one touch them. I again went to the house at half-past nine o'clock the same evening, and thinking they might contain some deleterious matter, I took them away with me, for the purpose of ascertaining that fact, and they have been in my possession ever since. Upon smelling the mouth of the deceased, I could not detect any poisonous odour. Upon viewing the body the next day, I found no marks of external violence. I was then directed by the Coroner to make a post mortem examination in conjunction with Mr. Norblad, who was then with me. When I opened the vein, there was nothing unnatural in the appearance of the blood. Upon examining the brain, we found nothing to account for the death. The heart was found to be perfectly healthy. There was an old adhesion of the right lung, and, with that exception, the lungs were in a perfectly healthy state. We found the whole of the abdominal viscera rather fat, but generally healthy. We removed the stomach and its contents for further examination, as I considered, thus far, that nothing of a suspicious nature had shown itself. The internal surface of the coat of the stomach had rather more mucus than usual. I was then ordered by the Coroner to make a further examination, with Mr. Norblad, and the result is as follows:—Upon analysing the contents of the stomach, we found them to be generally acid. We tested them for various poisons, viz. for oxalic acid, sulphuric acid, and arsenic, but found none. We then tested them for those poisonous salts, antimony, lead, and copper, the presence of which we could not discover. They were then tested for prussic acid, and the results proved that poison to be present. It might not, however, have been prussic acid by itself, but that poison in conjunction with some salt nearly allied to it. I cannot say if we found sufficient prussic acid to have caused the death of the deceased, but I have every reason to believe that there was. I am of opinion there was sufficient to cause death. The appearance of the stomach would not assist me in forming an opinion if that poison were present. We could not detect the smell of prussic acid. We could not tell in what form the acid was administered, but I should think it was taken in a liquid state. I am of opinion the quantity found in the stomach would cause death rapidly. I am of opinion the deceased died from the effects of this poison. The porter found in the room of the deceased has not yet been analysed. There has not been time to test it since the last examination. We have not been able to discover what salt, if any, was taken in conjunction with the prussic acid. The salts of this acid have not the pungent and peculiar odour of prussic acid itself. Salts of prussic acid would produce death, but I am not aware how quickly.

Examined by Mr. Williams, on behalf of the prisoner.—The bottle containing the liquor I found on the table of the deceased was a common porter bottle. I smelt the breath of the deceased immediately after death, and there was no appearance of prussic acid. I know very little about the salts of prussic acid. Bitter almonds will cause a deposit of prussic acid. I cannot say what was the quantity of prussic acid we discovered, although I have said that there was sufficient to cause death.

William Martin, gardener, of Salt-hill, stated that he saw the deceased at a quarter-past six o'clock on Wednesday evening, between her house and the Windmill Hotel. Witness asked her what she was running so fast for, when she said, "I have got a friend come in, and I have been for a little stout for him." She appeared well and in good spirits, and ran off again towards her home. Witness had not seen the prisoner before he was in custody.

Mr. Edward Weston Norblad, surgeon, of Slough, was examined, but his statement was a mere corroboration of the opinion of Mr. Champneys.

Catharine White, barmaid at the Windmill (Botham's) Hotel, stated that, on Wednesday evening (the night of the supposed murder), about half past six o'clock, the deceased came to the bar, where she stayed about ten minutes, and bought a bottle of Guinness's stout. (The bottle found on the table at Bath-place was produced by Mr. Champneys, and identified as one of the same description which contained the stout sold by witness to the deceased). The cork was not the same. Witness lent the deceased a cork-screw. (The one found in Bath-place produced and identified.) Deceased, who appeared very well, did not say why she fetched the stout.

Mrs. Ashlee, who resided next door to the deceased, stated that there was an empty tumbler on the table in the room where she found the deceased, to whom some water was given out of it by Mrs. Burrett. (The glass still containing the remains of the water, produced by Mr. Perkins.) The glass appears to be the same. Witness never saw the prisoner before Wednesday last, when he went to Mrs. Hart's.

Mrs. Burrett, residing within two doors of the deceased, examined.—When I was called in by Mrs. Ashlee, immediately after she had found the body on the floor, I saw on the table a black porter bottle, two glasses, and a portion of a bun. One glass was half full of porter, and the other appeared to have had some in it, but it was empty. This glass I rinced out and gave deceased some water out of it. There was no particular smell in it. The water with which I rinced it out I threw into the fire-place.

This was all the evidence adduced, and the inquest was then adjourned till Wednesday.

CONCLUSION OF THE INQUEST, AND COMMITTAL OF TAWELL FOR MURDER.

On Wednesday morning the inquest upon the deceased woman was resumed at the Three Tuns, Salt-hill, before J. Charsley, Esq. The interest excited by the proceedings had not at all abated, the Jury-room being densely crowded during the whole of the proceedings, while the road leading to the tavern was occupied by a number of persons anxious to catch a glimpse of the prisoner, J. Tawell, who was brought up from Eton in a fly, in custody of a constable.

Mr. M. Chambers and Mr. Williams attended for the prisoner, who was detained in a private room until the Jury were prepared to deliver their verdict.

At ten o'clock the court was opened with the usual formalities, and the Jury having all answered to their names,

Mr. Norblad was called, and in answer to questions from the Coroner, said, I am a surgeon residing near Slough. I, in conjunction with Mr. Champneys, surgeon, have analysed the contents of the bottle and glass found in the house of the deceased. The bottle was about half full of porter. There was no particle of poison whatever in it. The bottle was delivered to me by Mr. Champneys. It contained no poison of any description. I have also analysed the liquid in the glass, which was given to me by Mr. Champneys, and that contains no poison. I have preserved the results of these analyses. They are in the possession of Mr. Champneys.

By Mr. Chambers.—Mr. Cooper, an eminent chemist in London, was with us when the analysation was made. He fully agreed with me that there was no poison in either bottle or glass. The analysation took place in London.

By the Coroner.—The manipulation was principally conducted by Mr. Cooper; but from my own knowledge and experience I can take upon myself to say that there was no poison in the bottle or the glass.

Mr. H. Montagu Champneys, surgeon, of Salt-hill, gave precisely similar evidence as to the result of the analysis; and, in answer to Mr. Chambers, said Mr. Cooper, in his presence, applied tests to the porter which would have shown the presence of several poisons. In the whole of his experience, he had never heard that the elements of prussic acid were to be found in porter, nor in that beverage which was made in London. He had been in the profession since July, 1835; and, when a student, had attended lectures upon chemistry, and he then occasionally manipulated himself, but more frequently saw it done by the lecturer. In the present case, the whole of the tests were applied by Mr. Cooper, in his own laboratory, in London. He was not aware that the presence of prussic acid in all bodies had been proved; but was quite aware that it might be evolved by animal decomposition; that, in fact, it was to be found in bodies, without its having been taken or administered in the shape of poison. Was aware that prussic acid was first discovered by Scheel, about 1800. Mr. Cooper did not decompose the beer into its elements; they distilled it, and applied the tests to the distilled liquid.

Mrs. Burrett was next called, merely for the purpose of signing the depositions given by her at a former examination.

Mr. Norblad recalled.—There was a bun also found in the deceased's room. The bun was subjected to the same analysation as the liquid. There was no poison found in it.

Mr. Champneys stated that he found the bun on the table in the deceased's room. On analysation, it was clear there was no poison found in it.

The Coroner.—There was no further evidence to be adduced on the part of the Crown. He did not know whether the prisoner had any witnesses to produce; if he had, they would be heard.

Mr. M. Chambers trusted the Coroner would allow him to make a few observations on behalf of the prisoner.

The Coroner.—It is contrary to the rule of the Court to allow counsel to make speeches in defence of an accused party; they are allowed to attend and watch the proceedings, to cross-examine witnesses, and produce what evidence they think proper; but counsel are not allowed to make speeches to influence the minds of the Jury. The case on the part of the Crown is closed—it is for you to say now whether you call any witnesses on the part of the defendant.

Mr. Chambers said there was no person who at present could properly be described as defendant. The Court was one simply for the purpose of inquiry generally, and not for inquiring as to the guilt or innocence of any particular person. The Coroner's duty was to inquire into the cause of the death of one of the Queen's subjects, and not to inquire into any charge which might be brought against any particular person. Therefore, he appeared before the Court, by the Coroner's permission, as the advocate of a person who had been taken into custody; and it was to be presumed it was for some offence connected with the death of the person who was the subject of this inquiry. He had been permitted, by the courtesy of the Coroner, to appear there as advocate, to watch the proceedings on behalf of his client; but, before he retired from the Coroner's presence, he wished distinctly to understand to what extent he was to be permitted to carry his professional exertions—whether he was to be limited only as to the cross-examination of witnesses? He understood the Coroner to say that he had no right to be heard, except in comment upon the evidence given that day to the Jury; but, if he were to be confined in his observations to that limit, he thought he should be doing more injury than good to his client by such advocacy. He would, however, wish to be heard, not in defence of any particular party, but to suggest to the consideration of the Court and the Jury that, on the evidence as it stood, there was so much doubt with regard to any individual, that—

The Coroner.—I must interrupt you. You are now doing the very thing which you said you would ask permission to do. I hope I shall give a fair and upright charge to the Jury, but I cannot permit you to direct them.

Mr. Chambers.—Nothing could be more improper than for an advocate to abuse the limited privilege which was permitted to him, and he was glad that he had been interrupted. If the Coroner told him, he would at once sit down; but it seemed to him that the case was one involved in great mystery and doubt.

The Coroner.—Are there any witnesses for the defendant?

Mr. Chambers,—Not any, Sir; and forgive me for again deprecating the use of the word defendant. I do not think I should be properly performing my duty were I to look upon the present as any charge against my client.

The Coroner then proceeded to read his summing up from a paper which he held in his hand. He begged the Jury to give the verdict in accordance with the evidence, and with the evidence only. There was no direct evidence as to the administration of any poison to the deceased, but there was indirect evidence sufficient to enable them to form an opinion. There were the means found in the deceased's house by which poison might have been administered to her without her knowledge, and that she had swallowed poison was evident. Although it was possible she might have swallowed the poison knowingly herself, still it was very improbable. She was seen by White and Marlow at half-past six in the evening, well and in good spirits. The next account they had of her was from Mrs. Ashlee, who, between six and seven o'clock, heard deceased's stifled screams, and on running out met John Tawell coming from deceased's cottage, and asked what was the matter with her neighbour, but could get no reply. Now, it was most important to consider why a man should have left her in the agonies of death without giving any alarm. It was evident that the poison had been administered after the stout had been fetched, and that the poison was quick and most deadly in its effects. With regard to the evidence affecting the prisoner, Mrs. Ashlee saw the Quaker-looking person coming from the door while deceased was dying, and she identified Tawell as that person. It was an important fact, that on the Monday when the prisoner was with deceased, Keziah Harding had heard him ask her if she would be alone the next time he called, on the Wednesday or Thursday. They should also recollect that a description of the Quaker had been forwarded by the telegraph to London, and that by the description he had been followed and arrested, and that when arrested he said he had not been at Slough the day before. There was no direct evidence to show who had administered the poison; but circumstantial evidence, in many cases, was of much greater cogency. If they had any doubt as to the guilt of John Tawell, they would give him the benefit of that doubt; but if they had no moral doubt as to his guilt—if the evidence laid before them, and the fair conclusions which they would draw from it, satisfied their own consciences that guilt attached to him, they would find a verdict accordingly, and without any regard to the station in life of the accused. It was but fair that they should consider their verdict was not final, and that if it were against the accused, he would have the benefit of a strict and impartial investigation elsewhere.

The room was then cleared, and the Jury remained in consultation three quarters of an hour, when the prisoner, together with his counsel and solicitor, were called in, and informed that a verdict of "Wilful Murder against John Tawell, for poisoning Sarah Hart with prussic acid," had been returned.

The prisoner heard the verdict without any apparent emotion.

As the Court were about to rise.

Mr. Chambers renewed his application that the property found upon the person of the prisoner might be given up to him now that the inquiry was over, and the Coroner's duty to all intents and purposes ended, especially as he (Mr. Chambers) could now positively assert, and not merely assume, that that property had nothing whatever to do with the offence imputed to the unfortunate man.

The Coroner, in answer to the application, replied that he could not say that the money had nothing to do with the case. The amount was very important, and he thought it would be more advisable for another Court to see the money. He could not give up the money, but he would take care that the officers should not dissipate it; they would merely detain it in the character of trustees. The prisoner would not be damnified, for he (the Coroner) understood he was a man of property.

Mr. Chambers.—The watch?

The Coroner.—I cannot let the watch be given up either.

Mr. Chambers.—You stated at the last examination that there might be something material connected with the money, inasmuch as you had received other information of considerable importance. Now that could not be the case; because, if it had been, the information ought to be produced.

The Coroner would not say that it was not important now, from information he had received.

Mr. Chambers protested against any information being kept back.

The Coroner said, he had kept back no information. He had heard no evidence except in Court. He had employed an officer to investigate the case. What that officer had reported to him could not be evidence, as the witnesses were not present, and, if it could be received, it was merely corroborative of evidence already taken, and would not enlighten the minds of the Jury.

The prisoner was then committed, under the Coroner's warrant, to Aylesbury Gaol, to take his trial at the next assizes for the murder of the deceased.

ADDITIONAL PARTICULARS RESPECTING THE ACCUSED.

The following is a correct description of the prisoner:—

He is about five feet six inches in height, sixty-one years of age, with a small, narrow face, and light hair, rather inclining to a grey colour. He has no whiskers; his person is rather thin. He has a trifling squint in his left eye, the pupil inclining towards his nose. He is attired in the garb of a Quaker, wearing a broad-brimmed hat, black waistcoat, dark olive-coloured trousers, white cravat, and a loose great coat.

He is somewhat quick and rapid in his manner, and appears to be a man of considerable intelligence.

Some years ago, the prisoner was tried and found guilty of forgery, and sentenced to be transported for twenty-one years. The forgery was committed upon a relation of Mr. Smith, one of the partners in the Uxbridge Bank.

His good conduct while in the colony obtained for him a ticket of leave, after having served seven years of his time.

He then set up in business at Sydney, as a chemist and druggist, and embarked generally in the shipping trade, in which he was so exceedingly successful, that, in the course of a few years he had saved upwards of £20,000—some persons have reported £60,000.

As soon as the crime of forgery, in this country, had been clearly established against him, he was discarded by the Society of Friends, and no longer acknowledged to be a member of that body.

Upon his return to England from Botany Bay, between six and seven years ago, he applied to the Society to be again admitted amongst them, which was peremptorily refused.

He then went to live at Croydon, where he resided but a very short time. Thence he went to Berkhampstead, where, about four years ago, he married a highly respectable widow, a Quakeress, named Cutforth. This lady kept a ladies' school at the time of her marriage, but this extensive establishment was given up immediately after her union with Mr. Tawell, who lived, with his wife and family, in a spacious house, nearly opposite the church, at Berkhampstead, in very good style.

He had two sons and a daughter by his first wife. Both the sons have died within the last five years. The daughter, a girl about seventeen years of age, resided with her father and stepmother, at Berkhampstead.

A child is the fruit of his last marriage, which is now ab out eighteen months old.

The distressing intelligence of the apprehension of her husband was then communicated to Mrs. Tawell through the medium of the London papers.

It has been stated that the eldest child of the deceased Sarah Hart, a boy about five years of age, bears a close resemblance to the prisoner. From circumstances which have transpired since the first examination of the prisoner before the Coroner's Jury, there is said to be little doubt that he is the father of both the children of his former servant. He was always known at the different lodgings occupied by the deceased as Mr. Talbot.

Mr. Tawell is well known in the City, and said to be engaged to some extent in the shipping trade and exportation of goods abroad. He is a subscriber to the Hall of Commerce, the Jerusalem Coffee House, and other public mercantile establishments.

At one time Tawell kept a splendid establishment in Regent's-park.

The unfortunate female whose death he is suspected of having caused was a very superior person for one in her station in society, and was allowed by him to act as mistress of the house. Shortly before his second marriage the deceased was induced to quit his establishment, he engaging to settle a liberal weekly allowance on her. He is very partial to the study of natural history, and at his house at Berkhampstead there are many rare and valuable specimens. His furniture is said to combine, in a remarkable degree, the attributes of elegance and simplicity. He kept up to the last six servants; and so late as four days before the melancholy affair at Salt-hill took place, he was driving through London in a handsome cabriolet, drawn by two horses, when he invited some of his friends to spend a few days with him at his residence in the country. Though he had never been received a second time into communion with the Friends, he was much respected by many of their number. He had the reputation of being, not only an intelligent and scientific, but a very philanthropic man; and it is certain that he expended large sums in charitable and benevolent objects.

At his trial for the forgery he conducted his own case, and made a very long and able speech in his defence. On a verdict of guilty being returned, he craved permission shortly to address the Court. Permission was granted, and having had reason to believe that his sentence would be seven years' imprisonment in the hulks—a belief in which it afterwards transpired he was quite correct—he begged to intimate to the Judge that, rather than endure the degradation for seven years of working as a slave, he would prefer fourteen years' transportation to New South Wales. Thither he was accordingly sent; and, having by his good conduct, in a few years obtained his ticket of liberty, he commenced business as a druggist, as above stated. He returned to this country, and, after remaining here for some months, proceeded a second time, now as a free man, to New South Wales. After remaining for some years more in that colony, he determined on returning to England, here to settle for life.

The funeral of the late unfortunate Sarah Hart, took place on Thursday afternoon; the mournful procession leaving Bath-place at a quarter past two o'clock for the village churchyard of Farnham Royal, in which parish the lamentable event occurred.

The following is a copy of the only document found amongst the papers of the deceased, in the handwriting of the accused, signed with his initials, and written in a small neat hand:—

"See Genesis, 4th chapter, and part of 7th verse; Psalms, 1st chapter and 4th chapter, 2nd to 5th verses; and 103rd chapter, and 107th chapter, 6th to 22nd verses; Isaiah, 1st chapter, 15th to 19th verses; Matthew, 6th chapter, 14th and 15th verses. and 31st to 33rd verses; Romans, 12th chapter; Ephesians, 4th and 5th chapters.

"The word men is generally used, but the sense is meant for both men and women, because woman could not be properly put; and we must, in reading the Scriptures, not expect to be satisfied with so doing, unless we endeavour to seek in our own minds for that spirit in which they were written for our instruction.—J. T."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATE SIR WILLIAM NOTT.

The lamented death of Major-General Sir William Nott, which took place at Carmarthen on New Year's Day, was announced in our late impression last week. In early life William Nott left Neath, and accompanied his father to Carmarthen, where the latter lived respected many years. He was proprietor of the Ivy Bush Hotel, and an extensive mail contractor. The family descended maternally from the Harveys of Norfolk.

He entered the service of the East India Company in 1808, and in the earliest portion of his career gave promise of those high qualities which afterwards distinguished him in life.

At the conclusion of the war in Affghanistan, Gen. Nott found that his health had become so impaired by the climate as to render it necessary for him to return immediately to England. At the Cape of Good Hope, on the homeward voyage, the gallant General was first attacked by that illness which has terminated so fatally.

On arriving at Carmarthen, the General repurchased Job's Well, and immediately caused the house to be taken down, having it in contemplation to erect a splendid villa in the Elizabethan style of architecture. The work has been for some time in progress: but it was ordained that the General should not live to see its completion. The veteran's constitution, however, was not easily overcome; and when at last nature became exhausted, he expired without a groan, and, as it appeared, as if he was going to sleep.

The General has left four children by his first wife, the daughter of Henry Scomboe, Esq., an attorney in the Supreme Court of Calcutta, viz., the Rev. William Nott, Miss Nott, R. M. Nott, Esq., and Miss Charlotte Nott, all of whom, together with Lady Nott, were present at the last awful moment when Sir William was called to meet his Maker. His brother, George Nott, Esq., was sent for, but did not arrive until after the General's death.

The affection of Lady Nott (who is scarcely more than twenty years of age) was unbounded, and her attention to him in his last illness was proportionately self-sacrificing. On the fatal tidings of the gallant General's death being communicated to her Ladyship, she was seized with strong hysterics, and it was feared that some serious illness would result to her Ladyship.

The funeral of the late gallant General, which was a public one, and which, in addition to his family and private friends, was attended by the nobility and surrounding gentry, took place on Monday, with great splendour, at Carmarthen, the whole corporation also joining in the sad and solemn ceremony. The remains of the gallant General were interred in the family vault of his ancestors, beneath the Old Church, amidst the deep sympathy and regret of hundreds of his fellow-townsmen.

Sir Thomas Willshire, K.C.B., the commandant of Chatham garrison, received instructions last week to hold in readiness for embarkation, on board the freight ship Anne, for New South Wales, the following detachments of officers and men:—51st Regiment—22 men; 58th—Lieutenant-Colonel Wynyard, Captain Leigh, Lieutenant Petley, Ensign Wynyard, Assistant-Surgeon Philson, and 196 men; 96th—Assistant-Surgeon M'Andrew, and 18 men; 99th—45 men. Total—6 officers and 281 men.

The Brevet.—It is now said, in well-informed quarters, that, notwithstanding the strong expectations of a Brevet, those who indulged hopes of being included within its range, are doomed to disappointment. There will, after all, be no Brevet.

Recruiting for the Army.—The Horse Guards and Parks present daily a more than usual display of enlisting cockades, both for the cavalry and infantry, as also for the service of the Hon. East India Company.

Rumoured Increase of the Navy.—The Globe has a report that a very large addition to the navy estimates will be proposed in the coming session. It says, "We hear from a quarter likely to be well informed, that appearances in the dockyard and naval arsenal of Cherbourg are viewed with suspicion; and that these are the real causes of the presumed purposes of the Government to increase our naval means of national defence."

Appointments.—Lieutenants: S. Robertson, to the Comus; W. H. Stewart, to the Superb; W. K. Hall, to the Vindictive. Mate: Wm. Swinburn, to the Amazon. Assistant-Surgeon: Cecil Crandell, to the San Josef.

A LIVELY COMMENT UPON THE NEWS OF THE WEEK.

There is occasionally a touch of drollery in public affairs, even at their most dense season of dullness; and a receuil may be gathered from the tit-bits of journalism, by which spirits inclined for sport may make them entertaining in spite of their lead. In glancing over the public occurrences of the current week—as well as at the touches of anecdote and character which have been sub-editorially thrown in to lighten the columns of our contemporaries—we have been struck by some incitements to pleasantry, which we willingly re-register in "other form and pressure" to woo the smiles or laughter of our readers. They form gossip—mere gossip; but they are pabulum for the curious, for they affect the "things that be."

We have alway had, from time to time, goodish things from the United States—absence of mind, possible impossibilities, and so forth—but since the election of "Polk," the dance of humour seems to have grown riotous, and has polked (or poked) its fun into the departments of justice and severer law. We have seen nothing better than the following account of a New York Court Martial, which we lyricise for the benefit of musical society:—

THE AMERICAN COLONEL AND HIS SWORD.

A Yankee-land Colonel, a regular brick,
Who would fight if you ask'd him through thin and through thick,
But whom—a true Yankee—nor drilling nor pay
Could get him to make up his mind to "obey;"
Got this General's orders in words loud and few,
"Do this, sir," and answered, "Be shot if I do."

The wrath of the General was not denied,
The army was scandalised—Colonel was tried;
And the Court Martial's sentence recorded as thus,
With proper parade, palaver, and fuss:—
"For refusal of orders and choleric word,
For one month, Colonel Bounceful must give up up his sword."

Then up got the Colonel—"I cannot resign,
Please the Court, and the President, what isn't mine.
I've no sword of my own—but when great days require one,
I go to old Barber, the goldsmith, and hire one.
Who's known me a good many summers, and so
Lets me have it, good fellow, uncommonly low!
And I now make no doubt if the Court holds its word,
And insists, for one month, upon having the sword,
That by going to Barber, and stating the case,
From hard cash in hand he'll not right about face,
But will take the Court's visit as perfectly seasonable,
And let it to them on terms equally reasonable!"

This mode of keeping up discipline in the army is of a piece with the duels in the Senate—the bowie-knife in the forum, and the Lynch law everywhere; but to do it justice, it has a great deal more fun in it—and has given us, in this instance, a very hearty laugh.

Scarcely less amusing was the answer of Narvaez to Signor Orense, upon the course intended to be pursued by the Government at Madrid—in the Spanish Cortes—as reported in the Times of Wednesday. Seventeen deputies have first prepared his temper for pleasantry by resigning in disgust at his administration.

"Well, my boy," said Signor Orense, "what are your intentions under these popular auspices?" Then up gets the blood-stained minister of terror—whose hatred to Prim is rendered somewhat contradictory by the band-box style of his costume—while his violations of grammar equally convey the notion that, prim as he looks, he has never studied his primer;—then up rises the petit maitre of slaughter, whose personnel approaches in ill-favour the miserable deformity of his mind—and with grandiloquence proceeds to talk of generosity, and honour, and confidence, and determination, and gratitude, just as if, instead of being nurtured in the caverns of Crime he had lived all his life in the palaces of Virtue. Finally, he invokes with a sort of comic blasphemy, which he intends for religious solemnity, the name of the Deity. "That explanation," said he, alluding to a ministerial debate apology, "would have satisfied God Almighty himself, and if those deputies, and Signor Orense were less generous, less merciful, and less difficult to be pleased than the great Disposer of Events—then—surely, &c., &c."—not seeing that by the using the word less he was inverting his own meaning, and blaming the earthly for not equalling the heavenly in some of its highest attributes. Though the speech disgusted utterly, the ignorance of the speaker raised a scornful titter, which the sanguinary blunderer was, doubtless, too brutally ignorant to understand. It is at once ludicrous and humiliating to find such men playing the games of empires.

Talking of this Ministerial grammar slaughter—there are reports current in the Irish papers, not of an intent to murder Lindley Murray, after the fashion of many of the English, but to murder Dr. Murray, the Catholic Archbishop of Dublin. Of course, the rumour is a mere party extravaganza—for even the boys of Tipperary are much more likely to murder their grammar than their priests.

But, apropos of priests—there really is a sort of schism among the religionists of Ireland, and the new Concordat between Peel and the Pope—Non-concordat with the temper of the people. O'Connell has not yet come out about it—nor has he been delivered of his sermon upon the Charitable Bequests Bill. Considering that Dan himself has been all his life receiving Charitable Bequests, and from people very much in want of Charity—he ought to be especially eloquent upon this subject!

To revert to Spain. What a bobbery about Bulwer and Cochrane. The story of "Cœlebs in Search of a Wife," is not half as good as Cochrane in search of a decoration. And what ovations do not the Spaniards make to him.

No sooner sets Cochrane his foot in Madrid,
Than the natives all praise him as high as the Cid;
He's a hero, a champion—a God! something more!
So say "Globo," "Heraldo," and "Espectador"—
He goes to Hal Bulwer with "Sir, you'll confess
That at least I am honoured enough by the press;"
Says Bulwer—"They've given you soft soap enough.
But I think you yourself manufactured the Puff."

Whereat Cochrane—"You asked me to dine:—indignation
Now bids me refuse your polite invitation;
Were you not an Envoy, I think I could show
That a Cochrane knows how to return blow for blow;
But as I can't fight you, uncourteous sinner,
Why shiver my crest if I come to your dinner!"

Then Bulwer—"All I said of puffing was right,
And as you say it's quite off the cards that we fight,
I advise you to weigh this suggestion of mine,
Kill your monkey—and after all—do come and dine."

But Cochrane—the dumps still upon him—said "No;
Don't you wish you may get it? I'm hanged if I go.
Besides, Sir, I tell you (for as I can't come,
Your grapes must be sour to tooth and to gum),
I tell you, the world says your dinners are bad,
And not half so good as some others I've had
From more than one duped but grandiloquent Nob, O
Who believed in "Espectador," Herald, and "Glo-bo."

So the pot boiled over until the Hero of that glorious institution of Liberty—the Press of Madrid—after having reproached Mr. Bulwer about his feeds, and being himself somewhat snubbed by his Excellency about his introduction at Court—refused to be introduced at all by the unbelieving Ambassador, and so forewent his decoration. He walks about as usual, with his gold watch and appendages, but no Spanish decoration. Never mind—the Times of Thursday honoured him with a leader.

The same journal contained a good steam-boat anecdote, which we have done into verse, to make a graceful conclusion to this article:—

To boats and 'busses racing is forbad;
Woe to the coachman or the captain lad,
Who perils life or limb of those he meets
Either upon the waters or the streets.

"What ho! there—stop them steamers!—hold!" "Avast!"
Shout both the Captains—"Though we do go fast,
We aint a racing where the craft are thickest—
We're only trying which can go the quickest!"

COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY AND THE ROYAL FAMILY.

Windsor.—On Saturday last, the Queen and Prince Albert walked in the grounds adjacent to the Castle in the forenoon. On the return of the Royal party, his Royal Highness went to shoot at Cranbourne, attended by Mr. Anson and Colonel Bouverie. Her Majesty attended by the Countess of Charlemont, rode out in a pony phaeton in the morning, Major-General Wemyss attending on horseback.

On Sunday, the Queen, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the Court, and the domestic household attended Divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay officiated. The Duchess of Kent was attended by Lady Fanny Howard.

On Monday, the Queen and Prince Albert walked in the Home Park and pleasure-grounds around the Castle in the early part of the morning. In the afternoon, her Majesty and the Prince promenaded on the terrace and in the pleasure-grounds and Home Park. The Austrian Ambassador and the Countess Dietrichstein arrived at the Castle today, on a visit to the Queen. The Earl of Aberdeen and Mr. Patrick Fraser Tytler also arrived on a visit to her Majesty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and Lady Fanny Howard joined the Royal circle at dinner to-day.

On Tuesday, the Queen walked out for some time in the morning, attended by Lady Caroline Cocks. Prince Albert, accompanied by the Austrian Ambassador (Count Dietrichstein) and the Earls of Liverpool and Delawarr, left the Castle this morning on a shooting excursion in the Royal preserves, attended by Mr. Anson and Colonel Bouverie. James Bentley, Esq, the Treasurer of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and Thomas R. Bartrum, Esq., Richard Gilbert, Esq., and John Dixon, Esq., Governors (a deputation from the Hospital), had the honour of an audience of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, at the Castle, this morning, to present to his Royal Highness a green staff and a copy on vellum of the Resolution of the Court, upon his Royal Highness becoming a Governor of that ancient foundation, which the Prince was pleased to accept.

On Wednesday, the Queen and Prince Albert walked out for some time in the afternoon. The Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter arrived at the Castle to-day, on a visit to the Queen.

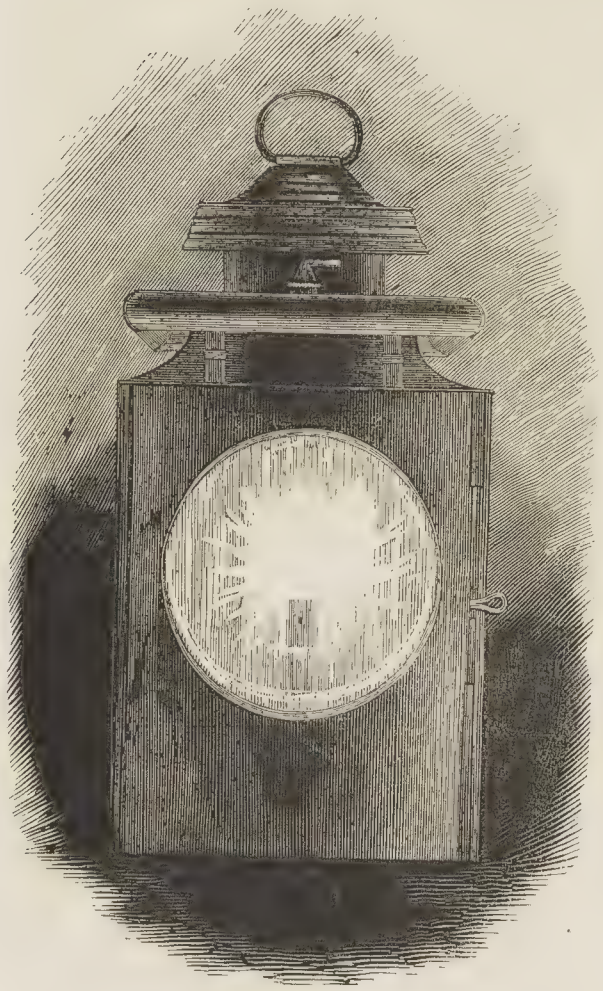
Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Every preparation is being made for the departure of her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, on Wednesday next, for Stowe, to honour the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham with a visit. The Court will remain at Stowe until the following Saturday. The Infant Royal Family will continue at the Castle during the absence of their illustrious parents. The weather to-day being unfavourable for out-door exercise, the Queen promenaded but a short time this morning in the immediate vicinity of the Castle. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Major-General Wemyss, Colonel Bouverie, and Mr. G. E. Anson hunted this morning with the Prince's pack of harriers. Her Majesty gave a small dinner party at the Castle this evening. The band of the Royal Horse Guards were in attendance during the banquet, and the Queen's private band performed the remainder of the evening.

Her Majesty, with her accustomed generosity, has given, we are informed, out of her privy purse, the sum of £1000 a year to Sir Augustus D'Este, which is equal to the sum Sir Augustus lost by the death of the Duke of Sussex.

The Queen's Visit to Stowe.—Great preparations are in active progress for the reception of the Queen and Prince Albert at the mansion of the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham, at Stowe. Upon all such visits it is customary for the host and hostess to lay aside those titles and all the domestic control and privileges belonging to them—to resign for a period all personal right and social command in favour of their Sovereign, and to become honoured servants as well as favoured subjects. So, during her stay at Stowe, all invitations will be issued from the Court. The arrangements of the house—the "orders of the day"—the ceremonies and adjustments—the pleasures and pastimes, &c., which are indispensable to Majesty—the appointments and regulations of all kinds, will be left entirely to the will and disposal of the Regal hostess of Stowe for the time being, and her officers of state. The illuminations at Stowe will be of a very extensive kind. The external aspect, never other than imposing, abounds (notwithstanding the absence of foliage) in natural beauties, and the numerous and splendid works of art around it add to the magnificence of the scene. Nothing can surpass the internal grandeur and elegance for which it is famous. Rarest specimens of art and skill, and of expensive manufacture, meet the eye in every direction, and all the luxuries of civilisation and refinement are here displayed. At Buckingham, everybody seems brimful of loyalty—and no doubt but the feeling will find proper vent when the time arrives for exhibiting it. [We shall take care to present our readers with a full account of the visit.]

Rumoured Visit of her Majesty to the German Courts.—According to private letters from Berlin, the report gains ground there, that her Majesty Queen Victoria and her illustrious Consort, will pay a visit in the spring to Potsdam, and that other German Courts may expect the same honour.

Lady Peel and Miss Frances Brown.—The following letter was sent by the Prime Minister to Miss Frances Brown, the blind poetess of Ulster, on Christmas Eve:—"Whitehall, Dec. 24.—Madam,—There is a fund applicable, as vacancies may occur, to the grant of annual pensions of very limited amount, which usage has placed at the disposal of the lady of the First Minister. On this fund there is a surplus of £20 per annum. Lady Peel has heard of your honourable and successful exertions to mitigate, by literary acquirements, the effects of the misfortune by which you have been visited; and should the grant of this pension for your life be acceptable to you, Lady Peel will have great satisfaction in such an appropriation of it.—I am, &c., Robert Peel."



Sir Robert Peel arrived at his residence, in Whitehall-gardens, on Wednesday evening, from Drayton Manor, Staffordshire.

Proposed Marriage in High Life.—A matrimonial alliance, it is understood, is about to be formed between Colonel Ridley, of the Guards, brother of Sir Matthew White Ridley, Bart., of Blagdon, and the Hon. Miss Browne, daughter of Lord Oranmore, and niece to the Dowager Viscountess Dillon.

The Duke of Grafton has appointed the Reverend Thomas Sword, M.A., rector of St. Peter's, Thetford, to be his Grace's domestic chaplain.

The Royal Buck Hounds.—Death of the celebrated Stag Highflyer.—The Royal Buck Hounds had one of the most splendid runs of the season on Monday; but which, however, resulted in the death of Highflyer, one of the most celebrated deer which has been hunted by the Royal pack. The meet was at New Lodge, the field numbering upwards of 200 of the neighbouring gentry and yeomen. Highflyer, upon being uncarted, took away in gallant style to the Pump House, on to North-street, and Hatchet-lane, to Ascot-place, into Miss Forad's-park, leaping the palings into the road near the lodge, and thence over the Chevy-downs to the plantations at Swinley, through East-hampstead, to Hemliker-lodge, near Finchampstead, without a check, and at a rattling pace throughout. Here the pack was at fault; but, upon being laid on at the [illegible]th, [illegible] for Eversley, in Hampshire, where he got [illegible] with the hounds close at his heels, and was drowned before his fleet pursuers could be called off.

NEW PORTABLE GAS LAMPS FOR RAILWAYS.

PORTABLE GAS LAMP.

A VALUABLE portable gas lamp for general railway use, recently patented by a Mr. Johnstone, of 4, Baker-street, Lloyd-square, was tried for the first time, in the early part of the week, on the Eastern Counties Railway, and was found to answer most admirably as a head-light to the engine, and a reading light for third-class passengers.

It was again tried, with the most complete success, on Thursday week, upon the South-Eastern Railway, at the New Cross Station, before the inventors, Benjamin Cubitt, Esq., the resident Engineer of the line, several of the S. E. R. Directors, and a numerous company of scientific men.

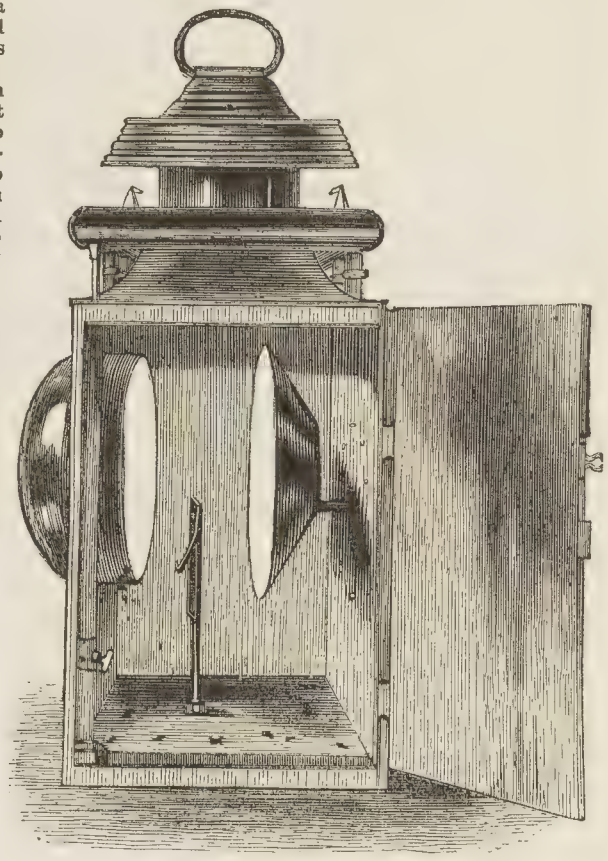
The lamp, which is on the self-generating principle, produces, by the heat of its own flame, sufficient gas or vapour to sustain the requisite amount of light, and without the possibility of explosion. The lamp consists of a small, flat-shaped retort, of about six inches long, an inch broad, and about a quarter of an inch in depth, of thin sheet copper, and having two burners attached to it. Along the top of the retort there runs a piece of copper pipe, which has an opening into the inside of the retort; from either end of the retort the pipe has a descending branch; one of which, running down the side of the retort for about five inches, bends across at right angles.

In the centre of this cross pipe is a small hole, from which the gas escapes in a vertical direction. The opposite arm, after descending the side of the retort for about two inches, curves to about an inch from the retort, when it also bends across at right angles; a hole for the escape of gas is also drilled in the bent portion of this arm.

The bottom tube is the flame-burner; and the tube of the upper bent arm, the vapour-burner.

The retort is partly filled with a stuffing of cotton, for the production of vapour and prevention of the fluctuation of the light. Fixed upon this retort, between the upper and lower burners, is a shield, up which the gas from the lower burner is projected, and upon the top of it, parallel with the flat side of the retort, runs a piece of copper wire, to break the force of the jet of gas.

When the lighter is applied to the lamp, the gas, issuing with great force from both burners, would blow out the light, were it not for this wire, which, by breaking the force of the jet, causes it to burn, but with a dull, red, smoky flame; this evil, however, is remedied by the jet of vapour from the upper burner, which is so arranged as to play upon the top of the shield, and to take up in its flame the unconsumed carbon produced by the obstruction caused to the lower jet by the wire—the combination of the two jets producing a most intense light. When a large jet of flame is required, a small cock is inserted, in place of the wire, on the shield.



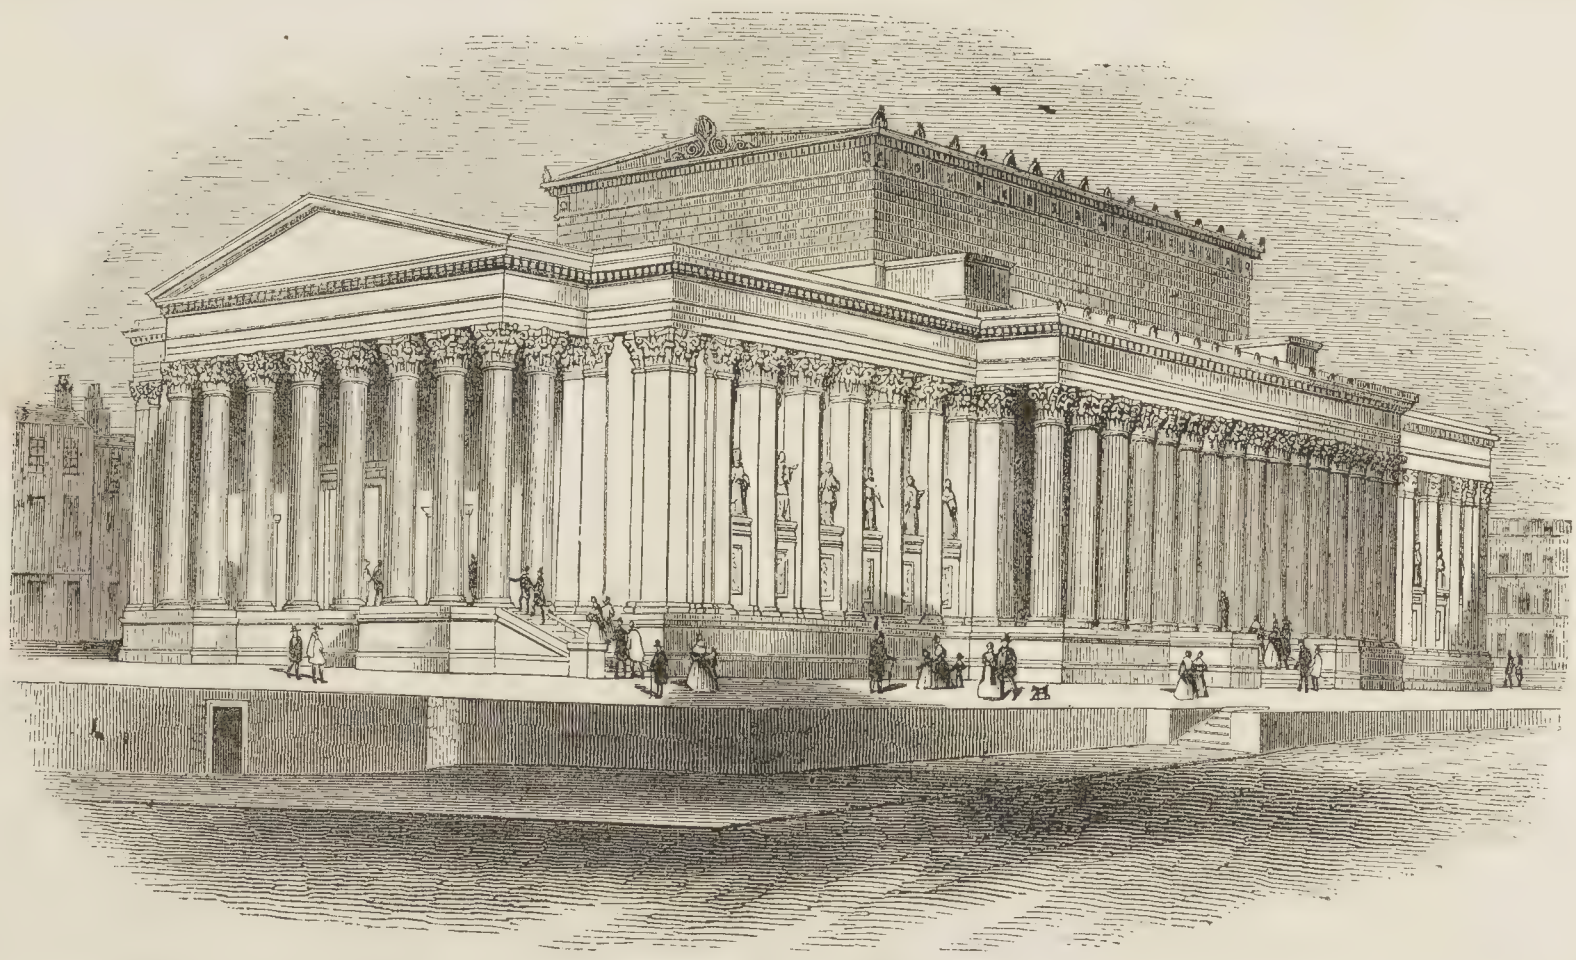
The lower flame is adapted for two purposes, viz., to heat the retort, and light the vapour from the upper burner. In a large light, equal to thirty or forty argand gas-burners, the flame for igniting the gas from the vapour-burner consists only of small beads of light.

THE LIGHTER.

The lighting of the lamp is effected by another, similarly constructed, but with the retort in a horizontal position, instead of perpendicular, a form which has been adopted for the greater facility of lighting the lighter, by being thrust between the bars of a grate. After having been in the fire from fifteen to twenty seconds, the light throws out a most brilliant clear flame, and is then ready for applying to the lamp. A cylindrical shield, to protect the light from the wind having been removed, the flame is directed against the retort of the lamp for about ten seconds, when the peculiarly brilliant "batswing" flame shoots forth, and keeps up its strength of light without intermission.

The lamp is fitted with Day's simple but ingenious invention of the wind-guard, and was introduced by Mr. Piper, of Shoreditch, to whose ability the present invention is highly indebted.

PORTABLE GAS LAMP.—INTERIOR.



ST. GEORGE'S HALL, NEW ASSIZE COURTS, &c.

THE building of the New Assize Courts, on the site of the Old Infirmary, and surrounding vacant ground in Lime-street, now hastening to completion, will become an honour and an ornament to the town, second to no architectural structure in the kingdom. It was originally intended that the Court House and St. George's Hall should be separate buildings, both contiguous, on the same vacant ground, and that the latter should be built first. So far, indeed, had the Corporation matured this project, that, after a splendid civic procession, on the day of the Coronation of her present Majesty (28th June, 1838), the foundation-stone of the intended Hall was laid with great ceremony and rejoicing. Designs were also procured for both buildings; but subsequent circumstances induced the Town Council to abandon their idea; and no further proceedings were taken until 1841, when, out of a number of designs advertised for a building to include both the Court and the Hall, that of Mr. Harvey Lonsdale Elmes, of London, was selected as the best and most appropriate.

The building is of an oblong form, placed longitudinally north and south; with a handsome portico, surmounted by a pediment at the south end, a splendid projecting colonnade in the centre of the east front, and a semicircular termination at the north end. The central position of the west front (facing St. John's Churchyard), and which is plainer, but still elegant, is also in projection. The length, taking the external surface of the walls, is 488 feet; the width in the centre, including the projections, 164 feet; and the width at each end, or, in other words, of the wings, 124 feet.

The style may be said to be Roman, or, more properly, an harmonious combination of the pure Grecian and pure Roman, which last admits of lateral windows (necessary in this country) denied in the first, the purely Grecian temples being lighted solely from the roof.

The east colonnade consists of sixteen fluted Corinthian columns, with rich capitals. The height of each column, including base and capital, is 45 feet; the diameter at the bottom of each, 4 feet 7 in. These support a fine entablature (there being no pediment), the top of which, from the basis of the columns, is 56 feet 5 inches in height. Between these columns and the main wall there is a clear space, or promenade, 22 feet in width. Large and small panels, alternately, are seen in the back walls, presenting themselves between the capitals. Screen-work is carried up 16 feet 6 inches from the basis of the columns and pilasters on this side,

The South Portico consists of eight similar columns in front, and four behind them, the whole surmounted by a handsome pediment. Within this portico, there is, also, a wide promenade, slightly interrupted by the central interior columns, which, however, will impart, by forming a double colonnade, a richness and warmth of appearance to this part of the building. The ceiling under the pediment will here be arched in groined-work. The full height, from the datum level to the top of the pediment, is 87 feet 8 in.; and the height from the ground, which here falls 16 feet, as compared with that of the north end, is 105 feet 8 inches. The wings on this front are enriched by pilasters, corresponding in every point with the outer columns. The capitals will match with those of the columns. There are twelve panels for sculpture between the pilasters at each front, and the same number of pedestals, placed on screen-work, to support figures. The intercolumniations, filled up with the panels, are 13 feet in width all round.

The North End is (as before stated) semicircular, and enriched round the sweep by three-quarter columns in projection. Between these are fine bold Roman windows, and the ashler-work is relieved by wreaths cut in the stone.

On the West Front (to the Churchyard) the central projection is carried up with screen-work to about one-third of the height, and in that there are handsome architrave windows.

Outside the main building, and attached to it on the basement, there is a walk or terrace leading from the east portico or colonnade, to the south portico. A splendid external flight of stairs, longitudinal with the building, will lead to the grand entrance at that side. Steps will also lead to these, to a certain height, at each end—these returning themselves against their respective pedestals.

The entire building is elevated on a podium, with fine bold mouldings. The only part of the building that rises above the general exterior elevation is St. George's Hall, which is in the centre, and the walls of which are carried 34 feet above the entablature, forming an oblong square, rich in corresponding architectural embellishment.

As seen from almost any open point, but more particularly from Lime-street, a little to the south of the Railway Station (where the east front and south end will be caught at one view), we entertain no doubt but the whole will present one of the most commanding and elegant piles in Europe.—Abridged from the Liverpool Standard.

LONDON AND BLACKWALL RAILWAY.—On Wednesday a special general meeting of the shareholders in the London and Blackwall Railway was held at the London Tavern, for the purpose of authorising the Directors to apply to Parliament for power to extend their line through Stratford, Leytonstone, Wanstead, Woodford, Chigwell, Loughton, and Abridge, to Epping. Mr. J. N. Daniell, the Chairman of the Board of Directors, occupied the chair. A lengthened report was read to the meeting, detailing the probable amount of traffic between the metropolis, and the towns near to which or through which it was intended the line should pass, and setting forth the advantages which were likely to result from its connecting the Blackwall Railway with the Eastern Counties and Northern and Eastern lines. From the estimates which had been prepared, the Directors were satisfied the cost of the work would not exceed £500,000, upon which the estimated revenue would pay more than 11½ per cent. per annum. Mr. Levy strongly objected to the line, and declared the traffic returns to be greatly exaggerated. Dr. Bowring, M.P., Mr. Ross Mangles, M.P., and Mr W. Tite, however, spoke favourably of the project; and resolutions empowering the Directors to take the necessary steps to obtain an Act of Parliament to construct the line were unanimously adopted.

REPEAL OF THE MALT-TAX.—A meeting of the Central Committee (now consisting of upwards of 200 leading agriculturists from all parts of the kingdom) was held at the York Hotel, Bridge-street, on Monday, for the purpose of adopting further measures towards obtaining the sense of the country upon this question. Mr. Fisher Hobbs, of Essex, having been called to the chair, letters were read from the local committees already at work, from which it appeared that a strong and unanimous feeling pervaded the agricultural classes in favour of a total repeal of the tax; and it was consequently resolved, in order to their more effective organisation, that a form of petition should be forwarded to them for general adoption, and that a communication with the various chairmen of the market tables in the leading towns throughout the kingdom should be opened, and their cordial co-operation requested.

NEW CHURCH AT SURBITON, KINGSTON-ON-RAILWAY.

NEW CHURCH AT SURBITON, KINGSTON-ON-RAILWAY, SURREY.

THIS church has lately been erected at Surbiton, a new town, adjoining the London and Southampton Railway. The style preserved throughout the erection is a description of the Gothic, observed in the fifteenth century, the shape being cruciform. The exterior is composed of rough Sneaton stone, with wrought free-stone quoins and mouldings. The tower, as will be observed, is square, with the centre highly finished with pinnacles. The greater part of the windows are filled with painted glass of rich design. On the east windows are figures of the twelve Apostles, given by Mr. Stevens, one of the architects; and on the other windows, arms of the donors, &c. The roof, containing labels with Scripture texts, &c., is of wood, showing a portion of the timbers. The edifice affords accommodation for 850 persons, and there are no galleries. The erection of the building cost £5000, which, together with the funds for the endowment, have been generously provided by the proprietors of the town. The edifice is from the design of Messrs. Stevens and Alexander, of Clement's-inn, who have also superintended the erection of the new churches at Herne-hill, Notting-hill, Ramsgate, Farnborough Station, &c., &c. Those gentlemen, it may be necessary to add, are the architects to the proprietors of the town. The Rev. S. P. Philips, of Clapham, has been appointed to the incumbency. The general effect is greatly enhanced by the beauty of the position, the church being situate in the most elevated part of the neighbourhood, commanding Richmond and Hampton Court Parks.

THE THEATRES.

WE have little to record this week in the way of novelty, at the different houses; and to judge from the crowded state of the theatres generally, the managements will not see the necessity of changing their programme of entertainments for some little time to come. As we expected, Covent-garden has played a great card in the production of "Antigone." The interest manifested during its representation, and the empressement of the audience are even on the increase: we have seldom seen every portion of the theatre filled as it now is, not merely with respect to numbers, but as regards intelligence and position. Our notice last week was necessarily hurried. Since then, a general remark has been made. it is curious to observe that, whilst on the first night, before the curtain rose, it was the general impression that the music alone would preserve the tragedy from condemnation, the reverse proved to be the case. The choruses, owing to the wretched manner in which they were performed, were greeted with unmistakeable disapprobation: but the terrible interest and really excellent acting of the tragedy carried everything before it. Miss Vandenhoff has never achieved a success, in London so perfect as that in her present part, and the enthusiasm elicited by her performance increases every night. We take the following from the libretto pertaining to the scene in which Miss Vandenhoff's acting is seen to the greatest advantage. She speaks the words, and there is an accompaniment in the orchestra, appropriate to the sense of the declamation.—

ANTIGONE.

Behold me now, my native citizens,
Treading the pathway to my father's home:
My last bright beams of golden Helios
Will set for ever! Death leads me on
To Acheron, whose dismal stream I cross
To peaceful Hades—there I soon shall rest.
Hymen's hymn never there will sound;
There, no bridal chorus ever will greet me,
I am betrothed to Acheron!

CHORUS.

But worthy of praise, and with honour arrayed,
Death carries thee, a blooming bride, to his bed:
Unchill'd by disease, unscathed by decay,
Unsmote by the sword in hostile affray,
Unfettered by will, thy choice uncontrol'd,
Thou'rt betrothed to the monarch of Hades.

ANTIGONE.

The daughter of the Phrygian Tantalus,
Died horribly upon the heights of Sipylos.
Like the ivy's winding stem,
The sprouting rock entwines and clasps her.
Restless falls the rain on her brow,
Freezing, it changes to snow.
And, 'tis reported, the griefs of her soul
From her eyelids incessantly flow.
Thus Death prepares the bed of peace for me!

CHORUS.

Her sons were gods, a goddess was she;
Our fathers were mortal—mortal are we;—
Remember, how gloriously great it will be
To share the fate of immortals!

There is something exceedingly interesting in witnessing a tragedy, written nearly five hundred years before Christ, thus vividly exciting the sympathies of an audience at the present period.

The Adelphi version of Mr. Dickens's Christmas Story—"The Chimes"—continues to be played with increasing success: the serious business is somewhat lightened, and the comic points tell even better than hitherto. We have this week engraved the happy scene in Toby Veck's humble dwelling, drawn by Mr. Kenny Meadows.

boards, as a vocalist. He sang last year at some of the nobility's private parties, and is said to possess a fine voice.

MADAME PERSIANI.—We regret to state, it is very doubtful that this accomplished vocalist will visit us next season.

WEBER, THE COMPOSER.—His Majesty the King of Prussia, on the recommendation of Meyerbeer, has ordered that Weber's opera of "Euryanthe" shall be performed in the new Opera-house at Berlin. The receipts arising from the performance are to be presented to the committee recently formed at Dresden, for erecting a monument to Weber, whose remains have been removed from England, and interred in his native city.

AUBER.—This favourite and talented composer is in his 60th year, having been born at Caen, in Normandy, in the year 1784. He studied under Cherubini, and was far from possessing a precocious talent, for he was older than Mozart or Weber when he produced his first work—a mass of some beauty, and which he partially introduced afterwards in the more serious part of "Masaniello." In 1819 he began to write for the Comic Opera; in 1828 he produced "La Muette" ("Masaniello") and "Fra Diavolo," which at once established his fame. The following is a list of his principal works, in addition to the two above-named operas:—La Neige, Le Maçon, La Fiancée, Gustavus, Lac des Fées, Lestocq, Actéon, L'Ambassadrice, Le Cheval de Bronze, La Philtre, Le Serment, La Bayadiere, Le Domino Noir, Zanetta, Le Diamans de la Couronne, Le Duc d'Olonne, Le Part du Diable, and, lastly, La Sirène.

SPONTINI.—This celebrated composer is once more the favourite of fortune; he was lately restored to the favour of the King of Prussia, since which he has been created by the Pope a Count of the Roman States.

TWO MORE OPERAS BY BALFE!—This popular composer has returned to Paris, and is now busily engaged in the composition of another new opera, the libretto of which has been written by M. St. Georges, the author of "La Reine de Chypre," and forwarded to Mr. Bunn, for translation into English. The principal part is intended for Madame Thillon, whose engagement at Drury-Lane commences in May next. It is also said that an Italian opera, by Balfe, entitled "Elfrida," will be brought out at her Majesty's Theatre next season. His muse certainly writes currente calamo! But, it were well to consider the reply of Euripides to a foolish poet, who taunted him with writing only three verses in three days. "True," said the bard of Pella; "you may have written one hundred verses in three days; but, there is this difference between yours and mine: yours will expire in three days, but mine will live for ever!"

VIOTTI.—This distinguished violinist having renounced the profession and set up wine-merchant, the circumstance gave rise to the following verses, which were admirably set to music, as a duet, by Dr. Cooke:—

Let Rubinelli charm the ear,
And sing, as erst, with voice divine,
I to Viotti will adhere—
Instead of music, give me wine.

And yet, perhaps, with wine combined,
Soft music may our joys improve;
Let both together, then, be joined,
And feast we like the gods above.

MEYERBEER.—This celebrated composer's present visit to Paris has, for the fourth season, been deemed Prophet-ical of the production of his long expected opera.

RUBINI.—This accomplished tenor has relinquished the management of the Opera at St. Petersburg, in favour of Salvi, and is on his way to Paris. It is not improbable that he will visit us next season.

CERITO.—The reported marriage of Cerito with St. Leon is confirmed. The Pope has granted a bull for the union, St. Leon having been converted from Judaism. Cerito has given the fortune she has acquired to her parents. This eminent danseuse is engaged at Rome for the Carnival, having lately concluded a few representations at Bologna, where her last appearance created the utmost enthusiasm.

MUSIC.

CROSBY HALL CONCERTS.

The third Concert of Sacred Music was given at Crosby Hall on Wednesday evening last; the whole series have been given under the direction of the Committee of the Crosby Hall Literary and Scientific Institution, and the members of that Committee have certainly exhibited on each occasion a sound taste in the selection of the music; the finest specimens of the first composers have been given at every concert.

On Wednesday evening the selection comprised pieces from the works of Purcell, Crotch, Handel, Spohr, Cherubini, Haydn, Weber, and Beethoven. The principal solos were sung by Miss Rainforth and Miss Dolby, Mr. Francis and Mr. J. A. Novello, supported by an able and well conducted chorus. The novelty of the evening was an aria, with chorus, by Mendelssohn, "Hear my prayer, O God," stated in the programme to have been written expressly for these concerts, this being the first time of its performance. It is a grand and noble composition, and the exquisite manner in which it was sung by Miss Rainforth elicited the warmest applause. It is worthy of the master's reputation. Another novelty was a chorale, "With glory clad," by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. These concerts of sacred music are well supported, and the whole of the series have given the greatest satisfaction.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

LET people with more bile than brains cavil at the expression as much as they please, but "Merry England" is a good phrase, and an appropriate, nevertheless; that is to say, in reference to Young England. When sanguine Mary and saturnine Oliver ruled the roast, it was quite another affair. True, John Bull does not make pleasure a business, like Jack Frenchman; yet neither is it all work with him, as all play with his neighbour. We are now speaking of the popular propensity—of the habits and tendencies of the productive classes—called "inferior to those who satirise reason and common sense." The bulk of the natives of these islands known as Great Britain is as right-hearted and as light-hearted a sample of God's creatures as can be found upon this planet. If it were not so, the face of society among us would be such as fashion wears at funerals. We are left almost wholly without public games and spectacles—a fact which speaks more eloquently for the confidence reposed in the national character than any of such general application. Let the Government of France neglect its political [illegible] makings: deprive Paris for a year or [illegible] festivals, her legislative feasts and jubilees, and all shall be fire and sword from Bayonne to [illegible] Normandy to Provence. From the earliest annals of civilisation, it has been [illegible] social scheme to promote the political health of communities by periodical associations for [illegible] enjoyment. At this hour, there is scarce a Government [illegible] to neglect this great [illegible]. Man, in the [illegible] the patient must [illegible]; or he will [illegible] by private [illegible] individual munificence. And in such wise, right goodly [illegible] be provision made for such as cannot help themselves. Beyond all others, the patrons of the turf cater most for the body pleasure-wanting. It may be that race-courses might be more moral than they are. Of a verity, those who cultivate them as sources of profit and livelihood cannot be more the reverse of virtuous. But then, since the world began, there was license for cakes and ale. The days of mirth and innocence have not quite departed, though the groves of Eden have vanished now so long. But one cannot expect that youths who follow stock-broking should handle a crook rather than a jockey-whip, or eschew the Crown and Anchor, or the judge-and-jury book, to cultivate the rural sub tegmine fagi. For this reason, we think well of the Surrey Downs, and the Royal heath adjoining 'Sunning Hill, and hail the prospects for their future anniversaries as welcome attendants of the new year.

This peroration is indebted for existence to the effect produced by the appearance of the first sheet calendar of the season, published on Wednesday last. In it were the announcements of various engagements entered into for various meetings of an extent "hitherto unprecedented," as one might say. To begin with the beginning, there is a new handicap set up for the Craven meeting at Newmarket, in April next. Now this is good of itself, as also in the capacity of an omen. It augurs that the exclusive system is on the wane there, for there is no device in racing so unaristocratic as your handicap; wherein Joan is as good as my lady; your donkey that will go at all, as excellent as the lineal descendants of the mares of the Prophet. To this succeed engagements for the years 1846, 1847, and 1848—successions full of promise. The Doncaster demonstrations are right excellent; the Champagnes have forty-two subscribers; the Two-Year-Old-Stakes, for the last day, forty-seven: while the nominations for next Year's Leger are 153; a third more than in the present. Taking precedence, however, of these events in instant interest is the Chester Cup—the greatest spring speculation of the ring: it has a nomination of 123, comprising good, bad, and indifferent; some coursers of merit, and a host of tag rag and bobtail. Among the entries are Ratan, and Zanoni, hight, once upon a time, Maccabeus. If the former be named by Mr. John Braham, they will probably stick it on him to a considerable tune, as a burden to the song: with regard to Maccabeus, the handicapper will very likely bear in mind his having been Running Rein, and that some of his party deserve a noose. The Chester Cup will be a great "sporting race," as they miscall heavy betting events: for the last year it has been, one cannot deny, an issue of considerable interest, but very little principle.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council the first previous to the meeting of Parliament, was held at the Foreign-Office on Thursday afternoon. All the Ministers in town were present. Previous to the Council, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Earl of Aberdeen had interviews with Sir Robert Peel, at the right hon. Baronet's residence in Whitehall-gardens.

THE WELLINGTON STATUE AT THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.—On Thursday morning masons were engaged in cutting the inscription on the pedestal of the statue of the Duke of Wellington, in front of the Royal Exchange. It simply bears the name of the illustrious soldier on each side, and at the back will be, "Erected June 18, 1844." The paving in front of the Exchange has been completed in a very ornamental manner. The design is a large star, set in a circle, and the whole in a square. The different compartments are marked out distinctly by different coloured stone. The statue of the Duke stands in a circle similarly formed.

CHINESE RANSOM.—On Tuesday last, her Majesty's ship the Harlequin, Commander the Hon. F. Hastings, brother to the late Marquis of Hastings and Lady Flora, and M. Edington, Esq., Master, arrived at Plymouth, bringing part of the Chinese ransom, amounting to 400,000 dollars.

REPORTED ABOLITION OF DUTIES.—A correspondent informs us, on what he asserts to be unquestionable authority, that it is the intention of the Minister in the approaching session of Parliament, to abolish the duty on raw cotton, to reduce the duty on tea, to make £300, not as at present £150, a-year the minimum of annuity liable to the Income-tax; and to reduce the present Reduced Three per Cents. to 2¾ per cent., secured for the term of twenty years.—Morning Advertiser. [There are generally many reports of this kind shortly before the meeting of Parliament. It is, however, to be remarked, that if Sir Robert Peel had an intention of making these reductions, it is very unlikely that he would allow the fact to transpire.]

ROBBERY AT THE LONDON DOCKS.—A robbery of a daring character was effected at the London Docks last week. A hogshead, lying in one of the tiers of packages of leaf tobacco, of which there are several thousands in the warehouse appropriated to the deposit of that article at the East-quay, was plundered to the amount of nearly 150lbs. weight. The Company directed a strict search to be made at the residence of one of the suspected parties, where they found a large portion of the missing tobacco concealed; one of them has been apprehended. When it is considered that the warehouse in which this tobacco was deposited is at all times under the locks of the Crown, the official keys being removed from the warehouse daily, at the closing hour of business, to a place of trust and security, it appears somewhat extraordinary how such a daring robbery could be accomplished. This is, we believe, the sixth instance of a robbery having taken place in the short space of a month, at this and the neighbouring docks.

SEIZURE OF TOBACCO AT ST. KATHARINE'S DOCKS.—On Saturday last, a large quantity of tobacco and cigars was discovered hidden behind some packages on the quay of St. Katherine's Docks, which, it was supposed, had been surreptitiously landed from a vessel now discharging her cargo, from the United States, to await the opportunity of removal from the premises with some goods about to be shifted into craft, to be landed elsewhere, which was immediately seized by the Customs' officers. On Monday afternoon, a further quantity, consisting of forty pounds weight of manufactured negro-head tobacco, done up in the same manner, and of exactly the same description as that discovered on the quay, on Saturday, was found concealed behind the door of a shed adjoining the place, which was immediately seized by the same parties.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE LONDON AND DOVER RAILWAY.—On Tuesday night an inquest was held in Guy's Hospital, before Mr. Joseph Payne, on the body of Charles Meaden, aged twenty-five, late a guard in the service of the London and Dover Railway Company. Thomas Slater, of Ashford, an engine-driver on the London and Dover Railway, said that he knew the deceased, who was in the same employ as guard. On Christmas-day, about five P.M., he was at the New Cross Station, going out with a train, when he gave the usual whistle, and then looked round to see if the carriages were all right; whilst doing so, he saw something fall, about three yards from the end of the platform. He reversed his engine and put down the break, and on going back, found it to be the deceased, who was lying on the slope. Witness having procured another [illegible] coupled to Ashford and the deceased was [illegible] to Guy's Hospital. [illegible] Davies, house-surgeon, said [illegible] in an [illegible] way. [illegible] fracture [illegible] Accidental [illegible].

[illegible] this state she [illegible] parallelled. The unfortunate lun[illegible] was at the [illegible] her and aunt being in the [illegible] much by perceiving a human eye lying at their feet. [illegible] mother ran to her daughter, and was appalled at perceiving that the [illegible] right eye completely out of its socket. The young woman, who betrayed no agony, said our Saviour had objected to her two words, "if thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out," and she considered she was only fulfilling her Divine Master's will by doing so. The poor creature afterwards became much worse, and it was found necessary to remove her to Bethlehem Hospital. From this place she was discharged as incurable, and Sir Peter Laurie then procured her admission into the County Lunatic Asylum.

MURDER NEAR LIVERPOOL.—A barbarous murder was committed on Saturday last in the vicinity of Rockferry, Cheshire. The unfortunate victim, a Mr. Thomas Peacop, of the firm of T. and H. Golding and Co., Rockferry, left his place of business at nine o'clock on Tuesday night last, rather later than usual, for his lodgings, which are situated at Bebington Pasture, a small village, distant nearly half a mile, with the sum of £8. Mr. Peacop was known to be in the habit of taking with him every night the proceeds of the business of the day, and on the night in question, on leaving his shop, he observed a tall man, dressed in dark clothes, standing at the corner of the street. He was proceeding along a lonesome road, in the direction of his lodgings, when the same man joined him, and they walked side by side for some little distance together. When they had gone about 250 yards from Derby House, two men suddenly jumped from a plantation, and made their appearance on the footpath. The fellow who was accompanying Mr. Peacop, gave a whistle, and instantly the two fellows sprung upon Mr. Peacop, and felled him to the ground with a violent blow on the side of the head from a heavy stick or club. While down, they struck him several other blows, and rifled his pocket of 21s. in silver which a little bag contained, but, in their hurry and confusion, left the remaining £7 behind them. At the time, a gentleman named Keyzier, was going home from the Rockferry, and hearing the noise, he ran to the spot and found Mr. Peacop weltering in his blood on the ground, and two fellows over him, one in the act of rifling his pockets, and the other attempting, as he thought, to strangle him. Mr. Keyzier immediately attempted to drag one of the fellows off, but he had scarcely uttered an exclamation when he received, from the hand of a third party, who had hitherto remained concealed in the hedge of the plantation, but who was, in all probability, the same fellow who had accompanied Mr. Peacop up the road, a violent blow on the right temple, which caused a deep wound and profuse flow of blood. Mr. Keyzier, notwitstanding the nature of the injury, struggled resolutely with the fellow who struck him the blow; but, fearing that Mr. Peacop was by this time strangled, and that single-handed he would have no chance in the hands of three such daring ruffians, he made the best of his way to Butler's public-house, called the Farmer's Inn, at the Pasture, where he informed the inmates of what was occurring. Instantly Mr. Butler, together with his ostler, George Deane, and a man named John Unsworth, armed with pokers and other weapons, sallied down the road, but the fellows had made their escape. Mr. Peacop had received several fractures and injuries on the head, and breathed his last at half-past seven o'clock next morning. Mr. Keyzier is rapidly recovering. A man of the name of Jones was arrested on suspicion of having been concerned in the murder.

SUICIDE AT WATERLOO BRIDGE.—On Monday morning, as a labourer named John Caroline was passing along the banks of the Thames, he discovered, lying near the third arch of Waterloo Bridge, the body of a female, named Emily Ashburnham. The deceased was immediately removed to the vaults of St. John's Church, where it was found that life, although extinct, had not been so for any lengthened period, as the body was quite warm. On her left side was a dreadful wound, apparently caused by striking against the buttresses of the bridge in her descent. A young female named Sarah Page, in the course of the morning, identified the deceased, who, she said, had been residing since Friday last at No. 5, Buckle's-buildings, in that neighbourhood. She also informed Anderson, the Coroner's constable, that she and deceased had been drinking over-night to excess, and that she parted with her in the vicinity of the Strand at a quarter past three o'clock in the morning, at which time the deceased was greatly inebriated, and was in company with another female and a young man.—On Thursday, Mr. Carter held an inquest at the Waterloo Tavern, Waterloo-road, on the body. Julia Myer stated that she had seen the deceased, who was an unfortunate girl, on the previous Saturday. Witness was her sister. She lately passed as Emily Ashburnham, and resided at Barclay-street, Clarendon-square. Witness identified the body, which she had seen at the church.—Mrs. Anderson, wife of one of the parish beadles, described the state of the body when it was discovered. A latch-key and some duplicates were the only articles found on her.—Anderson, the beadle, was next examined, and corroborated the last witness's evidence. Mr. Sewell, surgeon, was first called in to examine the deceased, but, in consequence of the death of his wife, he was obliged to relinquish attendance, and Mr. Avis, parish doctor, was sent for. There was a wound discovered on the right side of deceased, about four inches in depth.—Other witnesses were examined, but none gave any conclusive testimony as to the cause of death; and Mr. Avis, the surgeon, not being in attendance, the proceedings were adjourned to Monday next.

ACCUSATION OF MURDER COMMITTED EIGHT YEARS AGO.—The village of Ruislip, Middlesex, has been greatly excited by the supposed discovery of the murderer of John Brill, a young man who was found murdered in a woo[illegible], near Ruislip, in February, 1837, under circumstances that have not been elucidated. The person now accused is a man named Lamb, a prisoner in Coldbath-fields Prison, where he was committed for poaching. His accuser is another poacher, named Sibley, who says that Lamb told him he had murdered Brill in the wood. A communication to that effect was made by Mr. Chesterton, the governor of the prison, to the Uxbridge magistrates; and Sir W. Wiseman and Mr. Dagnell went to the Coldbath-fields House of Correction, to take the deposition of Sibley, who adhered to his statement, though he evidently expected to gain some advantage by giving evidence. Application was then made to Sir James Graham, to have Lamb removed to Uxbridge, to facilitate the further investigation of the case, but the request has been refused. The Uxbridge magistrates have examined several persons who were acquainted with the circumstances of the discovery of the body, for the purpose of guiding further inquiry into the matter.

MYSTERIOUS SUICIDE NEAR FARNHAM.—Considerable excitement prevailed at Farnham last week, in consequence of a young woman, named Sarah Hill, having been found drowned, and a report was spread abroad that a young man, named Rogers, with whom she had "kept company," had been instrumental in her death. Rogers was accordingly taken into custody. An inquest has since been held at the Plough public-house; but, although a good deal of evidence was taken, nothing was elicited to show what motive had induced the poor girl to commit suicide, if indeed, she had drowned herself, or to attach any suspicion to the conduct of Rogers. The Jury were consequently obliged to return a verdict of "Found drowned;" and the young man was discharged.

A MIDNIGHT ASCENT AT THAXTED CHURCH.—(From a Correspondent.)—In No. 107 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, wherein you gave a drawing of Thaxted Church Spire, with the scaffolding erected round it for the purposes of the trigonometrical survey, allusion is made to the daring feat of one of the Sappers and Miners, who ascended the outside of the spire before any scaffolding was up, and removed the fane alone. That exploit, it is conceived, was far exceeded just as the present new year came in. There is a fine ring of eight bells in the tower of Thaxted Church, and it is always the custom to ring the old year out and the newone in. About twelve o'clock at night of the 31st [illegible], the ringers were so engaged when a [illegible] broke, [illegible] prevented George S[illegible], who [illegible] takes [illegible], coming to be in the [illegible] of [illegible] others [illegible] to assist [illegible] while [illegible] down. [illegible] to [illegible] ing [illegible] the [illegible] ing [illegible] e the [illegible] at the bottom [illegible] at the [illegible] can be no [illegible] or [illegible] handkerchief was [illegible] and there it was to be seen [illegible] the next morning, [illegible] it is [illegible].

EPITOME OF NEWS, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Letters have been received from Munich, confirming the demise, in that capital, on the 25th ult., of Prince Anne Louis Christian Montmorency, elder brother of the Duke de Montmorency. He was Prince de Montmorency and de Tancarville, Peer of France, and a Grandee of Spain of the first class.

Accounts from Gibraltar state that the Moors in the neighbourhood of Ceuta have shown a serious disposition to resist the execution of the treaty entered into between Spain and the Emperor. They have destroyed the piles put down to mark the new boundary, and have threatened to attack the Spaniards sent to replace them. The Emperor has sent some troops to prevent these excesses; but hitherto they have not succeeded in quieting the people, who are exasperated that additional territory should be given to Spain.

A pension of £100 a year has been conferred on Mrs. Hood, the wife of Mr. Thomas Hood, the clever comic writer, in consideration of his great literary merits, and the infirm state of his health.

Count Montalivet, wishing to acknowledge the present of "roast-beef," made to the Court of the Tuileries by an English butcher, has sent to the latter a snuff-box with a miniature portait of the King of the French.

A letter from Tahiti states that, of 600 men composing the French garrison, 117 have been killed or wounded in the different conflicts with the natives.

A man and his wife were tried at Cologne a few days ago, on a charge of having murdered a young girl, who had been confided to them by her parents to work out a debt, which they had contracted to the man and woman in question. The poor girl having offended her employers, they attempted to bury her alive, but not having succeeded in the attempt, beat her until she expired. The man was condemned to imprisonment with hard labour for life, the woman to two years' imprisonment.

There is a report that Sir C. Metcalfe, the present Governor-General of Canada, is in such a dangerous state of health that his recovery is hopeless. He is affected with a cancer-like tumour, for which he has undergone an operation, and the sight of one eye is destroyed. It is believed that Sir Henry Pottinger will be sent to Canada in place of Sir C. Metcalfe

An old man in Silesia has addressed a petition to the King of Prussia, in which he says that he is much afflicted at bearing the same name as the assassin Tschech, with whom he cannot discover that he is in any way related; he is indeed old, but he has sons, and he begs his Majesty to give him another name. The King immediately wrote on the petition, "The petitioner's request is granted; he shall be called Echt."

The house of Rothschild, of London, has been in the habit of sending considerable sums of specie to the house in Paris. Lately the conductor of one of these convoys, on arriving at La Chapelle, missed seven cases of Spanish piastres, each weighing above 100 killogrammes, making a total loss of 140,000f. The robbery must have been committed between Boulogne and Abbeville.

The Marquis de Casa Irujo, who has been appointed by the Spanish Government resident minister at the British Court, has arrived in this country, and has taken up his residence at the Spanish Legation.

A letter from Rome, Dec. 23, states that the furniture of the apartment in the Palace Barbarini, occupied by the late Thorwaldsen, has just been sold, as well as all the tools and articles of his studio. The latter objects were purchased in general by Englishmen, at exorbitant prices. Three common chisels fetched 85, 92, and 110 Roman crowns (450f., 488f., and 583f.)

The late Dr. Cotgrave, who recently died at his residence, Gregsgreen, near Henley-on-Thames, has left £2000 to the Chester Infirmary, £1000 to the Westminster Hospital, and £500 to the Berkshire Hospital. The deceased was surgeon to her Majesty's forces, and served thirty years in the 35th Regiment.

M. de Siegritz, a rich proprietor at Reichersbewrn, eight miles from Munich, was murdered on the 27th of December, by his own servant, who fired two shots at him. The first missed, but the unfortunate gentleman was killed on the spot by the second.

The Commerce Belge states that O'Connell will go to Belgium in the course of a few months, on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Fitzsimon, who have taken a large house in one of the provincial towns.

Letters from Siberia state that during the last year the gold collected scarcely amounted to one-fourth of the average produce of preceding years. Most of the numerous Europeans that went to Siberia to seek employment in the gold works have been reduced to a miserable condition.

The Prince Royal of Bavaria has placed himself at the head of a society established for disseminating useful knowledge amongst the people. It reckons 2000 members, each paying 15f. a-year, for which amount they receive books selected as prizes. Each year the society is to make an appeal to the literati and scientific men of Germany, to compete for the prizes proposed, with a guarantee that their works should be purchased at 200f. a sheet. Of the successful works, 6000 copies are to be distributed amongst the primary schools, and the rest sold at a low price. The first subject proposed is the cause and nature of heat, and its influence on life and nature.

A letter from Constantinople states that the tyranny of Abdallah, the Grand Seignior, is going beyond what could be believed. Having expended immense sums since his accession to the throne, he is endeavouring to recover them by unheard-of exactions. The Osmanlis are not better treated than the Christians. Since he has come to the throne, more than one hundred Christians, the letter states, have died of the effects of the bastinado. It is thought, however, that Abdallah, though so young, cannot live long.

Prince Alexander Galitzin, who but lately was restored to his sight, by a successful operation, died soon afterwards, on the 4th inst., of water on the chest, at his estate in the Crimea, in the 71st year of his age.

The French Princes on Monday gave the spectacle of a stag-hunt to the Arab chiefs in the forest of St. Germain. The Kalifa of Constantina followed the dogs close, and his horse at last run off with him; the rider endeavoured to pull him in; but, the bit breaking, the animal went off, and did not stop for three-quarters of an hour. The Princes, fearing some accident, sent to seek the chief, and the Duc d'Aumale went to meet him. The Kalifa was found coming back in safety. Being asked how he liked the hunt, he replied that "it was exceedingly fine, and worthy of a king."

Prince Edward Lichnousky, the author of the "History of the House of Hapsburgh," died at Munich, on New Year's Day, aged 56. The deceased was a descendant of one of the most ancient and noble families of Austria.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

A POSTMASTER CONVICTED OF EMBEZZLEMENT.—On Wednesday, Robert Hobson, 53, a person of respectable appearance, was tried before Mr. Justice Patteson, for having, while in the employ of the General Post-office, feloniously embezzled the sum of one shilling and tenpence, the moneys of the Postmaster-General.—The Solicitor-General, Mr. Shepherd, and Mr. Adolphus conducted the prosecution; and Mr. Wilkins appeared for the prisoner.—From the evidence of the witnesses, it appeared that the prisoner had the management of the branch post-office at Walthamstow, in Essex; and, on the 14th of December, a woman, named Carter, took a letter, addressed to her husband, a seaman, whom she, at that time, believed to be at Calcutta, to which place the letter was addressed, to the prisoner, and paid him one shilling postage. Shortly afterwards, the prisoner sent to her to say that the postage was one shilling and tenpence; and she gave the additional sum required. The letter never came to hand at the General Post-office; and, in consequence of some suspicion that was created, Mr. Sculthorpe, who holds the office of one of the presidents in that establishment, went down to Walthamstow, accompanied by Peake, an officer in the employ of the Post-office, and he questioned the prisoner upon the subject of the letter, when he gave several contradictory statements respecting it, but asserted that he had sent it in the ordinary course to the General Post-office. While, however, the prisoner was conversing with Mr. Sculthorpe, the officer Peake, who had in the meantime searched the house, found the identical letter in one of the prisoner's private drawers.—Mr. Wilkins made an address on behalf of the prisoner, attributing the proceeding of the prisoner to forgetfulness, and urged that there was no distinct evidence of any intention on his part to defraud the Post-office authorities.—Several highly respectable witnesses were called, who gave the prisoner an excellent character.—The Jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," coupled with a strong recommendation to mercy.—Mr. Justice Patteson sentenced the prisoner to be kept to hard labour for twelve months.

CONVICTION FOR COINING.—John Green, 36, and Anne Green, his daughter, aged nine, were indicted for feloniously making counterfeit coin. In a second count, the prisoners were charged with feloniously colouring counterfeit coin to resemble silver. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Bodkin appeared on behalf of the authorities of the Mint. Some particulars of the case recently appeared under our Police head. It will be recollected that Sergeant Brennan, of the G division of police, went to the apartment occupied by the male prisoner and his family, and, as he was about to enter, the little girl came out and clung to him, at the same time calling out, "Father, father." The sergeant disengaged himself from her, and ran up stairs, when he was met by the man, who rushed upon him and struck him. A severe struggle took place, but eventually another constable came to his assistance, and the man was secured. During the struggle, the little girl made herself very active in attempting to convey away counterfeit coin, and the constables took a considerable quantity away from her. The officers eventually found sixty-one counterfeit half-crowns and forty counterfeit shillings, the whole of which turned out to be made of some soft white metal covered with silver by the electrotype process. In the prisoner's room there were also found two electro-galvanic batteries, and a number of bottles and vessels containing liquids for the purpose of the plating process.—The man, in his defence, asserted that the articles found in his room had been placed there for the purpose of entrapping him, and that he was innocent. The Jury found the male prisoner Guilty, and Acquitted the little girl.—The prisoner begged for mercy, on account of his having a wife and young family.—Mr. Justice Patteson told the prisoner that he should have thought of his family before he committed the offence: the Court felt called upon to pass a severe sentence, which was that the prisoner be transported for fifteen years.

FORGERY.—Benjamin Lamburne, 44, was indicted for feloniously forging and uttering a bill of exchange for £150, bearing two forged endorsements, with intent to defraud the Directors of the Commercial and General Insurance Company and Loan Society.—Mr. Ballantine conducted the prosecution.—The evidence proved that the prisoner applied two years ago to the Commercial and General Insurance Company and Loan Society for a loan of £300, to be repaid by instalments. It was granted on condition of his insuring his life in the office, and giving his bill at three months' date for the sum lent, with solvent endorsers' names upon it. Two friends of his, Samuel Long and Joseph Donovan, accommodated him with their names. The prisoner, when the bill became due, paid the instalment agreed on (£25), and gave another bill for £275, with the same endorsements. In like manner he paid several subsequent instalments, until the debt was reduced to £150, when, in consequence of some dispute between him and the endorsers (Long and Donovan), they gave notice to the office that they would not be accountable for the prisoner's debt, and that they had not endorsed his bills for some time. The prisoner himself also called, and begged of the Directors to receive another bill, with a different endorsment; and he admitted in conversation with Mr. F. Lawrence, who acted for the Society, that he had himself written all the names (four or five) on the bill, except one. The Jury returned a verdict of "Guilty." The prisoner was recommended to mercy by the prosecutors, and the Court sentenced him to be imprisoned for two years.

DEATH OF DEAF BURKE.—On Wednesday afternoon, the above-named individual, so long well known in the pugilistic circles, died at his lodgings in Francis-street, Waterloo-road, Lambeth. Deaf Burke, in many instances, has been known to risk his life for the preservation of others. During the destruction of Astley's Theatre, he was one of the foremost in endeavouring to arrest the progress of the fire, and save the horses.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE (Friday).—Full average supplies of English wheat have been received up to our market since Monday; hence the show of samples of that description of grain here to-day was good. The attendance of buyers was small, owing to which the demand was extremely heavy, and it was only the finest qualities that found purchasers at Monday's prices. Foreign wheat was a mere drug, but not cheaper. In bonded corn we heard of no sales. The supply of barley was rather extensive, hence the trade was decidedly dull, and the rates had a downward tendency. The malt trade was inactive, and prices were with difficulty supported. Upwards of 32,000 quarters of oats having come in from Ireland, the oat trade was very dull. Beans, peas, and flour, without alteration.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 6620; barley, 7910; oats, 7250 quarters. Irish: wheat, ; barley, oats, 32,170 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 1160; barley, 4050; oats, quarters. Flour, 2090 sacks. Malt, 3360 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 39s to 47s; ditto white, 44s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto white, 40s to 47s; rye, 37s to 38s; Grinding barley, 27s to 32s; distilling, 28s to 32s; malting ditto, 35s to 34s; Chevalier, 00s to 00s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 61s to 62s; brown ditto, 57s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 63s to 64s; Chevalier, 65s to 0s. Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potato ditto, 24s to 25s. Youghal and Cork, black, 21s to 22s; ditto, white, 22s to 23s. Tick beans, new, 36s to 37s; ditto, old, 40s to 42s. Grey peas, 36s to 37s; maple, 35s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s per quarter. Town-made flour, 45s to 00s; Suffolk, 33s to 45s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 34s to 54s; Dantzig, red, 40s to 47s; white, 42s to 49s. In Bond.—Barley, 27s to 29s. Oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 15s to 17s. Beans, 24s to 29s. Peas, 28s to 32s per quarter. Flour, Canadian, 21s to 00s; Baltic, 20s to 00s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed, as well as cakes, are in fair request; but all other seeds are a mere drug.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto, foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s per 1000.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 8d; barley, 31s 2d; oats, 21s 10d; rye, 33s 9d; beans, 36s 3d; peas, 36s 1d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which Govern Duty.—Wheat, 45s 4d; barley, 34s 6d; oats, 21s 6d; rye, 32s 2d; beans, 36s 8d; peas, 35s 10d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; barley, 4s 0d; oats, 6s 0d; rye, 12s 6d; beans, 6s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½ per 4 lb. loaf.

Tea.—In low sound congou, a very good business is doing at full prices. All other descriptions of tea are in fair request, and the quotations are steadily supported.

Sugar.—Fine qualities of most kinds of sugar are in fair request at very stiff rates. Other kinds of raw sugar move off slowly, yet we can notice no alteration in value. Refined goods are selling as follow:—Brown lumps, 72s to 72s 6d; and standard, 73s to 73s 6d per cwt.

Coffee.—Ceylon has been in moderate request, at 52s to 52s 6d for good ordinary. All other kinds of coffee are in sluggish inquiry, at about previous quotations.

Rice.—Holders are demanding full prices, which has somewhat restricted purchases. Middling to good white Bengal has sold at 11s 6d to 12s per cwt.

Indigo.—Owing to the approaching public sales, there is very little doing in Indigo. The quantity now declared for the 21st is 7404 chests, 3000 of which are old goods.

Fruit.—As is usually the case at this period of the year, the business doing in fruit is limited, but prices continue to rule about stationary.

Provisions.—Notwithstanding the supply of Irish butter is on the increase, holders continue firm, and prices are supported. Carlows have sold at 96s to 104s; Waterfords, 92s to 96s; and Cloamel, 96s to 102s per cwt., landed. Foreign butter is heavy, and the rates have a downward tendency. The best Friesland may be purchased at 112s to 114s; Kiel, 108s to 112s; and Holland, 104s to 106s per cwt. The bacon trade is heavy, on easier terms. Prime sizeable Waterford, 46s to 47s; heavy, 44s to 45s; Limerick, sizeable, 45s to 46s; and heavy, 44s to 45s, all landed. On board, [illegible] declined in value 1s per cwt. [illegible] 64s to 66s; hams, 54s to 57s; and kegs, [illegible] cwt. [illegible] 40s to 42s per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed [illegible] offered sparingly, at full prices. In all other kinds of oils a moderate business [illegible].

Tallow.—The market is quiet, at 40s to 40s 3d for P.Y.C., on the spot, and 39s 6d to [illegible].

Hops (Friday).—Canterbury, £5 [illegible] £15; [illegible], £1 16s to £4 4; [illegible], £5 10; [illegible], £4 4s to £6 0s; east [illegible], £1 14s to £1 16; [illegible], £1 17s [illegible].

Hops (Friday).—Our [illegible] were thinly [illegible] with the country [illegible]. Little [illegible], only 250 pockets having changed hands, and prices remain unaltered in every instance. We [illegible]:—

[illegible] pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Weald of Kent ditto, £[illegible] to £[illegible]; [illegible] £[illegible] to £10 15s; East Kent [illegible], £[illegible] to £[illegible]; [illegible], £10 0s to £12 12s; Mid Kent Bags, £7 18s to £8 17s; [illegible] £4 0s to £12 0s per cwt.

Coals (Friday).—Carr's Hartley, 20s; Charlotte Main, 21s; Holywell Main, 21s; Clark and Co's, 20s; Heaton, 21s 9d; Braddyl's Hetton, 24s; Lambton, 24s; Stewart's, 24s per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—Our market of to-day was again very scantily supplied with beasts, the general quality of which was inferior. The few prime Scots, &c., on offer, met a steady inquiry at fully Monday's quotations. All other kinds were a dull sale, at barely stationary figures. The arrival from Scotland consisted of 120 Scots. The supply of sheep was limited; while the mutton trade was firm, at full prices. For calves, we had a somewhat active inquiry, at an advance in the rates obtained on last market day, of quite 2d per 8 lbs. In pigs, rather more business was doing, at previous currencies. Milch cows sold heavily, at from £16 to £19 5s each.

Per 8 lbs, to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s to 3s 4d; prime large oxen, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 2d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 10d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 3s 10d to 4s; prime South Down ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; large hogs, 3s to 3s 6d; neat small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s. Suckling calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 18s each. Beasts, 533; cows, 169; sheep, 2550; calves, 123; pigs, 368.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—Each kind of prime meat was in steady request at full prices. Otherwise, the trade ruled dull.

Per 8lbs., by the carcase:—Inferior beef 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s; prime large ditto, 3s to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 2s 6d to 3s 6d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s; middling ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 6d; small pork, 3s 8d to 4s.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The Dividends on Consols and Annuities for Terms of Years are now in course of payment. At present the reinvestments that usually occur when Dividends are payable has not had any influence on the price of Consols, but new Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. have gradually advanced. The rumour of Consols being reduced has alarmed many, and investments in New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. have consequently become more frequent. On Wednesday, the Government broker re-commenced his purchases by taking 15,000, the price improving to 104¼, at which quotation they still remain. Consols have fluctuated between 100¾, buyers (Monday's price), and the closing price of 100⅞ for the account. Bank Stock has yielded a point in some extensive sales, but still quotes 212 to 211. Reduced improved on Wednesday in consequence of the Government broker taking 10,000 on account of the Life Annuity Fund; the last quotation is 100⅝. Exchequer Bills remain at 63 to 65 prem., and India Stock closes at 239½.

The Foreign Market was very flat in the beginning of the week. Mexican was heavy at 34½ to ⅝, and Spanish receded a point upon the publication of the Budget. The Forth packet has only brought about 6000 dollars on account of the dividend overdue, and the agents of the bondholders have written to the committee here, informing them that, in consequence of internal disturbances, the Minister of Finance has appropriated to the public service the Customs' duties. These duties have been pledged to the bondholders since the last arrangement made by the Mexican Government, and the Agents at Vera Cruz consequently felt bound to make a strong representation on the subject, in which they were warmly seconded by our Chargé d'Affaires. The result was, a promise from the Minister to replace the amount in time for the April dividend, by which we conclude the dividend due last October, and promised to be paid in April, is designated. The value of the promise does not appear to be very great, and the stock consequently continues heavy, with little doing. The closing price is 34⅜. Spanish advanced a point on Wednesday, but have since declined, closing at 26⅞ to 27 for the Actives. Three per Cents, 36½; Dutch are steady at 63⅞ for the Two-and-a-Half per Cents. Four per Cent. Certificates, 98⅛; Chilian is 101.

The Railway Market has been less active during the past week, and speculation in the proposed lines is greatly abated. There appears to be a general inclination to await the official reports upon the different lines, previous to entering into any extensive transactions. A special meeting of the Blackwall Railway, held on Wednesday, has been the subject of conversation. The Directors report in favour of a line branching from the Stepney station to Epping, passing through Leytonstone, Wanstead, &c. The resolutions were carried with scarcely any dissentients, but the statements of traffic are to be revised before any further steps are taken. Should this branch ultimately join the Eastern Counties, and Northern and Eastern, it will afford those two railways a terminus, so much required, in the centre of the city. In the foreign lines speculation still exists, as a proof of which the Great Northern Railway of France is at two premium, although the company has not at present received the appointment from the French Government. The closing quotations of the lines most dealt in, are:—Birmingham and Gloucester, 103; Bristol and Exeter, 77; Cambridge and Lincoln, 2¾; Churnet Valley, 4; Direct Northern, 2⅜; Eastern Counties, 15⅞; Brighton, 5⅜; London and York, 4½; Manchester and Leeds, 123; Midland, 116¾; Newcastle and Darlington, 62; North British, 7⅞; South Devon, 15½; Dover, 41½; Trent Valley, 9½; Sheffield and Lincoln, 18s; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 63; Sheffield and Manchester, 97½; Boulogne and Amiens, 46; Great Northern of France, 5¾; Paris and Rouen; 40½; Rouen and Havre, 24¾.

SATURDAY MORNING.—There were no fluctuations worthy of recording, in either the English or Foreign Markets yesterday. Prices remained at previous quotations. In the Railway Market, Great North of England advanced to 151; and Birmingham Stock was done at 229. Boulogne and Amiens have receded to 4¾.

PIANO-FORTE.

Life is not all a de-sert waste, As those would have us think Who sor-row's cup too of-ten taste, Of joys too rare-ly drink: For we, whose pul-ses warm-ly beat Tow'rds all whose hands we press, Can make the waste a gar-den sweet By suc-cour-ing dis-tress. No bound for me of earth or sea, To bid me not to roam, My na-tion shall be all man-kind, And ev'-ry land my home!

The dearest place shall be the spot
Where first I drew my breath;
Oh! ne'er be that first home forgot,
Till I forget in death.

The sweetest music that I hear,
Still seems a village chime;
And where the warmest smiles appear,
Is still the warmest clime!

No bound for me, of earth or sea,
To bid me not to roam;
My nation shall be all mankind,
And ev'ry land my home!

THE WINTER ASSIZE.

AMID all the congratulations that are being made on the activity of commerce, the increase of employment, and the surplus of the public revenue, there are still some things that arise and press themselves on our attention calculated sadly to alloy the gratification springing from the favourable prospect of public affairs. We are passing through a period of almost unparalleled prosperity, and the records of justice show that it is also one almost unequalled for crime. There are dark shades in the otherwise pleasing picture. Like the anxieties and cares which the Roman poet represents as intruding beneath the golden fretted roofs of wealth and power, abating pleasure and poisoning content, the terrible details of crime we have just had forced on our attention, prevent us from believing that our condition is one of perfectly sound and healthy prosperity. The winter assizes, just concluded, have exhibited a dreadful increase in the amount of crime in the country, and that crime deeper in degree than almost any other assizes for the last few years. It was not equalled when destitution, little short of positive famine, was pressing heavily on many of our densely-peopled manufacturing towns; and that the gaols should be so full, the judges so busy, and, what is far more sad than all, that the gibbet should claim so many victims, when there is plenty, peace, and employment in the land, gives the fact the appearance of a social anomaly, serious enough to arouse attention in the most unreflecting.

The worst feature of the numerous trials at the different Assize Towns, is the great proportion of murders and crimes against the person, arising either from passion and revenge, or, still darker, the offspring of cold, calculating treachery, directed to gaining some pecuniary or individual advantage.

One wretched woman poisoned her father, because he was an obstacle to her marriage. Not deterred by a failure in her first attempt, she repeated it, with a cool, unrelenting malignity of purpose, unequalled, save perhaps in the annals of French and Italian crime of the last half of the sixteenth century. Another woman, by the same means, dispatched a grandchild, to avoid the expense of helping to support it. The last dread sentence of the law has been carried into effect in both these cases. The number of charges of infanticide, or concealment of birth, has been great beyond precedent; and both these crimes exhibit a tendency to becoming more prevalent, that cannot too soon be made the subject of inquiry. Offences against the Game Laws have, during the last autumn and present winter, multiplied to an alarming extent; midnight conflicts, of a most ferocious kind, between man and man, ending sometimes in murder, often in bloodshed, and always in hate between the watchers and the watched, that does not die with the occasion that caused it; all this, with the continual demoralization of the peasantry that accompanies it in other respects, is a heavy price to pay for preserves so abundantly stocked, that "a day's sport" might more appropriately be called a day's slaughtering, for noblemen and gentlemen now seem to perform the office of butchers of game for the Metropolitan market. The system has produced, and is producing, an amount of evil that can scarcely be estimated.

From another source, too, the prisons are peopled; every Union Workhouse has a code of laws, any infringement of which subjects the person against which it is proved, to confinement in the gaol. Of most of those offences, the law of the land takes no cognizance, and the proof of them is generally the testimony of the officials and sub-officials of the establishment; many cases, publicly investigated, have proved that this evidence is not always unimpeachable, and the Bumble-like spirit that animated so many of the employés of the old Poor Law system, might be found flourishing in all its "parochial" and pauper-hating intensity, in the officials of the new one. The forcing so many of our poor into the demoralising associations of a prison, is no light evil, and will have an ultimate effect on the aggregate crime of the country. We now not only pay one rate to support the poor, but a large proportion of another rate to punish them for things no statute makes penal. Surely every Union House might maintain its order and discipline without having such continual recourse to the prison! As it is, the distinction between the workhouse and the gaol, is being rapidly confounded, if not destroyed. The principle which seems now pursued of placing pauperism on the same level as crime, confining it in large masses, with all the strictness of bars and bolts, denying it every right of civil, and, what is worse, of social life, and branding it by a convict-like garb with one of the most degrading marks of criminality—all this does not lessen destitution, does not repress it, but makes it fierce and savage, and teaches it to look on all authority and wealth, on all above its own level, as its foe.

One other crime there is which cannot be omitted from the account, for it has played a prominent part, in the trials and convictions of the last Assizes. Incendiarism is a monstrous thing, almost wholly of modern growth, and it is confined to the agricultural districts. How hardened and perverted must men have become ere they could give to destruction the "kindly fruits of the earth," which the labour of their own hands had raised! Could revenge and hatred find a more deadly mode of wreaking themselves? Of all the grades and degrees of crime—scarcely excepting even murder—this is the direst and worst, and how often has it not, of late years, been committed?

We have spoken of the enormities that have been revealed by the last trials and convictions, but the cycle of atrocious criminality does not seem to have closed with them. Within the last few days another female has been arrested on suspicion of having committed a series of murders, which throws the atrocity of the two former wretched criminals we have mentioned, into the shade. Her child, her mother, her brother, and her husband, it is alleged, have all perished, at various intervals within two years, by her hand—poison again being the means! In this case, and in others which have occurred previously to this, there is a peculiar circumstance, which wakens a train of reflection almost too horrible to dwell upon. The desire to get possession of the small sum of money paid by what are called "Burial Clubs," on the death of a member, or a person enrolled in them, has been the inciting motive to assassination! These cases have been discovered—may there not be many which escape detection? And may there not be instances in which inhumanity has been encouraged to hasten the slow approach of death by disease, for the quicker gain of the horrid premium on neglect? We wish this was a matter of speculation and probability only; it may startle the reader, but we can state it to be a matter of fact. The Registry Tables prove that the average mortality among the children of the poor is far greater in those families where the infants are "in the club," than in those where they are not! And that difference is neither slight nor accidental; it is great and marked, and proves that when sickness and disease invade the miserable dwelling, it is not life that is wished for, but the death that is the title to a few shillings or pounds. There is no open act, perhaps, no actual violence; but carelessness and neglect are as sure in their operation. The greatest skill wealth can purchase, the most unremitting attention affection can bestow, often fail in warding off the stroke of death; how easily can it be assisted where there is no wish to arrest it, and a positive interest in its fatal fall? The Pagans of old time never imagined such a crime for such a cause; the Heathens of other lands do not commit it. It is in such hideous facts as these, occurring in the midst of national prosperity, that we are compelled to see what depths of social corruption may lie beneath it.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

Last week I am afraid I wrote to you somewhat too much in "King Cambyses' vein," and the tenor of my letter was as lugubrious as an oratorio. To-day my letter will be all couleur de rose. Before I launch into the description of the overflowing pleasures of the hour, I must tell you that the great and interesting personage upon whom I pronounced last week a sort of premature funeral oration, is, I am happy to say, much improved. M. Villemain has been allowed to handle his razors, has been out for a carriage airing with his doctor for his only companion, and has been moreover allowed to dine with his three youthful daughters. The Ministers, when moving the Chamber of Deputies to grant him a pension, gave his early history, which I had not space for last week, my letter only containing authentic details that do not reach the public. We now hope that M. Villemain—made a professor of the University at twenty years of age! and who from that day to this has only daily increased in reputation, will be shortly restored to reason, and see his sun setting in glory after so promising a dawn in the literary world.

Here we are at length, fairly launched into the recreations of the carnival, and should the vortex of pleasure, the succession of balls, routs, dramatic entertainments, fêtes, &c., continue as headlong and impetuous as at the present moment, we should fear for the heads and the health of our Parisian belles. In this respect, however, a Parisienne yields the palm to none—movement, change, and excitement, are indispensable to her; she can hardly have too much of them, and her thirst for amusement seems only to increase as she proceeds. One of the most magnificent balls of this season, was that of the Countess Pozzo di Borgo, given by her at the former hotel Blacas. On Sunday the reception of the young and pretty Marquis de Padoue attracted all the fashionables. On Monday the soirée of Madame Arabin, sister to the Baroness Delmar. Every Thursday there is a carpet dance, de petit comite, at the house of this lady. The Duke de Pasquier has celebrated his accession to a new title by a diplomatic diner monstre, given perhaps in obedience to the maxim of a celebrated gourmand: "Il n'y a pas de bon Duc sans bon diner." Forty persons from the two Chambers were assembled there, including M. Guizot and the Count Molé.

The Duchess de Nemours has given two soirées: the first of these had been preceded by a select dinner party, consisting of the Count and Countess de de Montalivet, the Count and Countess de Rambuteau, the General Jacqueminct, and the Prefect of Police, besides four of the King's Ministers. In the evening upwards of 200 persons were assembled. The toilette which attracted most attention was that of the Countess Duchatel, who wore a dress of silver lama. The second réunion took place on Saturday last. On the same night the Prefect of the Seine, M. de Rambuteau, gave his first ball, at which the Arab Chiefs, the great lions of the present moment, were present. The fêtes at the English Embassy, suspended by the late domestic affliction of Lord Cowley, will be replaced by private theatricals. "The School for Scandal" is to be performed, and the principal parts in this celebrated comedy will be taken by three descendants of the witty author—Mr. Sheridan and his two lovely sisters. A delightful ball was given the other day at the Austrian Embassy, in the suite of apartments on the Rez de Chaussée. After a supper which recalled, by its fairy-like splendour, the tales of the "Thousand and One Nights," given in the principal dining-room, which is decorated with the most exquisite paintings, the ball was terminated by a Mazurka, danced, for once, by the natives of its fatherland.

The noble dancers of the Quadrille of Francis I., disappointed by the postponement of the fancy ball at the English Embassy of exhibiting their graceful costumes, had desired to transplant it to the Austrian Embassy; there, however, the Mazurka prevailed. The dancers then had recourse to the Princess de Ligne, but at the moment when they seemed to have gained their point, the death of Madame de Trazegins put a stop to this project; the dancers, in despair, then thought of repairing, as a last resource, to the Count de Lowenheim, that witty and talented nobleman, whose inexhaustible memory, stored with anecdotes and souvenirs, make him the charm of Parisian coteries; but, alas! M. de Lowenheim wanted still—to make him perfect—a wife, and a large suite of apartments. The wandering quadrille is still in search of an asylum, and, unless the Marquis d'Aligre, or some other millionaire, should open his doors to receive it, the Parisians run great risks of being deprived of the opportunity of admiring the charming costumes and graceful ensemble which the fair and noble dancers have given themselves so much trouble to perfect.

Another event of great importance in the fashionable and political world has been the opening of the salons of Count de Molé. The new apartments of the ex-Minister, in the Faubourg St. Honoré, have now taken an appropriate air of solemn magnificence, in place of the pretty and coquettish embellishments which characterised them under the feminine superintendence of Madame Lehon. The principal attention was attracted to the portrait of the Duke of Orleans, in the cabinet of M. Molé, under which was written in golden letters these words, extracted from the will of the late Duke:—"To M. le Comte Molé, who married me, and who celebrated the birth of my son by the great act of general amnesty." This soirée was graced by the presence of some of the most distinguished members of both the fashionable and diplomatic world. Amongst others were Lord and Lady Cowley, the Marquis de Brignole-Sale, the Count of Luxbourg, the Prince and Princess de Ligne, and the Count d'Appony. The Princess de Ligne was brilliant both in toilette and in beauty.

The day after the réunion of M. Molé, took place that of the Bavarian Embassy. The Count de Luxbourg has taken every Wednesday, the Marquis de Brignole-Sale every other Sunday, for nights of reception. This nobleman, who prides himself greatly on his descent, in a direct line from St. Francis of Sale, and who is besides a Legitimist by all his family ties and connexions, is at this moment much occupied in the affairs of the Prince Charles Albert, who is endeavouring to re-unite the principality of Monaco to his dominions. The two daughters of the Marquis de Brignolles are at this moment in Paris. The eldest, the Duchess de Gallieva, is staying with the Countess Balbi, one of the stars of Parisian society. The other, the Vicomtesse de Melzi, recently married, has not yet quitted her parents. To-night his Majesty Louis Philippe gives a large ball.

Whilst fêtes and political réunions follow upon each other so fast, musical entertainments keep pace with them. I have already mentioned to you the concerts of the new wonder, M. Felicien David. They still continue to attract crowds. M. Berlioz, determined not to remain in the background, has brought forward his army of singers and instrumentalists. The Cirque in the Champs Elysées is prepared for his concerts—the windows at the top of the building will be concealed by ample drapery, in red and gold; a thousand gas-lights will illumnate the salle, three stoves will give an agreeable warmth to the temperature, and the old place for the orchestra will be transformed into an immense box. A scene from Alceste, one from the Champs Elysées of Orphée, selected, say the wags, in honour of the locality, will form part of the performance. These morceaux, which have not been performed for twenty years, will have the merit of novelty, as will also the Requiem of M. Berlioz himself, which, though once performed at the Eglise des Invalides, at the funeral of General Damremont, was only heard on that occasion by a very limited number of amateurs.

FRANCE.

Considerable interest attaches to the accounts from France this week. The debate on the Address has commenced in the Chamber of Peers. Count Portalis having read the draft of the answer to the Address in answer to the Royal speech, of which, as usual, it was almost an echo, some amendments were suggested by the Marquis de Boissy and the Duke d'Harcourt, which will be discussed hereafter.

Count Molé took the opportunity of making a demonstration against the opinion of M. Guizot, but he commenced his speech by expressly disavowing the idea that he would form part of a coalition for the destruction of the Ministry. He, however, expressed his entire disapproval of the policy pursued by them. The system of making concessions to England on every occasion could not, he thought, be too much reprehended. The questions of Tahiti and the right of search had been treated altogether with a view to satisfy England, and with little attention to the dignity of France. He considered that the utmost injustice had been exhibited in the conduct of the French Cabinet with respect to the taking possession of Tahiti. The country felt this, and he did not think the Government would be able to justify their conduct. On the right of search, also, the Government had not acted according to the engagement which the honourable Minister of Foreign Affairs had entered into with the Chambers. Count Molé then accused the Government of betraying the interests of France, and again condemned its general policy.

M. Guizot denied that any point had been conceded which could compromise the honour and dignity of France. He also denied that any concession could be said to be of a compromising character for the Cabinet. M. Guizot then spoke at great length of the English alliance. He declared that, however the opponents of the Ministry might suppose they could carry on the Government, if in power, by an alliance with England, though without being of such an intimate character, they were greatly mistaken. That alliance must be either of a most intimate character, or of a nature soon to compromise the peace of the world. M. Guizot then adverted to the right of search, and expressed his hope that he should, by the good intelligence of the two Cabinets, bring that question to a satisfactory conclusion. On the points of Tahiti, Morocco, and the other questions mentioned in the speech, he had no doubt of satisfying the Chamber. The hon. minister then attacked Count Molé for his opposition, and intimated that that noble peer lent himself to those persons who were anxious to attack the Government on any point, in order to remove it from power. The hon. minister concluded by expressing his certainty of being able to defend all the acts of the Government.

Count Molé reiterated his charges, and intimated his opinion that the difficulties connected with the affairs of Tahiti were not yet terminated. Count Boissy d'Anglas also attacked the policy of the Government. Count de Montalembert addressed the Chamber, but chiefly upon points connected with the Church, and did not touch upon political subjects.

The discussion was resumed on Tuesday, and is not yet concluded.

Our advices from Paris do not throw any light upon the Ministerial question. The Ministerial journals seem to treat the idea of the overthrow of M. Guizot with ridicule. The Débats characterises what has taken place as the result of an intrigue. It was, nevertheless, reported in Paris that the King had given an interview to M. Molé, for the purpose of submitting a list of a new Administration. This list excluded the name of M. Thiers.

The Paris papers are almost exclusively occupied with the debate in the Chamber, and do not contain any news whatever.

SPAIN.

Our letters from Madrid are of the 8th inst. M. Mon, the Minister of Finance, had just presented to the Chamber of Deputies his long-expected budget for the present year. In this document the general receipts are estimated at 1,250,635,353 reals 23 maravedis, and the expenses at 1,205,522,688 reals 20 maravedis. Among the expenses the civil list figures for 4,350,000 reals; the Minister of war for 323,419,845; the navy, 91,056,181; the finance department, 362,558,540; the foreign department, 11,721,220; grace and justice, 21,654,336; the Interior, 126,021,863; the Coja d'Amortizacion, 95,115,629; and the secular clergy and nuns, 125,495,449. By the second article of the budget the Government demands to be authorised to proceed to the regulation of the internal and external debt of the State, and to pay, in pursuance of that regulation, the interests not included in the budget of expenses for 1845, with the overplus of the proceeds of the public rents and contributions, and by means of a discretionary increase of the same contributions. The Deputies adjourned after another discussion on the Clergy Maintenance Bill. The reading of the budget is stated to have been listened to with great attention, and the committee on it was to meet that very evening.

In the sitting of the Senate another discussion has taken place on the Slave Trade Repression Bill and M. Martinez de la Rosa delivered another speech in favour of the measures proposed by the Government.

PORTUGAL.

We have letters from Lisbon to the 11th inst., but they possess very little interest.

The Portuguese Chambers were opened on the 2nd, by royal commission, the Queen being unable to attend, from her present delicate situation.

At the Chamber of Deputies the Presidential chair was occupied by Padre Marcos, the oldest member of the house, until the re-election of the former President, M. Gorjoo Henriques. There was no business of the slightest importance transacted. Some rumours were abroad that the Esparterists meditated an attack upon Spain through the Portuguese frontier, but the reports were discredited.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

MR. C. MATHEWS AND HIS CREDITORS.—A few days ago an application was made to Mr. Fonblanque, in the COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, by Mr. Lewis, of the firm of Lewis and Lewis, the solicitors for Mr. Mathews, with the view of getting the learned commissioner to settle a form of notice to the creditors of the insolvent to prove their debts, as a preliminary proceeding to the declaration of a dividend. It will be remembered that the insolvent made a proposal to pay £1300 a year, under contingencies, into court, for the benefit of his creditors, by monthly instalments, on being protected from all law proceedings, and it seems that a sum of £650 has been paid into the hands of Mr. Turquand, the official assignee for the creditors, being the first half year's payment since the final order. The creditors have, at present, not been paid a dividend, and the object of the application was to get a form settled to be served on the creditors to prove their debts before they received the dividend to be declared. Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque said he could not, as a single commissioner, make a rule on the subject. Mr. Lewis pointed out to the learned Commissioner, that in a bankruptcy case no creditor was paid a dividend until he had proved his debt; and in the Insolvent Debtors' Court, after notice to a creditor to prove his debt, he was deprived of participation, if he neglected to make good his claim. He suggested, that a similar notice should be given for the creditors to attend and prove their debts, otherwise to be excluded from a dividend. It is understood that a day is to be appointed for the attendance of creditors to prove their debts under the estate.

THE WESTMINSTER LOAN AND DISCOUNT SOCIETY.—In the same court on Tuesday, Mr. Charles Kerry Nicholls, who had been the manager and secretary of the above notorious concern, and, on its breaking up, became bankrupt, was examined. His case has been the subject of protracted inquiry in the court, and his final examination was adjourned from time to time.—Mr. Sturgeon appeared for the bankrupt, and Mr. Lloyd, solicitor, attended on behalf of several creditors.—The amended balance-sheet, on being submitted to the Court, exhibited a total of debts and liabilities to the amount of £15,896 13s. 4d.; to meet which a sum of £25 only had been given up to the assignees, the rest of the deficiency being made up of liabilities, bad debts, and law expenses.—The bankrupt, on being examined by Mr. Lloyd, stated that he was the original founder of the bank, which consisted of twenty-four partners, one of whom had since made off with £500. He admitted having sworn at Croydon Assizes, in March last, that he was a gentleman, and perfectly solvent. He believed that to be the case, but not that he was able to satisfy all the creditors of the bank. He had received £845 in March last, a legacy from his uncle.—Being examined by Mr. Sturgeon, he said that he commenced the Westminster Loan Bank with a capital of £500, which he received from various branches of his family. That had all gone in the common ruin. His position was that of manager of the bank, Cornelius O'Brien, M.P., being chairman. He declared solemnly to God that more than £200,000 had passed through the bank in two years, and the final deficiency was only £3000. The bank was broken up by the attacks of the press, which he withstood for five months, but was obliged to give way at last. His private debts did not exceed £150.—Mr. Sturgeon having been heard for the bankrupt, His Honour said, that the accounts were most extraordinary and unsatisfactory. He should adjourn the examination sine die, and without one day, one hour, of protection.—The bankrupt, on leaving the box, exclaimed, "I am the most fearful victim that ever left this court."—Several victims of the Westminster Loan Society were present, and seemed to take a deep interest in the proceedings.

ALLEGED LIBEL UPON THE EARL OF CARDIGAN.—In the COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH on Monday, the Solicitor General moved on the part of the Earl of Cardigan, now commanding the 11th Hussars in Ireland, for leave to file a criminal information against the printer and publisher of the Court Journal, for having, on the 28th of December last, published a false, libellous, and defamatory paragraph respecting the character of the noble earl. The paragraph in question set forth that there was a cavalry regiment in Ireland, commanded by a noble lord, in which there was an officer, whose wife being very ill in England, the officer applied for, and as a matter of course obtained, leave of absence to come over and visit her; that he did accordingly come over, but that though dangerously ill and dying, she was still lingering on when the officer's leave of absence was about to expire; that the officer then wrote to his commanding officer, the colonel of the regiment, stating the circumstances and requesting a further leave of absence; but that this application was refused, and he was therefore obliged to return to Ireland, and very shortly after his return his wife did actually die. The writer then went on to comment upon the circumstances he had narrated, and denounced the conduct of the colonel as unworthy a Christian or a man. The noble earl was the colonel pointed out by this libellous paragraph. There was an affidavit of General Brown, the Deputy Adjutant-General of the Forces, which stated that there was no cavalry regiment in Ireland commanded by a noble lord, except the 11th Hussars, which regiment was commanded by the Right Honourable the Earl of Cardigan. The noble earl himself made an affidavit, in which he denied, in the most minute, detailed, and direct manner, every single statement in the paragraph. There was not one single word of truth in it. There had not been any officer whose wife had been ill and dying in England—none who had asked for, and obtained leave of, absence on that account, nor any one to whom leave of absence had been refused. Under these circumstances the noble earl felt himself compelled to apply to the court for leave to file this criminal information. The court granted the rule.

EXTRAORDINARY FRAUD UPON THE EXCISE.—In the COURT OF EXCHEQUER, on Tuesday, some proceedings took place in the case of the Messrs. Smith, the eminent distillers of Whitechapel, who it is alleged have defrauded the Excise to an immense extent. We have already mentioned some particulars connected with these supposed frauds. The Solicitor-General appeared on behalf of the Crown, and intimated that he was desirous that the case should be tried at bar. The Chief Baron said the officers of the Crown were entitled to a trial at bar, in any case in which they thought it necessary. The Solicitor-General was aware of the rights of the Crown in this respect, and therefore merely intimated that it was required, in order that a day might be named convenient to their lordships. Thursday, the 6th of February, was finally fixed upon for the trial at bar. In a subsequent part of the day, Mr. Kelly applied to the Court for a rule calling upon the Solicitors of Excise to deliver a particular of the duties in respect of which they alleged the Messrs. Smith were liable, a particular of the quantities of the spirits in respect of which duties were claimed; and also to specify the period when such duties or penalties for the non-payment thereof had accrued. The case was one of a most extraordinary and unprecedented character, and he felt called upon to enter at some length into the particulars on which the application was founded. The counts of the information alleged that the Messrs. Smith had an illegal communication between their rectifying-house and distillery; that spirits were conveyed by means of this communication, and by other means than by waggons and carriages passing over the highway. In another series of counts, the communication was described to be by means of pipes running underground. There were five distinct sets of counts, each count charging the Messrs. Smith with penalties to the amount of £75,000. The penalties which the Crown actually proceeded for were calculated at £500 a-week for three years. The last count claimed £9000 as due to the Crown for duties. The second information, against Mr. James Smith, was substantially the same as that against his brother, and if the offence with which he was charged was established, he would be liable to the Crown in penalties to the amount of £375,000. The premises in which the Messrs. Smith carried on their business as distillers were of vast extent, and had been used in carrying on the business of a distiller and rectifier for above a century. About seventy years ago the father of Messrs. Smith became the proprietor of the premises. For many years after he became the owner, no distinction existed between that portion of the premises used for distilling and that used for rectifying, more than was necessary for the purposes of business. The business was so extensive that many millions were paid by way of duty to Government, and the present defendants, for a long period, actually paid to the Government for duty as large a sum as £1000 per day. In the year 1817, an Act of Parliament passed, prohibiting the carrying on of the two trades of distilling and rectifying, either by the same or different persons, within a quarter of a mile of each other. For the protection of those who had expended large sums in making and fitting up suitable premises for carrying on both trades, however, an exception was made in favour of existing establishments; but it was provided that even in respect of such establishments there should be no private communication, but that the only communication between the distilling and rectifying premises should be by the public highway, and that spirits should only be conveyed from one to the other by means of waggons and carriages. The alterations in Messrs. Smith's premises were made pursuant to this act of Parliament, to the satisfaction of the Excise officers of that day, and all openings between the distillery and the rectifying premises were then blocked up. So matters went on from 1817 to 1825, when another act of Parliament passed, containing provisions similar to that to which he had just alluded; but giving power to the officers of the Crown, upon twelve months' notice, and making compensation, to put an end to the distillation and rectifying of spirits within the prescribed distance, namely one quarter of a mile. No notice was ever given to the Messrs. Smith that the officers of the Crown wished to avail themselves of the power given by this act of Parliament, and from the time of its passing they continued to carry on their business, as they had done before, regularly and honestly, and he hoped he might add lawfully, down to the present time. The Messrs. Smith had made affidavits, in which they explicitly swore, that from 1817 up to the present time they had carried on their business, to the best of their judgment, without any fraud or misrepresentation to the officers of the Excise. After the passing of the act of 1817 every mode was resorted to by Messrs. Smith, in the alterations then rendered necessary in their premises, to satisfy the Excise. The whole of the premises were supplied with water by the East London Waterworks Company. The water was brought, in the first instance, into a great tank, in which a battalion might exercise. The tank contained above 80,000 gallons of water, and from this reservoir the water was distributed, by means of a great number of pipes, into the chambers or warehouses, the pipes running within and without the buildings, some above and others under ground, but all the pipes proceeding from the immense reservoir. In this manner the dwelling-house in which the Messrs. Smith resided, the stables, the distillery, and the rectifying house, were all supplied with water. All these circumstances, it was scarcely necessary for him to state, must have been as well known to the Excise officers, who almost lived on the premises, as to the Messrs. Smith. When any repairs were necessary in the pipes, they were made publicly and openly, thus giving the Excise officers a further means of knowing the exact condition of the premises, and the manner in which business was carried on. No complaint or objection was made, however, up to the year 1844, in the latter part of which certain Excise officers bethought themselves that Messrs. Smith had been carrying on their business in illegal premises, and, to sustain this view, fastened upon the pipes which he had described, saying that, as water was conveyed from one part of the premises to another by means of those pipes, spirits might also be conveyed. Fortunately for the Messrs. Smith, the penalties demanded by the Crown could not go back longer than three years—that was the limit; but the Crown sought to recover penalties to the amount of £500 a week, for three years less six weeks, for the use of those pipes, which their officers had seen with their own eyes every day during the three years.—The Lord Chief Baron was desirous to know, before the statement was proceeded with, whether there was any authority for the application now made? No part of the statement yet made threw any light upon that question. Had the court power to stay the proceedings until particulars were given as required? The Lord Chief Baron then inquired if the information was not sufficiently precise as to time. Mr. Kelly replied, that the information charged the defendants with illegally distilling 50,000 gallons of spirits between the 1st January, 1842, and the 1st November, 1844. In October last the Excise officers entered the premises and stopped the business, without any previous notice or demand. A protracted argument here ensued, as to the power which the Court had to compel the Crown to supply particulars in a case of this nature.—Mr. Kelly contended, that the Crown could have no right in this case which the subject did not also possess in an equal degree, and referred to authorities in support of his argument.—The learned Barons having consulted, the Lord Chief Baron said the Court could not stop the case in the outset, on the ground of want of authority, but would assume it for the purpose of granting a rule nisi. At the same time his Lordship expressed himself opposed to encouraging the practice of applying to the Court for particulars which the Crown officers had not yet denied, and of which they had had no notice.—It was eventually arranged, that an application should be made to the officers of the Crown, for the particulars sought, and if the defendants were not satisfied, they should then apply to this Court.

It is stated, from Berlin, that accounts had been received from St. Petersburgh of a serious indisposition of the Emperor of Russia, and a very extraordinary movement in the Russian Legation at Berlin seemed to confirm the report. According to the accounts, the national Russian party is gaining more influence in the Government, and comprehensive plans are said to be contemplated, not only to exclude foreigners from all important posts in the public service of the state, but also to limit, as much as possible, the German element in the Baltic provinces. The Russian Government has at length given the assurance, that in the course of next year the channel of the mouth of the Danube shall be deepened, that the largest ships may pass it without danger.

PEN-AND-INK DRAWING.—Mr. Minasi, has just completed a most elaborate pen-and-ink copy of Wilkie's "Post-boy:" it is not, however, strictly a transcript, since Mr. Minasi has varied a few of the effects. The drawing is an oval, 4½ by 5 inches; and the very nice finish reminds one of Wollett's engraving.

We hear that Mr. Pritchard, late British Consul at Tahiti, has just sailed, as a missionary, for the populous group of the Samoas, or Navigators' Islands. Thisgroup, which comprises the islands of Upolu, Savaii, Tutuila, Manono, &c., is situated considerably to the west of the Tahitian and Society Islands, and east of the Fijii Islands. The population is about 60,000, whilst that of Tahiti and the Society Islands is only 20,000, of the Marquesas 15,000, and of the Hervey Islands 18,000.

The Detroit Advertiser gives some information in regard to Strongwind, one of the Ojibbeway Indians, who, it will be remembered, married an English girl in London. That paper says:—"We recently saw this Indian with his fashionable wife at our stores, purchasing articles for housekeeping. She is a very pretty, stylish, petite Englishwoman. He is a coarse, awkward, stupid, and booby-looking Indian. She seemed to treat her spouse in rather a schoolmistress style, and was vastly amused at his ignorance of the use of the most necessary household articles. He put in objections to the purchase of anything that did not meet his savage notions, and seemed to doubt the necessity of having earthen plates. She managed the savage pretty well."

REBECCA AGAIN IN WALES.—Late on Monday night week a most outrageous attack was made on the Vicarage-house of Fishguard, the residence of the Rev. Henry Nathan, the Curate, during his absence from home. Mrs. Nathan left the house between the hours of nine and ten o'clock P.M., otherwise death inevitably would have been the result, the attack being so severe with stones of huge dimensions; when about seventy panes of glass were destroyed, besides other damages. Strong suspicions fall on three notorious characters, who were committed in the autumn of 1843 for destroying the turnpike-houses of the parish of Fishguard. This enmity against the Rev. Henry Nathan arises from the circumstance of his communications with the Secretary of State on the subject of the Rebecca riots, the result of which has been the discontinuance of any destruction of property, save in the present instance.

POLICE.

THE WAR AGAINST THE FRUIT-WOMEN.—A day or two ago, a comely and neat-looking girl, named Eliza Harrington, was charged at WORSHIP-STREET Police office by a police constable of the N division, No. 215, with having unlawfully caused an obstruction of the foot-pavement in Shepherdess-walk, City-road. The officer stated, that in consequence of frequent complaints on the part of the shopkeepers in that locality of the serious injury they sustained in their business by the competition of cheap itinerant traders in fruit and other commodities, the police had received orders to adopt strict and summary measures for the suppression of the annoyance, by removing all obstructions caused by that description of traffic. On the preceding evening, while on duty in Shepherdess-walk, he saw a great number of fruitsellers offering their goods, and succeeded in effecting the removal of the majority of them; but the prisoner, who had a small quantity of oranges in her apron, which she was hawking about to passengers, not only positively refused to go away, but also made use of offensive epithets to wards him, in consequence of which he took her into custody. He had no sooner done so, however, than the prisoner set up a loud lamentation, and declaring she would not be taken to the station, threw herself down on the pavement. A number of bystanders immediately took part with her, and rescued her from his custody; but another constable came up, and with his assistance she was again captured and taken off to the police-station.—Mr. Broughton: Pray, what right had you to interfere with the girl at all in the first instance?—Policeman: I only acted, your worship, strictly according to the orders I had received from my superintendent; we have positive directions to remove such persons.—Mr. Broughton: But can you show me any law which prohibits a poor woman like the prisoner from carrying about a few oranges in her apron, and endeavouring to get an honest livelihood by offering them for sale to any person who may choose to purchase of her?—Policeman: No, your worship; but I considered myself bound to act in obedience to the orders I had received, though it was chiefly in consequence of her bad language that I took her into custody.—Prisoner: I can assure you, sir, that I did not make use of any bad language at all; but the policeman did to me, and he called me a thief.—Mr. Broughton: So then you have taken this unjustifiable step, I suppose, in order to please the shopkeepers, for I can tell you positively that there is no law to justify such a proceeding. If poor creatures like this are to be seized, and swept off to the station-house merely because they use praiseworthy exertions to support themselves and their relatives independently by the exercise of their honest industry, the only alternative left them is to throw themselves upon the parish and enter the workhouse, or die from actual starvation. That the prisoner, under such exasperating circumstances, should make use of some hasty and intemperate expressions, if she has done so, is not at all to be wondered at; but I consider that she has been already more than sufficiently punished for such an indiscretion, and therefore discharge her. The poor girl curtsied very gratefully to the magistrate, and was let out of the dock.—[We are glad to see that at last some check has been put upon the merciless attacks of the police against poor fruit-women. A petty war has been carried on against this class for years, and Mr. Broughton seems to be the first magistrate who has had the courage to set his face against such mischievous persecution. It is really monstrous that poor people should be prevented from obtaining a few hardly-earned pence, under the pretence that they cause an obstruction. It would be well if the police would bestow the vigilance sometimes wasted in annoying fruit-women, upon thieves and other bad characters. As Mr. Broughton truly said, the workhouse or starvation were the only alternatives for those who were prevented from exercising honest industry. It will be seen that the policeman endeavoured to make out that bad language had been used, but failed to do so. Mr. Broughton indeed appeared to be of opinion that there was enough to exasperate the poor girl. Sancho Panza thought that "fine words buttered no parsnips;" and it is not likely that a few choleric ones from such a defendant could have done the policeman any material harm. There was a somewhat similar case at Queen-square police-office on Monday, when three fruit-women were brought up, charged with "obstructing the footway." The police, in support of the accusation, said that the defendants, who were separately charged, their offences having been committed at different times and places, were exposing apples and oranges for sale in their aprons, in the neighbourhood of the Broadway, on Sunday. They created such an obstruction that respectable persons were driven into the road.—Mr. Bond, the magistrate, took the same common sense view of the matter as Mr. Broughton. He gave his opinion that the women could not create much obstruction by pursuing their calling in the manner described. "If carrying a few oranges or apples in an apron were an offence against the law, a stop might be put to selling goods in the streets altogether."—The result of the case was that the women were discharged, upon giving a promise that they would not stand together in a crowd upon the pavement.]

STRANGE DECEPTION AND ROBBERY.—At HAMMERSMITH Police-court on Monday, a tall man, respectably dressed, described as Angus Gillies, thirty-five years of age, who was stated to have been a constable of the A division of the Metropolitan Police force, was brought before Mr. T. Paynter, on a charge of having stolen £165, the property of Mrs. Mary Lewis, of No. 3, Chapel-side, Bayswater. The warrant upon which the prisoner was apprehended was issued about the commencement of December last.—Mrs. Mary Lewis, a female of respectable appearance, about sixty years of age, stated that, on that occasion, the prisoner, to whom she was engaged to be married, came to her on the 25th of November last, at Bayswater, for the purpose of going to take a coffee-shop on Ludgate hill, for the goodwill of which they had paid a deposit of £5. She had then just sold out £170 in the Three per Cents., which she had in her possession. When they were about to start, the prisoner told her she had better give him the money, and she forthwith gave him fifteen £10 and three £5 Bank of England notes. They then went together to Ludgate-hill to the coffee-shop, and, after examining the property, they went into a private room to settle the affair. While there, the prisoner all at once jumped up from his seat, apparently in great fright, and said, "My God, I have lost my book containing the money, I must have dropped it in your room," and asked her for the key, saying he would go back and seek for it. He then went away alone, and when he came back he said it (the money) was not there, and he must have dropped it on the road. They then went together to the Bank, and got the number of the notes, and stopped them, when they walked home together. On the following Friday she again saw him, when the prisoner said he would go to Brentford to try if he could borrow the money, since which time she had not seen him, and she had reason to believe that at the time the prisoner so obtained the money from her he intended to steal it.—On the prisoner being placed at the bar, Sergeant Cumming applied to have him remanded for a fortnight or three weeks, to afford time for getting up witnesses necessary to prove the case, from Liverpool and Scotland.—Police-constable Wyness, D 43, deposed that he apprehended the prisoner on the morning of Sunday, the 29th of December last, at Arrisig, in Inverness-shire. On taking him into custody he read the warrant to him, when the prisoner said if he had any money belonging to Mrs. Lewis, she could have it again.—Mr. Paynter inquired if any portion of the property had been recovered?—Wyness said he had since traced six £10 and two £5 notes, which were now in the custody of the sheriff substitute of the county, and also forty sovereigns. In the prisoner's boxes were also found a quantity of new wearing apparel, also fire-arms, gunpowder, and shot, and on his person £28 in gold, and 12s. 6d. in silver.—The prisoner was then remanded until the 30th inst., by which time it is expected all the necessary witnesses will be in attendance.—The prisoner, who is stated to be a married man, with a family, was on the point of leaving Scotland for America when he was apprehended.

THE TRICKS OF BEGGARS.—At the THAMES Police-Office, on Tuesday, a half-naked mendicant, named James Barnett, nineteen years of age, whose only clothing was a thin pair of trousers and a blue checkered shirt, the colour of which could hardly be distinguished, was charged by police-sergeant Grave of the K division, with an act of mendicancy, by which he had successfully levied contributions on the public. The officer said the prisoner braved the damp and inclemency of the weather with the shirt and trousers, and was lying in the middle of the footpath in the Commercial-road, with the word "Starvation" chalked on the flag-stones in front of him. The prisoner trembled excessively, and his imposition was rewarded with plenty of coppers, hot soup, and victuals. Mr. Broderip: That trembling was simulated no doubt.—Grave: It was, Sir; but the compassion he excited was very great. His feet were bare, as they are now; his head uncovered, and his bosom exposed to the wind and rain.—Mr. Broderip: He is trembling now in every limb, and it is easy to see it is simulated.—The prisoner: No it aint, its all right. (Laughter.) I am starving. Hunger's a sharp thorn.—Mr. Broderip: Exactly what the class of mendicants to which you belong chalk on the stones in fine round hand and lie down before it.—The prisoner: Well I'm a stranger here and no mistake.—Childs, the beadle of the Tower Liberty, said he had driven the prisoner away from Tower Hill and Trinity-square, several times, while living upon "starvation"—(A laugh)—and that he defied the coldest day, with the help of goes of gin and hot soup.—Mr. Broderip: And always shivering as he is now?—Childs: Always, Sir. I have seen warm clothing given him, and as good shoes as I have on my own feet, but he has come next day in the same half-naked state. He has felt my cane several times, but he can always outrun me. He has a little girl with him sometimes, and he makes a capital living.—The prisoner said that all Childs had said was false, and that he was perishing.—Grave: I found his pocket full of coppers.—Mr. Broderip said, he could himself confirm the officer Childs. He had seen the prisoner often, and he was a most arrant impostor, who lived by exciting the compassion of the public. The mischief done by such fellows was very great. Persons were taken in by their apparent destitution. He had seen the prisoner on the coldest and most inclement days crouched down on the footpath, with the dress he then had on, and the word "starvation" chalked on the stones, and the quantity of halfpence and pence he had seen going from the pockets of poor people to relieve him was really astonishing. The acting of such mendicants took money from the pockets of those who could ill afford it, and injured the really deserving poor who wanted relief. He committed the prisoner to the treadmill for fourteen days.

HOUSEBREAKING.—At LAMBETH Police-office on Wednesday, Henry Stephens, a young fellow who has been transported, was charged before Mr. Henry with breaking and entering the dwelling-house of Thomas Wade, No. 1, Weymouth-street, Walworth-road, with three others, on the evening of Tuesday week. When the prisoner was first brought before Mr. Henry, the prosecutor did not attend, and it was then stated that he (the prosecutor) had gone into Wales. Mr. Henry at that time issued a summons to cause his attendance on Wednesday, when the prisoner was again brought up. In reply to the questions from Mr. Henry, Wade stated that on the evening of Tuesday week, at about eight o'clock, he returned home and knocked at his door for admission, supposing his wife was inside. He received no answer, but hearing footsteps were about he again knocked, and could then observe a light in the hall. In a moment or two afterwards the door opened and four persons rushed out upon him with such a force as nearly to knock him down. When he partly recovered he seized the prisoner, and held him until a constable came up. When the parties rushed out, and just as he had seized the prisoner, he heard some keys fall on the ground, and four skeleton keys were found close to where the prisoner stood. The witness further stated that he dealt in jewellery, which he got up from Birmingham, and sold to different hawkers. Mr. Henry ultimately remanded the prisoner for the attendance of other and necessary witnesses.

ANOTHER CANDIDATE FOR A PRISON.—At CLERKENWELL Police-office on Wednesday, a half-starved, half-naked looking man, named Catlin, was charged as follows:—He went into a baker's shop, in St. John-street, on the previous evening, and asked for some bread; he was told there was none for him, upon which he coolly took up a penny loaf, saying—"Then I will help myself," and walked out. He then went to the shop of Mr. Ashley, 50, Goswell-street, and after surveying the contents of the window for a moment, smashed eleven large panes of glass with his clenched fists, thrusting both his hands through separate panes at the same time. When arrested, he said he wanted to get into prison, but made an attack on the constable who apprehended him. When placed at the bar, he again gave such signs of pugnacity that the magistrate ordered him to be handcuffed. He was fully committed for trial for stealing the penny loaf. He obstinately refused to give any account of himself, and rolled his eyes as if he were insane.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRISTOL AND EXETER RAILWAY.—On Thursday a special general meeting of the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company was held at the White Lion Hotel, Broad-street, Bristol, to consider the propriety of constructing branches from the Bristol and Exeter line of railway to Clevedon and Yeovil, the making of a new approach to the terminus in Temple Mead, and giving the directors authority to apply to Parliament for a bill to empower the directors to take shares on account of this company in the Cornwall Railway from Plymouth to Falmouth, and also to empower the directors to issue new shares in the Bristol and Exeter Railway, or to adopt such other measures as they might deem expedient for raising the capital necessary. The chair was taken by Frederick Ricketts, Esq. It was decided to make a railway from Durston, between Bridgewater and Taunton, to Yeovil, in the county of Somerset; another railway, from Clevedon Road Station to Clevedon in the same county, and an improved junction with the Great Western Railway at the Bristol terminus; and also to take 15,000 shares of £50 each in the Cornwall Railway from Plymouth to Falmouth (in continuation of the South Devon Railway). An additional capital of £500,000 was granted by the shareholders to carry out these plans, to be raised by the issue of 15,000 third shares, at £23 6s. 8d. per share. It was stated, in answer to Mr. Divett, M.P. for Exeter, that the Tiverton line would be laid down on the atmospheric principle, but that to Clevedon would not be. The Yeovil line was not decided on that point.

BALL AT A RAILWAY STATION.—On Wednesday evening, the Railway Station at Swindon, on the Great Western Railway, was put to a novel use, namely, appropriated to the pleasures of the dance in the shape of a grand ball for the recreation of the country gentry of Berkshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire, and Middlesex. The splendid rooms seemed one blaze of light and beauty. Elegant chandeliers filled with wax candles depended from the ceilings, which are richly painted—the whole of the walls were richly hung with pink and white striped guaze, and festooned with artificial flowers and laurels. The company began to arrive at nine o'clock and continued till ten. The dance was kept up till a late hour in the morning and all passed off with great eclat.

FRATRICIDE IN STAFFORDSHIRE.—A fearful case of fratricide has taken place in Staffordshire. The facts may be gathered from the evidence taken at the Coroner's Inquest, which lasted two days, and which resulted in a verdict of wilful murder. The murder was committed on the night of Friday week, at a place called Biddulph, in the Moorlands, about six miles from Tunstall, and three or four miles from Congleton. The condition of the unfortunate parties was that of small farmers. It appears that Thomas Brough, the deceased, lived at New Bent Farm; he had accumulated a little property, including Whitefield Farm, which is situate between 300 and 400 yards from his own house, and it was in this that his brother John Brough resided along with his mother. The mother was the recognised tenant, though it would seem that the son John managed the farm, and was applied to for the rent, when due. On Friday week, about dusk, the deceased put a distress warrant on the goods for the rent due, amounting to £29 12s., and the officers, in the hope of obtaining an amicable settlement between the brothers, sent for the deceased, who came to the farm, and entered into conversation with his mother and his brother on the subject. Angry words subsequently took place between them, and it terminated in their both leaving the house together, the deceased saying he would go home and the other (the accused) stating he would go and finish his work in his barn. The deceased was afterwards seen walking down a meadow, and in the direction of his house; and it is supposed the brother followed him to a brook at the end of a meadow, where he brutally murdered him by beating his head with an iron hammer. As deceased did not return home, his wife became alarmed, and assisted by two other persons made various inquiries after him until a late hour that night, but nothing was heard of him until Saturday about noon, when his body was discovered lying at the bottom of a sand-pit on Biddulph Moor. Information was, of course, immediately given, and the accused was among others who assisted in tracing the spot where he had been dragged from, and found the hammer with which the murder had been committed, covered with blood and hair. In consequence of his having been the person with whom the deceased was last seen alive, and from other circumstances of suspicion, he was taken into custody, as well as another brother named James. However, at the coroner's inquest the latter was discharged from custody, and was admitted as a witness against his brother, and he said that his brother had told him that he had killed the deceased, and had requested him to assist in secreting the body. When called upon by the coroner as to what he had to say in reply to the charge, he burst into tears, and exclaimed, he supposed he must suffer as other folks had done. At the conclusion of the inquest he was fully committed on the coroner's warrant for trial.

SUICIDE AT MANCHESTER.—On Saturday last Mr. Louis Schwabe, the celebrated manufacturer of figured silks by the jacquard loom, poisoned himself. The deceased was a gentleman much respected in the town, and was well known throughout the commercial world for the energetic perseverance with which he pushed forward the improvement of the silk manufacture by means of the jacquard loom. It appears that Mr. Schwabe had recently lost a valued relation, and appeared depressed in spirits in consequence. He was taken ill on the Friday night, or early on Saturday morning, and in consequence of the symptoms which exhibited themselves, medical assistance was called in, and the stomach-pump used, but he died at about half-past seven o'clock in the morning. An inquest was held on the body at the house of the deceased, and a verdict was returned to the effect that the deceased came to his death in consequence of having taken oil of vitriol, being at the time in a state of temporary insanity. The deceased was about 44 years of age.

THE ATTEMPT TO POISON A FAMILY AT MANCHESTER.—Last week we gave some particulars of an attempt made by a man named Benjamin Anderson, to poison his wife and two children. He has since been again examined. The prisoner, who is a ferocious-looking fellow, appeared quite unmoved at the situation in which he stood, and had lost the vacant stare which he exhibited on the occasion of his first examination. The evidence previously adduced went the length of showing that sugar of lead had been found in some sugar in a cupboard in the prisoner's house, and that the prisoner's wife had recognised it in a basin of tea which she had made. It was also proved that the prisoner had been seen doing something in the cupboard where the sugar and poison were found, and the reason of his being remanded was in order that the police might ascertain where and when he had purchased the poison. Mr. Beswick, the chief superintendent of police, called Mr. James Croft, druggist, who stated, that on Friday night week the prisoner came into his shop and asked for a pennyworth of sugar of lead for eye-water. He gave the prisoner an ounce of sugar of lead wrapped in paper. He had no doubt but that the prisoner was the man. In cross-examination by Mr. Harding, the witness said he did not mark the paper with the word "poison." The prisoner was fully committed for trial at the next Liverpool assizes.

A PLEASANT COMPANION.—On Saturday evening week Mr. Charles Hancock, a farmer residing at Heswell, about eight or nine miles from Woodside, was in Liverpool, disposing of some market produce. He returned by the Birkenhead boat about 5; and in passing across Bidston Common, in his vehicle, he was met by a person in woman's apparel, who begged of him to allow her to ride as far as Woodchurch in the vehicle. Mr. Hancock acceded to her request; but had scarcely driven on again before he discovered, to his amazement, that his female companion, as he supposed, exhibited a dark, bushy whisker upon that side of her face which was exposed nearest to his view. Immediately he dropped his whip, as if by accident, and requested the lady to step down and pick it up. The stranger got out, and Mr. Hancock drove off at such a rapid speed, that, on entering his farmyard, the horse dropped down dead. When he had driven about a quarter of a mile from the place where he had dropped his whip, two pistols were fired at him, both of which fortunately missed. In the gig the stranger left a basket, which was found to contain a large carving-knife and a brace of loaded pistols.

VERDICT OF MANSLAUGHTER AGAINST AN ENGINEER.—On Friday week an inquest was held at Tipton, Staffordshire, on the body of a boy about fourteen years of age, who was killed by the explosion of a boiler, at the ironworks of Mr. Thomas Morris, Park-lane, Tipton. One of the boilers blew up, and the deceased, who was near at the time, was dreadfully scalded and burnt, and blown into the canal by the force of the explosion. He got out of the canal, but afterwards died of the injuries he had received. It was proved at the inquest, that the boiler must have become empty and red hot, in consequence of neglect by the engineer. It was also proved that he was absent from the engine when the explosion took place, and that it would not have happened if he had used common care, and attended to the buoy of the engine. The jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter," and the engineer was committed for trial.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE AT BATH.—A very destructive fire, unhappily attended with fatal consequences, took place at Bath on Monday, at the Horse and Jockey public-house, in the occupation of Mr. Kilson, in Barton-street, Queen-square. Mrs. Ann Cross, a bedridden old lady, 78 years of age, was lying in a helpless state in bed in a front room on the first floor. One of the servants made two attempts to save the unfortunate creature, which proving unsuccessful, a workman, by the means of a ladder, entered the room by the window. He succeeded, after much difficulty, in getting the afflicted woman out of bed, but owing to her great corpulency he was unable to lift her from the ground, and finding that the floor was giving way underneath him, he was forced to leave her and make a hasty retreat by the window. In a few minutes afterwards the fire gained the room, when her cries were distinctly heard—"Oh save me, oh save me," which created the deepest sensation. The flames continued to rage with unabated fury, and in less than an hour the whole building was consumed. In the course of the day the burnt remains of the poor sufferer were collected. An inquest was held, and a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW.—INSTALLATION OF THE LATE LORD ADVOCATE AS LORD RECTOR.—The installation of the Lord Rector, Andrew Rutherfurd, Esq., took place in the Common Hall of the College, on Saturday, in presence of the professors, students, and a large assemblage of ladies and gentlemen. Seated beside the professors were Lords Cockburn, Fullerton, and Ivory; Sheriff Alison, and the Lord Provost. In the absence of the Rev. Principal Macfarlan, Professor Hill opened the proceedings with prayer. The usual oaths were then administered to the Lord Rector. The speech of Mr. Rutherfurd was characterised by little worthy of note. The learned gentleman referred to the tests in the Universities, and regretted that these were not abolished in all the Universities of Scotland, and concluded with an eloquent appeal to the students not to live in vain, but to leave some memorial of good to those who should live after them.

ESTABLISHED PRESBYTERY OF GLASGOW.—A meeting of the Presbytery was held on Monday for the purpose of hearing proof, and giving judgment, in the case of the Rev. Mr. Nisbet, charged with having, upon particular occasions, been discovered under the influence of intoxicating liquors. He was found guilty, by a majority of eight to to three, upon the twelfth charge, which referred to his having been in the Black Bull of Glasgow, upon a particular occasion, and by his own confession there become the worse for liquor. Dr. Muir, who made the counter motion, craving a verdict of guilty on four of the charges libelled upon, protested against this decision. Dr. Hill then moved, and was seconded, that Mr. Nisbet be suspended from the work of the ministry for three months, and that the Moderator, in pronouncing the judgment of the Court, be empowered to address Mr. Nisbet in the language of persuasion. Dr. Muir moved as an amendment that the term of suspension be six instead of three months; but, upon the votes being taken, the former motion was carried by a majority of seven to four. The Moderator then pronounced the judgment of the Court.

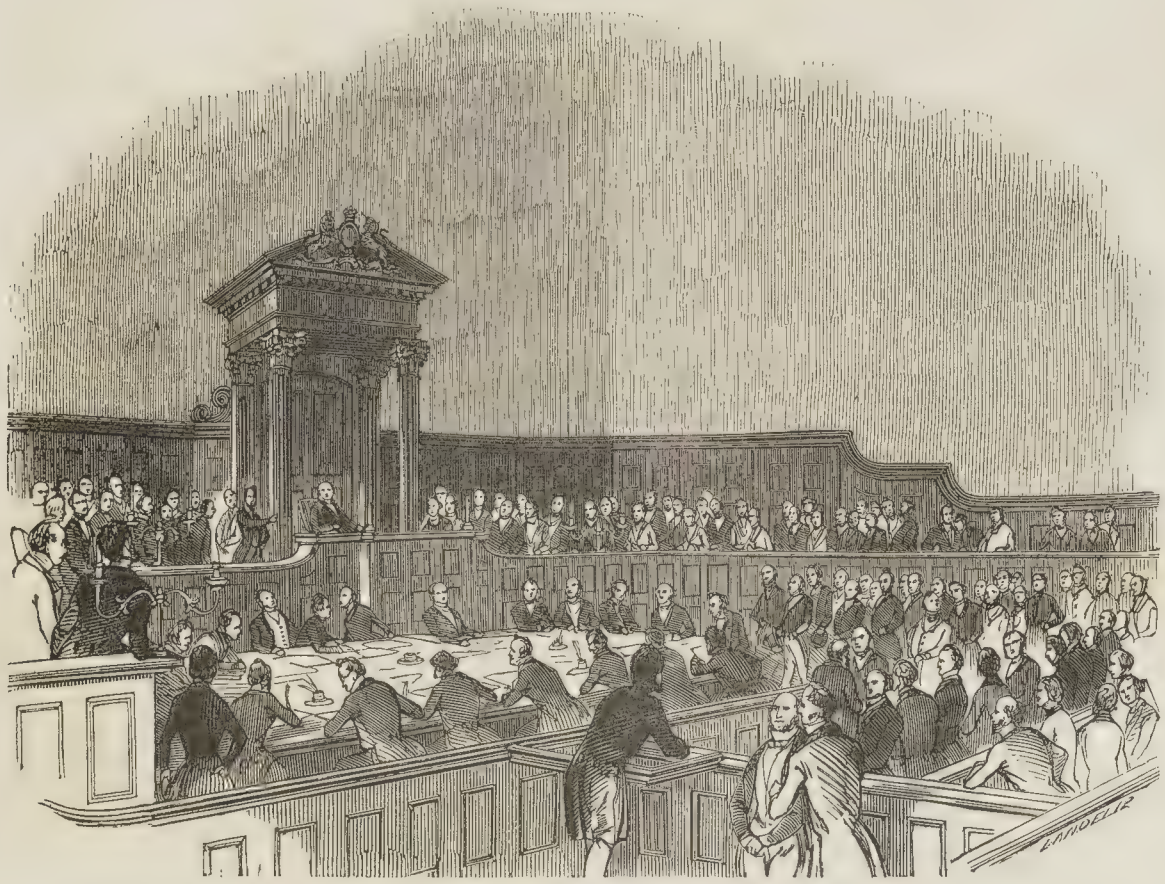
RESCRIPT FROM THE SEE OF ROME.—The Dublin papers contain a letter from Dr. Crolly to Mr. O'Connell, in which he incloses a brief from the Papal See, addressed to the Roman Catholic Primate of all Ireland, deprecating ecclesiastical connexion with the recent political agitation there. We subjoin a translation of the most interesting portion of this document. It says:—"It will be assuredly in your grace's recollection that a letter was forwarded to you from this sacred congregation on the 12th of March, 1839, strongly urging your grace, on the part of our holy father Gregory XVI., to whom it had been represented that one or two prelates and some ecclesiastics of that kingdom had mixed themselves up too much with political affairs, and had harangued the people on the state of the commonwealth, should such report prove correct, carefully to suggest to them the propriety of altering their conduct, and adopting a demeanour more becoming their sacred ministry. Undoubtedly, the sacred congregation trusts that you have used every means in your power, and all that earnestness which the importance of the matter required, and which your devotedness to the Apostolic See led to expect; nevertheless, that the desired result has not followed your earnest efforts is apparent, particularly from the public journals of those countries where speeches are published as spoken of late by some members of the clerical, some even of the Episcopal, order, both at meetings and at banquets, nay, even in temples of God, before a concourse of people; which speeches, if correctly reported, are far from showing that the speakers are, as they ought to be, exclusively devoted to the salvation of souls, the good of religion, and the honour of God, and, consequently, utterly adverse from the pursuits of political faction and the turmoils of the world. It is not to be concealed that such results have been most distressing to this sacred congregation, and to his Holiness himself, because they tend to the detriment and disgrace of the universal church; and they create a feeling specially prejudicial to the Holy See itself, inasmuch as it would seem to be unmindful of imparting salutory councils to the clergy in question, or was favourable to the views and projects above described, or connived, in any form, at their promulgation; and in reality, your Grace is not, perhaps, aware that such complaints, or rather accusations, have actually found utterance, as the Holy See, by sad experience, can sorrowfully attest. And for these motives the sacred congregation hastens, at the command of his Holiness himself, to address you again on this most important subject." The document, in conclusion, urges those in holy orders to abstain from mixing themselves up with secular affairs. It is dated from the Palace of the Propaganda, Rome, Oct. 15, 1844.



NATIONAL EDUCATION IN IRELAND.—A document has been published emanating from nine out of the fourteen Bishops still remaining to "the United Church of England and Ireland," deprecating the so-called system of "national education," and stating the reasons that influence their own opposition to it, and induce them to seek the co-operation of their clergy and people. The prelates who sign this paper are his Grace the Lord Primate, the Bishop of Kildare, the Bishop of Clogher, the Bishop of Kilmore, the Bishop of Down and Connor, the Bishop of Cork and Cloyne, the Bishop of Killaloe and Clonfert, the Bishop of Ossory and Ferns, the Bishop of Cashel and Waterford. Those whose names do not appear are the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Meath, the Bishop of Limerick, the Bishop of Tuam, the Bishop of Derry; and of these the Bishop of Limerick is resident abroad, in consequence of ill health.

THE CHARITABLE BEQUESTS ACT.—A monster letter from Mr. O'Connell deluges the columns of the Irish papers. It is addressed to the Roman Catholic Bishop of Meath, and is partly devoted to arguments in opposition to those contained in the pastoral letter of the Most Reverend Dr. Murray, one of the Roman Catholic Prelates appointed Commissioners under the Act. The rest consists of Mr. O'Connell's own reasons for disapproving of the measure. The name of these reasons is legion.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The meeting of this body on Monday was not marked by any incident of particular consequence. Mr. J. Reilly took occasion to address the meeting upon the Papal Rescript above alluded to. The Ministers of England, he said, were sworn to hold no communication with Rome, and yet in the face of that oath negotiations had taken place. Why had this intercourse taken place? Because everything which had been tried for the purpose of suppressing Repeal—projected massacres and legal quibbles, had been attended with the most signal discomfiture, and the Pontiff of Rome, as a last resource, was called in as an auxiliary of the attempt to extinguish the flame of nationality in Ireland. (Cheers). Upon the solicitation of the Emperor of Russia the Pope had interfered in the affairs of Poland when it was sought to crush liberty in that country, and the reward of that interference was, that the Catholic priesthood in Poland and in Russia were treated with the utmost harshness. (Hear, hear). How was the Pope induced to interfere in the temporal affairs of Ireland? Was it by fair argument? No such thing. The Ministers who could break their oaths to their Sovereign would not hesitate to tell lies to the Pope. (Hear, hear). Whether he was influenced by threats, by cajolery, or by stupifying him, the attempt was equally atrocious, and he told the world that no temporal mandate from the Pope could have any effect with the people of Ireland. (Loud and prolonged cheering). The Pope, he regretted to say, was a most excellent Conservative in his own dominions—he was anything but a Liberal at home; his subjects had no temporal liberty, and therefore he was not to be followed or obeyed in temporal matters. (Renewed cheering). He had the most profound veneration for the Pontiff in his spiritual capacity—as the Vicar of Christ on earth; but, although he was a firm but unworthy member of the Roman Catholic church, no Protestant in the land would stand up more determinedly against his usurpation of any temporal authority. (Loud cheers, and cries of "We won't obey it.") He repeated, that in temporal matters, and especially as regarded Repeal, he valued the opinion of his Holiness as little as he did that of Sir R. Peel. (Cheers). Mr. W. S. O'Brien addressed the meeting at great length upon the subject of Repeal reading-rooms, and moved the adoption of a set of rules for their guidance, which was agreed to. Mr. O'Neill Daunt also addressed the meeting at considerable length, principally upon the subject of the Rescript, vehemently declared that the Pope had not, ought not to have, and, with the help of God, never would have, any temporal power in Ireland. (Loud cheers). The chartered principle of the Repeal Association was, that Irishmen alone should make laws for Ireland, govern Ireland, or dictate in her political affairs; and to that principle they were determined to adhere. (Cheers). The rent for the week being stated at £263 18s. 1d., the meeting adjourned.

THE MURDER OF THE LATE ARTHUR GLOSTER, ESQ.—Six men have been apprehended by the Ennis constabulary, charged with conspiracy to murder the late Mr. Gloster, who, as our readers will recollect, was shot in his gig, while returning from the Road sessions at Spancilhill, between the villages of Quin and Kilkishen, in the month of November last.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, AT STOWE.

A COUNTY MEETING AT AYLESBURY, TO ADDRESS HER MAJESTY.

THE RECEPTION-ROOM, AT THE WOLVERTON STATION.

The visits of Her Majesty to her subjects, although not made with any "pomp or circumstance," are looked to with great interest by the whole nation, and we are sure our readers will consider every incident connected with the Royal progress upon the present occasion worth recording. We therefore supply a full account of the circumstances attendant upon the visit of Her Majesty and her Royal Consort to the Duke of Buckingham's magnificent seat at Stowe.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Royal suite, left Windsor Castle at a quarter before eleven on Wednesday morning, in three carriages and four, for the Slough station of the Great Western Railway. Her Majesty was attended by the Marchioness of Douro, the Hon. Miss Kerr, and the Earl of Jersey, Master of the Horse. Major-General Wemyss, Clerk Marshal, and the Equerry, Colonel Bouverie. Mr. George Edward Anson was also in attendance on his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

The special train being in readiness to convey her Majesty to town, was at once set in motion, and arrived at the Paddington terminus of the Great Western Railway at twenty-five minutes after eleven. Her Majesty having expressed her intention to avail herself of the opportunity which was offered, by her passage through town, to pay a brief visit to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, and the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, gave orders that the troop of the 17th Lancers, which was in readiness to escort her Majesty, should trot on to the Euston-square terminus, whilst her Majesty and the Prince, in a travelling chariot and four, followed by his Royal Highness's attendants, Major-General Wemyss and Colonel Bouverie, in another carriage and four, proceeded to Cambridge House. The Marchioness of Douro, the Hon. Miss Kerr, and Lord Jersey, proceeded direct to the Euston-square terminus, in order to be ready to receive the Queen on her arrival.

Her Majesty and the Prince were received at Cambridge House by their illustrious relatives, and her Majesty was forthwith conducted to the apartments of the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz. After remaining for nearly twenty minutes at Cambridge House, her Majesty entered her carriage amidst the loyal greetings of a large crowd which had collected in Piccadilly, and then drove rapidly to the Euston square terminus, where the troop of the 17th Lancers was drawn up in the court-yard, and saluted the Queen on her arrival. Her Majesty was received at the terminus by the Chairman of the Birmingham Railway Company, George Carr Glynn, Esq., and Mr. J. B. Boothby, Mr. Pascoe Grenfell, Mr. Thomas Young, Mr. J. Lewis Prevost, directors; Mr. R. Creed, the Secretary; and the Superintendent of the Company, H. P. Bruyères, Esq. These gentlemen had the honour of conducting their Sovereign to the elegant apartments which have been furnished, with such taste and profuse splendour, for the reception of her Majesty when she visits any portion of that large tract of her dominions which is traversed by the Birmingham Railway. Her Majesty declined to take any refreshment, and, as every preparation had been made, no further detention was necessary, and her Majesty was then conducted to the state-carriage, in which her Majesty was accompanied by Prince Albert alone, and, as on the occasion of the Royal visit to the Marquis of Exeter at Burghley, no members of the Royal suite travelled in this magnificent vehicle. Major-General Wemyss and Lieut.-Colonel Bouverie occupied a coupé immediately behind the state-carriage, and the Marchioness of Douro, the Hon. Miss Kerr, and the Earl of Jersey, rode in a carriage of very superior accommodation, which has been built by the company for the conveyance of passengers of high rank and distinction.

It is almost unnecessary to say that her Majesty and her illustrious consort were received all along the line of railway between London and Wolverton with those demonstrations of enthusiasm which have accompanied their progress on former occasions by the same route. At all the intermediate stations, and at many other points on the way, great numbers of persons were assembled, notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, who cheered the royal travellers warmly as they passed.

ARRIVAL AT THE WOLVERTON STATION.

At the Wolverton Station some preparation had been made for the reception of her Majesty and the Prince. They had on a former occasion stopped for refreshment at this station, but the accommodation provided for them was on the side of the "down" line. The road to Buckingham, however, commences on the other side of the railway, under which it passes at a short distance beyond the station. This rendered it necessary that preparation should be made on the side of the "up" line. For some time past Mr. Crace has been engaged in decorating two rooms in particular, one on the ground floor and one above, for the purpose, and they have been fitted up in a style of great elegance.

The apartment, on the first floor, provided for Her Majesty and the Prince, is shown in the annexed Engraving.

The special train arrived at Wolverton at ten minutes to two o'clock. As it slowly moved up to the station, her Majesty was received with loud cheers by the spectators. A company of the Buckinghamshire militia were drawn up on the platform on one side of the entrance to her Majesty's apartment, and on the other side two squadrons of the Bucks Yeomanry, dismounted, were posted.

Her Majesty, the Prince, and their suite having alighted, proceeded, attended by the Marquis of Chandos, and some of the officers of the railway, to the apartments prepared for their use. The rooms provided for her Majesty and the Prince were on the first floor, those for the suite were on the ground floor. In each refreshments were provided.

After the lapse of about twenty minutes, it was intimated that the Royal travellers were ready to proceed, and almost immediately after they entered the carriages, which had been drawn up at the back of the station. Here a body of the Bucks Yeomanry Cavalry, commanded by Major Lucas, was drawn up, being the first of the troops appointed to escort her Majesty to Stowe.

As the carriages, preceded by the outriders, and escorted by the Yeomanry, swept at a rapid pace along the road which skirts the railway for a short distance, and then passes under it towards Stratford, the cheers of the people, who had assembled in great numbers to welcome her Majesty, were most enthusiastic.

The distance from Wolverton to Stony Stratford is about three miles. At almost every point on the way people were collected, some on foot and many in vehicles of various kinds, who loudly cheered as the carriages passed. There were two triumphal arches between Wolverton and Stratford. There were in the town of Stony Stratford altogether five triumphal arches, some larger and handsomer than the others, but all proving the loyalty and liberality of those who had gone to the trouble and expense of erecting them. The first of them was nearly opposite the house and grounds of Mr. Harrison, at a short distance from the entrance of the town. The others were at different points in the town, and there was one at the extreme end, on the Buckingham side. The first arch in the town was inscribed, "Hail Victoria," and the third bore the inscription, "God bless the Queen." Besides these arches, many of the houses were decorated with evergreens, and hung with flags; and the houses, and also the footway on either side, were lined with people (among whom were the Friendly Societies, with their badges and flags), who cheered her Majesty very heartily as she passed. The long street which forms the town presented a most brilliant and animated appearance. At a distance of about a mile from the town the Royal carriages were stopped by some slight derangement of the traces of the Queen's carriage. It was immediately remedied, and after the lapse of a few moments the cortège passed on.

At Wicken, near Stony Stratford, a picturesque triple arch was erected: it was so placed as to command, through the centre arch, a view of the Cranley Oak, a tree well known in these parts for at least 300 years. Here was a tent, decorated with flags, and a band of music, and the village Club. This Association was named "The Victoria Club" in honour of Her Majesty; it was established some years since, with strict regard to the best interests of the agricultural labourer; and to its rules, the Queen, then Princess Victoria, allowed her name to be attached. The school children, many of whom are members of the Club, were placed on a raised platform; each bore a staff and a medal; on the latter is a profile of Her Majesty, and on the reverse,

> Father of Mercies,
> Hear a Nation's prayer;
> Protect our Queen,
> With thine Almighty care.

At Dunsanger there was a triumphal arch, and the villagers, who were assembled on the road side, cheered as the Royal cortège passed. There was here a rustic band, and the appearance of the green covered with people was very animated and picturesque.

Farther on, about four miles from Buckingham, opposite Colonel Pennant's seat, there was another arch, and here also many persons were assembled. Waggons inscribed "Albert and Alfred," and filled with people bearing flags, were by the way-side. There was also a band. At a part of the road called Leckhampstead-turn, a little further on, there was a very handsome arch, formed of evergreens and fir, inscribed "God save the Queen, Prince Albert, and the Royal Family." It is the boundary of the property of the Duke of Buckingham in this direction. It is almost unnecessary to say, therefore, that many persons, particularly equestrians, were collected here, many of them tenants of the Duke. They gave her Majesty a most hearty reception on her entrance within the district of which her noble host is the chief owner.

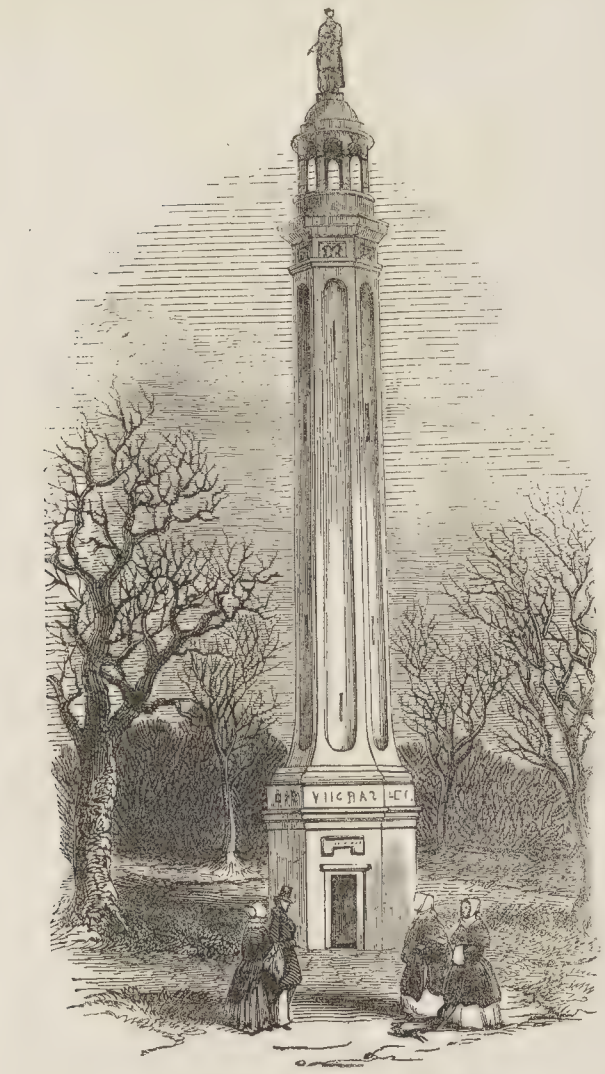
At Hyde-lane-farm, and at Maids' Morton, places of some local importance, there were also triumphal arches.

As the Royal cortège approached to within about half a mile of Buckingham the horses were changed, and at this point the Royal outriders were

From the hill, just beyond where the road winds round, the town of Buckingham looks pretty and almost picturesque. On the present occasion it presented a scene of great animation and gaiety. Men in white smock frocks stood by the road-side holding flags bearing inscriptions, and the members of the different Friendly Societies wearing badges, who bore flags, some of them very handsome, and bearing Royal inscriptions. The view presented by all these, with the masses of people, the cheering, and the music of the bands that were stationed on the road-side, was one of unusual life and animation. A little further on the first arch of the town of Buckingham was seen. The Royal party here proceeded at a slow pace, and were greeted with deafening cheers. The arch bore the inscription, "Hail beloved Queen!" (See the Engraving.)

Her Majesty passed under this arch at a quarter to three.

HER MAJESTY'S RECEPTION AT BUCKINGHAM.



Long before daybreak the church bells of this loyal and ancient town pealed forth their most joyous strains, as if to congratulate the inhabitants on the honour they were about to receive in the presence of her Majesty, and, as soon as day dawned, the shrill note of the bugle was heard summoning from their beds the gallant band of the Bucks Yeomanry, quartered in the town, and warning them to prepare for their appointed duties. At the same time the preparations (which, however, in many instances, the night had not interrupted) were generally resumed. The streets began to assume the most gay and festive appearance. The handsome castellated arch at the boundary of the town was surmounted by a large crown composed of flowers and evergreens, profusely decorated with flowers, flags, and streamers of various colours and devices, and bearing on its ample front the inscription, "Hail, beloved Queen!" the unanimous sentiment of the town's loyal inhabitants. The houses in the North end were one and all decorated with flowers, flags, and evergreens, and generally with lamps and devices prepared for the illumination in the evening. Even the town gaol, which here frowns upon the passenger, had relaxed something of its wonted severity of aspect, and exhibited flags and union jacks at each corner.

Near the gaol a handsome and commodious stand was erected for the accommodation of the charity children, of whom about 1800 were assembled to witness the arrival of her Majesty. This, likewise, was decorated with evergreens and flags, and bore on the front a handsome crown, formed of variegated lamps, with the device "V. A." beside it, and on one side the inscription, "Welcome Queen Victoria to the Town of Buckingham," and on the other, "God bless Queen Victoria."

In the Market-square was erected another triumphal arch, composed, like the others, of evergreens, and adorned with flowers, union jacks, and flags of various descriptions. In front there was also inscribed, "Britain's Pride," in bold characters. Here, also, the houses, which are generally of a superior description to the preceding ones, were decorated with proportional splendour.

The Rev. Mr. Long's house was profusely hung with variegated lamps, forming, among others, the inscription, "God save the Queen and hers." The doors and windows of this mansion were also elegantly decorated. Other houses near were hung with laurel and variegated lamps, with the device, "Victoria, honoured by all Nations."

The White Hart Inn, a little further up, exhibited flags on the roof and at all the windows, and variegated lamps, with the inscription, "May God preserve and bless our Gracious Queen and her Royal Consort."

LORD COBHAM'S PILLAR, AT STOWE.

At the Guildhall great preparations had been made to do honour to this great occasion. The Royal standard was hoisted on the roof, and floated majestically over the building. Flowers, too, and evergreens, were wreathed around the principal entrance and the windows, and in front of the building was hung in variegated lamps the words "God save the Queen and the Prince," with a splendid crown and stars, and "V. R." and "P.A." as devices At West-street was another beautiful arch, decorated in a similar manner to the preceding ones, and surmounted with a handsome crown of evergreens and flowers. This also bore the inscription "Long Live the Queen." In Hyde-lane, scaffolding was erected, and beautifully decorated, which was occupied by spectators, who consisted chiefly of the élite of the town and its vicinity. At New Inn there was also another triumphal arch, bearing the family banners, after which the visitor came to the beautiful Corinthian arch, on which was hoisted a handsome flag bearing the Buckingham arms. and might see before him the garden front of the magnificent mansion.

But the spectacle at Buckingham was not confined to triumphal arches and decorated mansions; its streets, at an early hour, were filled with persons hurrying to and fro in the work of preparation. Bands of rustics in their holiday attire came flocking in, and began to amuse themselves by gazing wonderingly around them. The fine and manly fellows who compose the Bucks Yeomanry began to appear in the picturesque and handsome costume of their regiment. Bands of music stationed here and there ever and anon struck up their liveliest strains. Special constables, with their formidable staves, and cards in their hats, assembled at the gaol, each looking as if upon his single exertions depended, for that day at least, the peace of our Sovereign Lady; and here, also, were crowds of little boys, who gave open testimony that they were resolved to break it, at least as far as it could be done by the discordant notes of their most loyal voices.

About noon, the Mayor, Henry Smith, Esq., with the Aldermen, Common Council, and gentry of the town, assembled at the Guildhall, and also a great number of the principal inhabitants. At noon, also, all shops and offices were closed, and business of every kind was suspended. At the same time all the streets and other thoroughfares communicating with the line of procession were closed, and no vehicles or horsemen allowed to remain in them. About three o'clock the public procession intended to escort her Majesty through the town was formed, and proceeded to the triumphal arch at the boundary of the town to meet her Majesty. The Mayor and Corporation were attired in their official robes, and were attended by their officers, bearing the mace, sword, and other official insignia. The clergy also wore their robes, and each gentleman in the procession wore a scarlet rosette. The members of the various benevolent and other societies also wore their respective decorations.

In the market-place the ceremony of delivering up the corporate insignia of the town was performed. The Mayor, Mr. Henry Smith, advanced to the carriage in which her Majesty and the Prince were, and tendered to the Queen the mace on a cushion.

ARCH AT THE ENTRANCE INTO BUCKINGHAM.

The Mayor said—"May it please your Majesty to accept this mace, which I, as Mayor of this ancient and loyal borough, humbly present in dutiful submission to your Majesty's Royal prerogative and authority."

To this the Queen replied, returning the mace, "Mr. Mayor, I beg you will keep it. I am much gratified with my reception in this borough."

The cheers of the people, who filled the market-place in masses, were deafening.

The ceremony over, the Royal party passed at a slow pace round by the Town-hall—an interesting old pile of building—which was elaborately decorated with flags and evergreens, and prepared for illumination at night with inscriptions—"God save the Queen and Prince Albert;" V.A.; P. A.; also two large stars and two devices in the shape of festoons, which were also to be illuminated. The front of the Town-hall, with a flag waving from the roof and many others from the windows, presented a very animated appearance.

Passing the market-place, the main street of Buckingham, with a slight ascent, turns to the right. At the corner of this turn was another triumphal arch, and beyond that on the right hand side, the "Cobham Arms" Hotel, the head-quarters of the Yeomanry, was profusely decorated and prepared for illumination at night. On either side of the way the houses were adorned with devices, flags, evergreens, &c. Among these were two large houses, one on the right, known as the house where Charles II. slept when he visited Stowe, and one on the left, where Oliver Cromwell also slept when he made a visitation in these parts. At a few yards further on there was another arch and three platforms, tastefully ornamented, filled with spectators of both sexes, who cheered her Majesty most enthusiastically as she passed.

The Royal cortège went through the town at a foot pace, headed by the procession formed to receive her Majesty, in the following order:—

Detachment of Yeomanry.
Superintendent of Borough Police.
Six Special Constables. Six Special Constables.
The Band.
The Gentry and Clergy of the County (two and two).
The Inhabitants of Buckingham (two and two).
Officers of the Corporation.
Sir Thomas Fremantle and Sir John Chetwode, Members for the Borough.
Mr. Caledon G. Dupre, M.P. for the County, and Sir Harry Varney.
The Town Council (two and two).
The Aldermen (two and two).
The Borough Magistrates. Clerk of the Peace.
Policeman. Cushion Bearer. Policeman.
Policeman. Mace Bearer. Policeman.
Town Clerk. The Mayor. Chaplain.
Her Majesty's Carriage, succeeded by another Royal Carriage containing the Members of the Suite,
The Procession being closed by the Lodges of various Local Societies.

It is scarcely necessary to add that her Majesty's reception as she passed through the town was most enthusiastic. The loyalty of the people was exhibited in every possible manner, and both her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert acknowledged the same most condescendingly.

THE ARRIVAL AT STOWE.

On entering his grace's domain, her Majesty was greeted by a Royal salute fired by the party of Bucks Artillery Yeomanry there stationed. Near the mansion the road was lined by between 400 and 500 of his grace's tenantry on horseback, all of whom wore scarlet rosettes, and received her Majesty with the most enthusiastic cheers. Before the garden front of the mansion were assembled about 500 labourers employed in the several parishes belonging to the Duke of Buckingham, all of whom wore their best smock-frocks, and had in their hats green ribands, inscribed "God save the Queen." These were all arranged in the simicircle formed by the pavilion in this front of the mansion. The centre was occupied by the 4th troop of the Bucks Hussar Yeomanry Cavalry, under the command of Captain Robarts, who will constitute her Majesty's guard of honour during her visit. The Royal salute which announced her Majesty's arrival on the domain being heard at Stowe, the Royal standard was immediately hoisted on the mansion. At length the Royal cortège arrived, and the Bucks Yeomanry, which preceded it, having instantly joined, Captain Robarts' troop fell in with them in the most efficient and soldierlike manner, and presented arms. At the same time the Bucks Yeomanry band, stationed in front of the house, struck up "God save the Queen," and a tremendous shout of welcome was given by the assembled tenantry and labourers.

On alighting, her Majesty and her Royal Consort were received at the steps leading to the house by the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham, the Lady Anna Grenville, and other members of his grace's family. Her Majesty and the Prince shook hands cordially with their noble hosts, who immediately ushered them into the marble saloon, where her Majesty received and shook hands with the rest of his grace's family and several of his distinguished visitors. Her Majesty looked remarkably well, and in the best spirits. Her Majesty wore a black velvet dress and tunic, and a white silk bonnet with lilac flowers. Prince Albert was dressed in plain black clothes. Before proceeding to her private apartments her Majesty expressed to his grace a desire to witness the interesting spectacle afforded by the presence and arrangement of the yeomanry and labourers in front of the mansion, and was accordingly attended by the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham to the corridor of the pavilion for that purpose; and truly her Majesty could scarcely have witnessed a more interesting spectacle, or had met with a reception more grateful to her feelings than when these fine fellows (as if their voices were re-invigorated by the Royal presence) again commenced shouting and waving their hats enthusiastically, to demonstrate their unswerving attachment to their Sovereign. Her Majesty and Prince Albert acknowledged their loyalty in the most condescending manner, and then returned to the house and retired to their apartments. Immediately afterwards his grace's tenantry returned to Buckingham, where a handsome dinner was provided for them at the duke's expense, under the superintendence of Mr. Beard, his grace's land steward. The labourers afterwards dispersed, and proceeded to their respective parishes, in each of which a substantial repast was likewise provided for them by his grace's liberality. In addition to this, each man received a crown from his grace, which thereby enabled them to enjoy the presence of their Sovereign without suffering any loss from the consequent cessation of their daily labour.

The dinner-party consisted, besides her Majesty and the Prince, of the Duchess of Buckingham, the Duke of Buckingham, Lord and Lady Delawarr, Lord and Lady Jersey, the Marchioness of Douro, Lord Nugent, Lord and Lady Orkney, Lady Peel, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Aberdeen, Miss Kerr, Lady Mary West, Lady Clementina Villiers, Lady Anna Grenville, the Marquis of Chandos, the Marquis of Breadalbane, General Wemyss, Colonel Bouverie, Sir James Graham, Dr. Buckland, Captain Carrington, the Rev. Mr. Andrews, Mr. Smith (the Duke's librarian), Lord and Lady Southampton, Sir Thomas Aubrey, and Mr. and Mrs. Robarts.

A public dinner took place in the evening at the Cobham Arms Hotel, to celebrate the Royal visit of her Majesty, and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, to the town of Buckingham. Mr. Henry Smith, Mayor of the borough, occupied the chair, and was supported by Sir Thomas Fremantle, and Sir John Chetwode, the Borough Members; Mr. Caledon G. Dupré, one of the County Members; Sir Harry Verney, Captain Fremantle, the borough Aldermen, and all the principal residents in the town.

The health of her Majesty and the other members of the Royal family was drank with the greatest enthusiasm, the same compliment being paid to the various members of the house of Grenville.

There were brilliant illuminations on Wednesday evening at Stowe House, and in the town.

THE MANSION OF STOWE.

Upon the present occasion a description of the noble and splendid residence of the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham will, no doubt, be acceptable to our readers. The mansion of Stowe is of vast dimensions and noble construction. The principal rooms form one long suite, opening into each other, and crowded with the most gorgeous fittings, and articles of taste, richness and luxury. The suite of apartments especially dedicated for the service of her Majesty are on the eastern side of the mansion. They consist chiefly of the rooms called the Rembrandt-room, the breakfast and small dining parlour, the ante-library, the library, the music-room, the state drawing-room, the state dining-room, the state dressing room, the state bed-chamber and the state closet. The room appropriated for the Royal bed-room is the Rembrandt-room, so called from its celebrated collection of the works of that great master. Besides these, and among the many other things equally worthy of notice, are the curtains and covers of the chairs and sofas of China silk, worked in silver on a yellow ground. In the centre of the ceiling is a painting by Valdre, of Venus at her toilet. The furniture of this room is principally of marqueterie. Two very magnificent cabinets, with drawers and secret springs, are elaborately inlaid with ivory, mother-o'-pearl, and coloured woods, representing landscapes, figures, birds, &c.; they are mounted in ormolu, and in the centre of one of them is a beautiful chasing in silver gilt, of a bacchanalian subject.

There are two other cabinets of marqueterie, and a clock of the same, with ornaments in ormolu; it stands about 10 feet high, and was formerly in the Palace at Versailles.

On the sofa-table, which is also of marqueterie, are candelabra in ormolu, and an inkstand with miniature mosaics.

One of the carved and gilt tables has a beautiful slab of malachite, and on others are dejeunés of old Dresden china; the chimney piece is of Italian white and variegated marble, and on it, and in other parts of the room, are some specimens of elaborately painted vases, &c., in Worcester porcelain.

The magnificent carved and gilt frame which encloses the glass between the windows came from the Doge's Palace at Venice.

In the angles of the room are carved and gilt tripods for lights, &c.

The state bedroom, where the royal visitors will repose, is a noble room, of great height, and solemn yet not sombre hue. The state bed is, we believe, the same as was constructed in 1737 for Frederick, Prince of Wales, and was occupied in 1805 by his Majesty George the Fourth. The pillars at each corner of this unique and gorgeous bed are fluted and richly gilt, and support a crimson canopy elaborately carved and burnished with gold, and bearing a splendid gilded pine upon its apex. The hangings at the head are of crimson, and those around it of yellow silk damask. The counterpane is of satin, and bears, upon a ground chiefly of a maroon colour, embroidered flowers of exquisite device and workmanship. This room, with all the Royal apartments, is also further adorned with the richest and most magnificent carpets. In the state drawing-room the walls are yellow, the ceiling richly gilt, and from it hangs a large crystal chandelier, corresponding with girandoles of the same, placed in different parts of the room. In the centre of the chimney piece, which is of Italian white marble, is an antique tablet, in bas relief, of oriental alabaster, representing the emblems of a sacrifice to Bacchus; in the frieze are oval compartments, with fauns gazing in a fountain. The pilasters, and part of the entablature, are of porphyry. On the chimney-piece stands a clock, supported by figures, in biscuit porcelain, on a base of white statuary marble, and ormolu ornaments, made by Vulliamy.

The furniture of this room consists of very elaborately carved and gilt chairs and sofa, covered with crimson velvet, which were formerly in the Doge's Palace at Venice; from whence were also brought the magnificent frame which incloses the picture of the Sybil, by Domenichino, and the elegant pier tables which stand on each side of the fireplace, being slabs of green marble, supported by boys and dolphins, in a very bold style of carving, and richly gilt.

Opposite the sofa is a small table, supporting part of the very beautiful inlaid marble pavement, from the baths of Titus, at Rome; brought from thence by the Marquis of Chandos.

Her Majesty's dressing-room, generally called the green drawing-room, is a gorgeous apartment, the prevailing colour of its adornments being white and gold. The walls are studded with pictures of the Dutch and Flemish schools. There are precious gems by Teniers, Ostade, Cuyp, Wouvermans, &c. Then come, all opening into each other, the small library, intended for her Majesty's private drawing-room; the great library, rich with gilded volumes; and the banqueting-room. The prevailing colours of these rooms are white and gold. Nothing can be imagined more gorgeous than the general effect; the blaze of gilding is dazzling, and the profusion of articles of furniture and luxury, apparently all satin and gold, the lavish display of every species of artistic curiosity, carved in fair marble, traced on paper or canvass, or moulded in the precious metals, absolutely wearies and perplexes the senses.

Upon the walls you gaze upon pictures of world-wide renown. There is the beaming tenderness of Carlo Dolci—the faultless outlines and transparent colouring of Corregio—Raphael's divine grace and Poussin's learned combinations—the riotous flush of the somewhat earthly fancy of Rubens—the glorious portraits of Vandyke, instinct with almost breathing life—the sunny skies of Claude, with the templed shores of his loved Mediterranean—Cuyp, with his glowing sunsets—the drinking boors of Teniers—and the gloomy caverns and dreary thickets of Salvator Rosa. Again, we have the tapestry of old: full of quaint pageantry—nymphs, and fauns, and monsters, and the gods of the old divinity of Greece—all mingled together in those strange phantasmagoric groupings and assemblages which flowed so readily from the fancies of old tapestry workers. And the arts and luxury of all nations and ages have been laid under contribution to furnish forth the fittings of these splendid apartments. There are carpets glowing from the looms of Persia; hangings which once adorned the marble palaces of Venetian statesmen; porcelain and quaint rich gildings and carvings, which might have graced the salles of Louis Quatorze; vases in marble and in bronze; relics from classic Italy, recovered from ancient sepulchres and ruins; rich stuffs, spangled and glittering, the spoils of Tippoo Saib, and other fallen Eastern warriors; and near them, and not contrasting unfavourably with their richness, specimens of the industry and skill in ornamental weaving of Holland and the Low Countries. All this—the mingled contents of a picture gallery and a museum—is so skilfully blended with articles of ordinary use, formed so as to be in strict keeping with the more purely artistic decorations of the apartments, make up a glorious coup d'œil, as rich as it is varied. The dssplay of plate in the banqueting hall is also very magnificent. Enormous gold and silver vases, candelabra, wine coolers, cups, salvers, epergnes, &c. Among these a really magnificent piece of plate, allegorical of the cause of agriculture, with delicately modelled figures, representing various rural objects, persons, and amusements. This, which stood in the middle of the table, was presented by the county of Buckingham to the Duke, as a testimonial of confidence and respect.

The Duchess's drawing-room, as it is called, with its boudoirs, and the apartments near it, are fitted up in a darker and graver style, but with the same profusion of luxury and richness.

The rooms specially allotted to Prince Albert are also extremely rich, and full of articles of artistic curiosity and value.

THURSDAY EVENING.

Her Majesty retired to rest last night about eleven o'clock, and rose at eight this morning. Her Majesty and Prince Albert breakfasted together in their private apartments, and at nine o'clock attended prayers in the family chapel. The Rev. Mr. Andrews, one of his grace's chaplains, officiated. After divine service, her Majesty and Prince Albert walked for a short time in the grounds, but, the weather not being very favourable, soon returned to the mansion. About eleven o'clock, his Royal Highness Prince Albert proceeded to shoot in the preserves, called Guernsey Hill and Paper Mill Spinney.

The shooting party consisted of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Buckingham, Sir R. Peel, Earl of Jersey, Marquis of Chandos, Earl Delawarr, Sir J. Graham, Mr. G. Anson, and Colonel Bouverie. Prince Albert, the Duke of Buckingham, and Sir R. Peel proceeded to the preserves in an open carriage; the rest of the distinguished party walked. The sport was of the best description. The produce in two hours only, during which it lasted, was upwards of 200 hares and 100 pheasants. Of these, it was stated, his Royal Highness Prince Albert shot 114 hares, 29 pheasants, and also 1 snipe. The party returned to the mansion at half-past one o'clock. His grace has ordered the game to be liberally distributed.

Towards noon, the day, which had been gloomy in the morning, became much finer, and soon afterwards the sun shone forth cheerfully. Her Majesty accordingly availed herself, after lunch, of the opportunity thus afforded of visiting the gardens near the mansion, and the various grottoes and temples which are contained in them. Among these may be mentioned the celebrated Temple of British Worthies, described by Kent, and containing in niches: busts, on the one side, of Pope, Sir Thomas Gresham, Ignatius Jones, Milton, Shakspeare, Locke, Newton, and Bacon; and on the other King Alfred, the Black Prince, Queen Elizabeth, King William the Third, Sir W. Raleigh, Sir F. Drake, Hampden, and Sir J. Barnard. Besides this temple there is the temple of Ancient Virtue, containing full-length statues of Lycurgus, Socrates, Homer, and Epaminondas. In another part of the grounds is the Queen's Building, originally designed by Kent, and dedicated by George Marquis of Buckingham to her late Majesty Queen Charlotte. Another temple is called the Gothic Temple, which is a large building in the style of the Moorish-Gothic, and adorned inside by a collection of old painted glass, and a great variety of armorial bearings, which are very finely executed. The tower affords a very extensive view around the country. There is also a temple sacred to Friendship, a handsome structure of the Tuscan order, containing busts in white marble of Richard Viscount Cobham, and the political party of which he was a member—viz., Frederick Prince of Wales, the Earls of Chesterfield, Westmoreland, and Marchmont; the Lords Cobham, Gower, and Bathurst; Richard Grenville, afterwards Earl Temple; William Pitt, afterwards Earl of Chatham; and George, afterwards Lord Lyttelton. Her Majesty proceeded through the grounds on foot, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham, and a party of nearly twenty of their graces' distinguished visitors.

Immediately before dinner appropriate addresses were presented to her Majesty and Prince Albert by the High Sheriff of the county.

During and after dinner the band of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards performed in an adjoining chamber.

The town of Buckingham still continues to display every token of festivity. Wherever the Royal party are seen, they are enthusiastically cheered by the people.

FRIDAY EVENING.

This morning her Majesty rose at seven o'clock, and soon afterwards breakfasted with her Royal Consort in their private apartments. Her Majesty remained in her own room, and during the rest of the morning amused herself by examining the library and the state apartments.

At ten o'clock his Royal Highness Prince Albert proceeded to shoot at Stratford-hill Wood, one of the Duke of Buckingham's preserves, about two miles distant from Stowe on the road to Banbury. The shooting party consisted of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Buckingham, Marquis of Chandos, Earl Delawarr, Earl of Jersey, Col. Bouverie, Mr. G. Anson, Captain Carrington, and Captain Roberts. The slaughter of game was much more considerable than on the previous day. Prince Albert shot no less than 80 pheasants, 66 hares, and 2 rabbits. The party returned to Stowe at one o'clock.

On the return of the shooting party and soon after luncheon, her Majesty and Prince Albert proceeded to the "Temple of Concord," on the north-west side of the mansion, to plant some trees in commemoration of their visit to Stowe. Her Majesty walked to the spot leaning on the arm of the Duke of Buckingham, and they were immediately followed by Prince Albert and the Duchess, Sir R. Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, and the whole of his grace's visitors. The trees selected were oaks and cedars, and one of each was planted by her Majesty and Prince Albert on each side of the temple. The spades provided were manufactured expressly for the occasion, and were of silver, the handles being covered with crimson velvet. Her Majesty, after throwing a few spadefulls of earth against the trees delivered the spade to the Duke of Buckingham, but continued holding them while his grace completed the ceremony. Immediately his Royal Highness Prince Albert had planted the last tree, the Duke of Buckingham, waving his hat, cried aloud "God bless her Majesty the Queen," and immediately the "welkin rung" with the shouts of the spectators. The Royal party then returned to the mansion.

We are, this week, compelled, by want of space, to confine our illustration to the exterior of the princely palace of Stowe. The first engraving, at page 41, shows—

The Corinthian Arch, or Gateway, to the Gardens and Park.

This magnificent structure is 60 feet high, and 60 feet wide. From thence appears the Garden Front of the mansion. The ornamented buildings in the grounds display great taste. One of the most prominent of these tributes is a Rostral Column, erected by Lord Cobham, in honour of his nephew (Captain Thomas Grenville), who was mortally wounded in an engagement between the French and the fleet of Admiral Anson. The column is surmounted by a figure of Heroic Poetry, who holds in her hand a scroll bearing—

"Non nisi grandia canto."
"Heroic deeds alone my theme."

Upon the plinth, and on the pedestal, too, are inscriptions.

Next week, we shall present to our readers several very interesting interior views of Stowe House; but we avail ourselves of the present opportunity of returning our grateful acknowledgments to his Grace the Duke of Buckingham, for his kind permission to our artist, Mr. Landells, to make the requisite drawings.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO STOWE.—COUNTY MEETING AT AYLESBURY.

In anticipation of this auspicious event, a county meeting was held on Saturday last, at the County-hall, Aylesbury, pursuant to a notice issued by the High Sheriff of the county of Bucks; Mr. John Barnes, in conformity with a requisition signed by several noblemen and gentlemen of the county, for the purpose of presenting an address to her Majesty on her visit to the county. There were present on the occasion—Lord Carrington (the Lord-Lieutenant), the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos, the High Sheriff, the Marquis of Chandos, Lord Nugent, Sir T. D. Aubrey, Sir T. Fremantle, Mr. G. C. Du Pre, M.P., the Hon. C. C. Cavendish, Mr. J. P. Deering, the Rev. John Harrison, and many other influential gentlemen.

The High Sheriff took the Chair, and the business of the meeting was opened by the Under Sheriff reading the requisition.

Lord Carrington (the Lord-Lieutenant) then rose, and in a loyal speech proposed the Address, which, being read, was seconded by Mr. Du Pre, M.P. for the county.

Sir T. D. Aubrey moved, and the Hon. C. C. Cavendish seconded, that the High Sheriff should sign the address on behalf of the county, and present it to her Majesty.

His Grace the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos proposed a vote of thanks to the High Sheriff, which was seconded by Sir T. F. Fremantle; and the meeting broke up.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1845.

A REVOLUTION in the States of South America is so common an occurrence that it scarcely excites attention, in some of them one a month is about the average; the intelligence of a revolution in Mexico, therefore, brought this week, by the Acadia, is not surprising. It derives, however, a certain kind of interest from the present position of affairs between Mexico and Texas, and Texas and the United States. The movement has thrown Santa Anna from his post of Dictator, by a series of pronounciamentos, something in the style of those which drove Espartero from Spain. Santa Anna commanded the Mexican Forces in the war with Texas, and from his position as the General in Chief, appears to have arisen his present difficulty. One of the articles of the Mexican Constitution provides that the President cannot, in person, command the armed force, either by land or sea, without the permission of the Congress. This permission Santa Anna neither sought nor obtained, but took it as a matter of course, thus violating the Constitution and offending the party that supports it. For some time all was doubt and uncertainty, for, had the army declared unanimously in his favour, he would have been strong enough to have crushed the constitutional party, and to have made himself master of the country. But the army failed him; a part of it only gave him an unconditional support; he may recover himself by some unforseen chance, but the accounts state that this is unlikely, as public opinion, which counts for something even in Mexico, is against him. The journals forebode that he will have to yield to the storm, and if he escapes with his life, it must be by a quick flight to the United States, by way of Tampico, or to the provinces South of Mexico, by way of the Pacific. In the meantime the fate of all fallen ministers has overtaken him; his name is insulted in the very places and by the very men who, when he was supreme, the most servilely obeyed him. His statue, that was placed in the theatre, has been broken to pieces, and another of bronze, that stood in the market-place, had to be privately removed; sic transit!—one more to the many thousand instances the world has seen of the same ambition and a similar end to it. It is satisfactory to learn that the revolution has been a bloodless one; perhaps the word revolution is scarcely the right one to apply to such an occurrence in that part of the world. In the European sense it is a national revolt, the rising of a whole people, who change a dynasty of rulers or altogether expel it. In the Mexican and other states of South America it means little more than a change of parties, and in that sense we might as well call a majority gained by the Opposition here over the Ministry, a revolution also.

While these scenes are being acted in Mexico, Texas, released from the yoke of military dictators, which is all the government she would ever have got from Mexico, is "progressing," and that favourably. The annual message of President Houston was sent in to the Texan Congress on the 5th of December. He states that the connections of the republic with the states of Europe have increased during the past year, particularly by treaties of "amity, navigation, and commerce with some of the German States." In speaking of her relations with France and America, he hints at the subject now of so much interest—her independent existence; the President has the fullest confidence in both France and England, allowing the Republic to—do just as it pleases; he says—

> The Governments of Great Britain and France still maintain towards us those sentiments of friendship and good feeling which have ever marked their intercourse with us, and which it should continue to be our studious care, by every proper manifestation on our part, to strengthen and reciprocate. There is no ground to suspect that the late agitation of international questions between this Republic and that of the United States has, in any degree, abated their desire for our continued prosperity and independence, or caused them to relax their good offices to bring about the speedy and honourable adjustment of our difficulties with Mexico. That they should evince anxiety for our separate existence, and permanent independence as a nation, is not only natural, but entirely commendable. They will never require of us, I am fully assured, any sacrifice of honour or interest; and if they did, we should be quite free, as I am certain we should be ready, to refuse it.

The financial and trading affairs of Texas seem prosperous enough, the revenue equalling the expenditure; the greatest subject of complaint seems to be the defalcations of various collectors, amounting to a serious sum. It is evident that some "smart men" have been put into the office, from whose want of honesty the Government is suffering. It will be thought singular that the Message does not allude more directly and distinctly to the topic of "annexation," which just now is the question in the United States. There the President, Mr. Tyler, has sent in to the Senate copies of the instructions to Mr. King, the American Minister to France, on the subject of Texas and slavery. But what was unintelligible and obscure before, is by no means rendered lucid by these documents; the whole subject will soon be considered by Congress, where "one class of politicians seeks to bring Texas into the Union under the terms of a rejected treaty; another by rejecting a treaty that has been ratified; a third, without any terms at all; and one only by a due settlement of questions of boundary," and other matters. Thus, with the States warm in favour of the junction, and Texas saying nothing against it, though perfectly aware of the agitation, it will require more power than, we fear, the Senate possesses, to prevent the union. It is said that the planters and slave holders of the South look on the territory of Texas with a coveting eye; we have seen it alleged that the soil of the old slave states is beginning to be exhausted, and also that a slave population in contact with, or at least in reach of, the Abolitionists of the Free States, causes many apprehensions of an outbreak that could end in nothing but a servile war. For both these reasons, therefore, a territory that would enable the Slaveholders to extend their labours southward, and to place a greater distance between themselves and their northern Abolitionist neighbours, would be most acceptable to them. The notion may be more speculative than sound, rather fanciful than correct; but improbable as it appears, it has been stated as being at the bottom of the desire of America to possess itself of the new republic. It is certain the Slaveholding interest would be strengthened by it, and so far the statement has some colouring of probability. Another report may be worth noticing at the present juncture; it is, that Santa Anna has been secretly carrying on a negotiation with the United States for the annexation of Texas, on condition of his receiving a large sum of money; if this be correct, his overthrow will alter the aspect of the question considerably.

THE subscription raised as a testimony of the sense entertained by the nation of the value of the reform introduced into the Post-office by Mr. Rowland Hill, is drawing to a close. We sincerely hope its amount will bear some reasonable proportion to the benefit he has been the means of conferring on the community. It is well known that the whole of his plan has never been tried; a part of it only has been fully carried out, and that part has been wholly successful. Every Revenue return has shown a steady and gradual increase in the receipts of the Post-office. This result has been produced in the face of many predictions of failure from what are called "practical men,"—that is to say, from those who hate to be impelled one step beyond the jog-trot of routine. Having such instruments to work by and through (and in Government establishments instruments are often powers also), it is a wonder that the proposer of such an extensive change has been able to effect so much. Nor should it be forgotten that he has been prevented from superintending or conducting his own plan. He was discharged from his duties at the Post-office, though his plan must be approved by the Premier, since he himself gave a donation of £10 towards the fund we are now alluding to. We hope the whole amount of it will form a gift worthy of a great nation to a great benefactor.

REPORTED DEATH OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

The Foreign intelligence of the week has presented one startling item; the death of the Emperor of Russia was reported, but in so vague and unsatisfactory a manner that it was at once discredited. The news came exclusively from the Brussels papers, by way of Amsterdam, though the more direct and probable route of so important a piece of intelligence would have been by the way of Berlin to Paris. In addition to this, no notice of the event had been received at the Russian Embassies of London or Paris, which had information almost as late as the Brussels papers, leaving the Emperor in good health. Nor was any day, date, or particular of the Royal demise stated. Altogether, it had the appearance of what it was believed to be—a mere stock-jobbing rumour. The news was first published by the Eclair, a Brussels paper, of Tuesday, which gave the announcement in very positive terms. It was repeated by several Brussels papers, and received some confirmation from the Handelsblad, a Dutch paper published at Amsterdam. Although the Handelsblad has some official reputation, we are not disposed to place any reliance upon the truth of the report, which seems to have been circulated for some stock-jobbing purpose and this object ha been partially effected, for a considerable amount of Russian stock had been sold at Amsterdam, which occasioned an unfavourable reaction in other securities. It is known that the Emperor Nicholas has for some time been indisposed, and this circumstance probably emboldened the speculators to circulate the rumour, the latest accounts from Berlin having given some foundation to the supposition that the malady would terminate fatally.

Upon these grounds we disbelieve the rumour entirely, and think it will turn out that it had its origin in the motive to which we have alluded.

The intelligenec certainly created a great sensation in the metropolis on Thursday, and received a certain degree of credence from those who had not the means of tracing the probabilities of its truth; and as such a rumour naturally has directed the public attention to the Emperor's successor, we have had an accurate portrait of him engraved, which will be found in page 48.

It is just possible that the news may be true, but the circumstances we have stated will enable our readers to form their own judgment upon the subject.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last the unfavourable state of the weather prevented her Majesty and the Royal Family from taking their accustomed walking and equestrian exercise in the grounds adjacent to the Castle. His Royal Highness Prince Albert from the same cause was prevented from enjoying the sport of shooting in the Royal preserves.

WINDSOR, SUNDAY.—This morning the Queen and Prince Albert walked for some time on the terrace and in the Home-park. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice were taken walking exercise in the forenoon. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the whole of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took an early walk this morning. In the afternoon the Queen held a Privy Council at the Castle. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Lord Wharncliffe, Lord President; the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Privy Seal; the Duke of Wellington, Commander in Chief; Sir Robert Peel, First Lord of the Treasury; Sir James Graham, Secretary of State for the Home Department; Lord Stanley, Secretary of State for the Colonies; Lord Granville Somerset, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; and the Earl of Jersey, Master of the Horse. Some reports relative to Guernsey, &c., were submitted to her Majesty in Council, and were received.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert promenaded this afternoon in the pleasure grounds for some time. The Marchioness of Douro relieved the Countess of Charlemont in the duties of the Lady in Waiting on the Queen. The Viscount Sydney succeeded the Earl of Warwick as the Lord in Waiting on her Majesty, and Captain the Hon. Nelson Hood succeeded Captain the Hon. Arthur Duncombe as the Groom in Waiting on her Majesty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty and Prince Albert in the afternoon.

THURSDAY EVENING.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal and the Princess Alice were taken for an airing this morning in the Home Park; the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal taking equestrian exercise upon their Shetland ponies. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the infant Royal Family at the Castle this afternoon. Viscount Sydney and Captain the Hon. Nelson Hood will remain at the Castle during the absence of the Court. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert will return to Windsor from Stowe on Saturday next; on which evening there will be a dinner party at the Castle. The Court will leave Windsor for Strathfieldsaye, to honour his Grace the Duke of Wellington with a visit on Monday next, proceeding, according to present arrangements, through Bracknell and Oakingham, and thus avoiding the town of Reading.

ACCOUCHEMENT OF THE GRAND DUCHESS OF MECKLENBURGH STRELITZ.—The Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz (the Princess Augusta of Cambridge) gave birth to a Prince on Monday, which unhappily immediately expired. The event was thus officially announced:—

"Cambridge House, Jan. 13, 1845, half-past eight, A. M.

"Her Royal Highness the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz was safely delivered at half-past six o'clock this morning of a Prince, which survived its birth only a few minutes."

We are happy to state that the Grand Duchess is improving as rapidly as could be desired. The answer to inquires at Cambridge House yesterday (Friday,) morning was that the Hereditary Grand Duchess was going on most favourably. It is not expected that any further bulletin will be issued. The inquiries of the nobility and gentry have been very numerous during the week.

The Duke of Wellington left Apsley House on Monday, after attending the Privy Council at Windsor Castle, for Strathfieldsaye, where his Grace is expected to remain until the meeting of Parliament.

The Lord President of the Council, Lord Wharncliffe, has issued cards for a dinner to the Ministers on Wednesday next, the 22nd inst., when the ceremony of "pricking" for the Sheriffs is to take place.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held on Tuesday afternoon, at the Foreign-office.

IMPOVEMENTS IN THE TOWER.—On the site of the grand storehouse, or small armoury of the Tower, destroyed by the late fire, spacious barracks are to be erected. The ground has already been excavated, and the foundation commenced; the works will, therefore, be proceeded with without delay. It has been decided that the architecture shall be in strict keeping with that of the White Tower, surrounded with turrets and battlements of the same order. The length of the building will be upwards of 300 feet, and it will be capable of accommodating 800 troops. The moat is to be converted into gardens and promenades, and will be set apart for the troops. One of the most important improvements to be effected will be the formation of a new parade. Perhaps not the least advantage connected with them is, that in future the most interesting portions of the Tower, which have hitherto been closed, will be thrown open to public inspection. Amongst these, the first that demands attention is "the Bell Tower," situate immediately behind the Lieutenant's house. It was formerly a prison, and derives some celebrity from having been the place of confinement of Fisher, Bishop of Rochester (as appears from Fuller's "Church History"). It is also said to have been the place in which the Princess, afterwards Queen, Elizabeth was lodged when imprisoned in the Tower by Queen Mary. The next place to which the public will be admitted, proceeding northward from the Bell Tower, is the Beauchamp, or Cobham Tower, and it will be approached by a battlement. The present mess-room, a spacious apartment on the first floor, was formerly a prison. Engraved on the walls are the names of the famous Marmaduke Neville, the Peverills, Tyrells, Philip, Earl of Arundel, Dudley, Earl of Warwick, and others. Immediately above is another prisou, in which Anne Boleyn and others were confined. These, and a vast many other places, including the White Tower, will all be thrown open gratuitously to the public. During the last few days several coins in the reigns of Elizabeth, Edward VI., and Charles I. have been found by the excavators.

NEW LODGES IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.—The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have caused the erection of a new lodge at the gate in St. James's park, facing the Horse Guards, which is intended as a model, it being in contemplation to build lodges of a similar style at the several entrances to the park. As some incorrect statements have lately appeared, purporting to be a description of the lodge, the following particulars may not be uninteresting. The main building is about 13 feet 6 inches square, and the roof, which is composed of lead, projects five feet; the top is surmounted by a gilded ball, which gives the whole a very pleasing effect. The projected part is decorated by lapped ornamental work, and is most highly and appropriately finished Much attention has been paid to the external portion, which is composed of corrigated iron, and which will be painted in varied colours. There will be a gravel walk around, from the main body to the extremity of the roof, thus combining ornament to the park and convenience to the keepers, and also affording shelter to those who may be near when rough weather prevails. The sides are ornamented with wooden posts. The interior will comprise a sitting-room, with lobby; but there will be no sleeping-rooms as reported. The design is that of Mr. Decimus Burton; Mr. Cubitt, of the Gray's Inn-road being the builder. It may be anticipated that the old lodges, which certainly are devoid of convenience and beauty, will be immediately replaced by erections after the same model.

JEWS' LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.—An Institution called Sussex Hall, situated in Leadenhall-street, is to be opened on Monday evening, to be devoted to literary and scientific purposes. The leading gentlemen connected with it are of the Jewish persuasion, but it is not exclusively confined to them.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—From the report for the week ending January 11th, it appears that the total number of deaths was 1109; that 1093 of these occurred without violence; that those from diseases of the respiratory organs amounted to 406, and those from small-pox to 50. It is not unworthy of observation that the number of births in the metropolis during the same period exceeded the deaths by 202.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Evening.

RETURN OF HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT FROM STOWE.

Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Royal suite left Stowe at ten o'clock this (Saturday) morning and arrived at Wolverton at twelve. They reached the Euston-square Terminus precisely at two o'clock. Throughout the entire route her Majesty was received with great enthusiasm.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert were also very much cheered by the crowd which had assembled outside the gates at the Euston-square Station, and those who had obtained tickets of admission.

The Queen and Prince Albert were attired in the same dresses as when they left town on Wednesday last for Stowe, except that her Majesty did not wear a bonnet. Her Majesty's hair was dressed quite plain—no ringlets or curls.

Immediately after the arrival of the special train, her Majesty and Prince Albert entered the first Royal carriage, drawn by four horses, and proceeded direct to the Paddington Terminus of the Great Western Railway. Two other Royal carriages, each drawn by four (post) horses, followed, in which were the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward, the Earl of Delawarr, Lord Chamberlain, the Lord and Lady in Waiting on her Majesty, Colonel Bouverie and Colonel Wylde, Equerries, and other officers of the household.

The Royal cortège was preceded by three outriders in scarlet liveries, and accompanied by a detachment of the 17th Regiment of Lancers, under the command of Lieut. Miles. Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived at Windsor soon after three o'clock, a special train being in readiness at Paddington to convey the Royal party to Slough.

The arrival and departure of her Majesty from the Terminus was hailed with loud, loyal, and enthusiastic huzzas.

The same arrangements were observed at the Terminus on her Majesty's return, as when she left for Stowe.

THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

We are happy to say that no information has been received at all confirmatory of the reported death of the Emperor of Russia. The Eclair, which positively announced the event on Tuesday, in its publication of Wednesday, naïvely says that the indisposition of the Emperor is not at all serious, and makes no other allusion to its unguarded announcement of the previous day. We have received Dutch papers. They contain the following, dated:—

"FRANKFORT, Jan. 11.—A report was spread yesterday that the Emperor of Russia was seriously ill; but as the letters from Berlin, received to day, do not mention it, it is supposed that the indisposition (if there has been any) is not of much importance."

The Universal Prussian Gazette of the 12th inst. has no account whatever from St. Petersburgh.

None of the Belgian papers received to-day afford any confirmation of the rumour.

The Moniteur Belge, of Wednesday, merely repeats the rumours and observations of Tuesday's papers, but neither confirms nor denies the truth of the report, which appears to have come originally from some Antwerp merchants.

Mr. Haworth's The Colonel	(Owner)	dis.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO STRATHFIELDSAYE.—Her Majesty will leave Windsor at half-past two on Monday next, for Strathfieldsaye, by way of Ascot-heath to Bracknell; and proceed thence through Wokingham to Arborfield Cross. Her Majesty will there change horses, and proceed to Strathfieldsaye. It had been imagined that the royal cortège would pass through Reading.

A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office this afternoon at three o'clock.

Lady Sophia Foy died at Chillington Park, on the 11th instant. Her ladyship was youngest sister of the late Earl of Devon, and widow of Colonel Nathaniel Foy.

We understand that Sir John Barrow, Principal Secretary of the Admiralty will immediately retire; and that Captain Hamilton, Private Secretary to Lord Haddington, will be his successor.

REPRESENTATION OF TIPPERARY.—A meeting of the electors was held at Cashel on Monday, when it was resolved that Mr. Richard Albert Fitzgerald, of Muckeridge House, an ex-justice of the peace, and a red-hot Repealer, should be put in nomination, vice Hutchinson, who declines the honour.

THE FRANCHISE OF LODGERS.—A very important question, bearing upon the elective franchise, has been decided in the Court of Common Pleas. The Revising Barrister for the City of Westminster (Mr. Moylan) held, at the last revision, that a £10 occupier of apartments in a house, where the landlord did not reside on the premises, was entitled to the franchise. In a second case, the same learned gentleman held that where the landlord did reside, and retained a paramount control over the outer door of the house, the occupier of apartments was in the nature of a lodger, and was not entitled to the elective franchise. Against each of these decisions an appeal was carried to the Court of Common Pleas, in one case by the Conservatives, in the other by the Radicals, and the barrister's judgment was, in both cases, affirmed with costs. The decision cannot but have a very material effect upon the borough constituency throughout the kingdom.

FOUR MEN KILLED IN A PIT.—On Thursday an inquest was held before T. C. Maynard, Esq., at Durham, on view of the bodies of James Robson, aged 28 years; Joseph Elsdon, 26; Craik Haddick, 38; and John Hunter, 28; sinkers, who were killed in the Ludworth Pit, Durham, by falling down the shaft. One of the witnesses (who, at the time of the accident, was working at the bottom of the shaft) was positive the hook was fastened securely to the corf at the time it left the bottom of the pit, but it is conjectured that the corf had only rested on the point of the hook, without the spring having been pushed back, and immediately on the corf reaching the five quarter seam (where the men were to get out), had then moved out of the perpendicular or hanging position it had been in whilst ascending the shaft, and thus slipped off the hook, and fell to the bottom. Verdict—"Accidental death, with a deodand on the corf of 1s."

THE SHAPWICK MURDERS.—BRIDGEWATER, Thursday Morning.—The inquiry into the cause of Mary Dimond's death terminated in the committal of the prisoner to take her trial at the next assizes for the wilful murder of her mother. She evinced the utmost nonchalance throughout the whole proceedings, and appeared to be as little affected as the most careless observer. Once or twice during the day little matters occurred which caused a titter in the court, and no one seemed to enjoy the smile more than the unfortunate woman against whom such serious charges are made. On Friday the jury assembled at Shapwick, to ascertain the cause of the death of James Dimond, an illegitimate child, who died in November, 1843. Mr. Herapath gave his opinion that the child had been poisoned by arsenic. Evidence was given which inculpated Sarah Freeman in administering the poison; and a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against her was returned. Five other sudden deaths of children have, it is said, lately taken place in one family in this parish, which Sarah Freeman was in the habit of visiting; and it is expected that further exhumations and inquiries will in consequence take place.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The last Paris papers are occupied almost exclusively with comments on the debate on the Address in the Chamber of Peers, which, although two days had been devoted to it, had been again adjourned, with the adoption of only the first paragraph. The Count Molé, in reply to an allusion on the part of the Marquis de Boissy, declared that he had not changed his views, for that "his opinions remained what they had always been." M. de Boissy returned, however, to the charge, and added, "that he had entered a new service without a hope of advancement." The second article was fiercely attacked by the Prince of Moskowa, and eloquently defended by M. Guizot. The discussion will probably last some days.

TURKEY.—The Levant mail brings us letters from Constantinople of the 28th ult. Sir Stratford Canning was engaged in urging upon the Ottoman Porte certain pecuniary claims due to British subjects. The appeal was expected to prove successful. These letters contain no other news of interest.

SPAIN.—By the Madrid journals of the 9th, we learn that the Spanish Senate has passed the Anti-Slavery Pains and Penalties Bill by a majority of 76 to 1.

The Dowager Princess of Hohenzollern-Hechingen died at Vienna on the 7th inst., after a long illness.

PRESENTATION OF THE MACE TO HER MAJESTY, AT BUCKINGHAM.

HER MAJESTY LEAVING BUCKINGHAM.

THE GRAND CORINTHIAN ARCH AT STOWE.

STOWE—THE GARDEN FRONT.

OUR COMMENTARIES OF THE WEEK,

IN PROSE AND VERSE.

Events do dot thicken fast enough for us. In times when Parliament is at a standstill—that is to say, when it is not sitting;—when the dear divine Opera is closed, and reareth its inhospitable grandeur at the foot of the Haymarket,

Mourning so glumly
The absence of Lumley—

when the spirit of dulness is in town, and the spirit of fashion is out, it is a hard matter to pick up food for fun; and unless one meets with Sydney Smith, or Sir Peter Laurie, or a Clown out of one of the Pantomimes, good reasonable jokes are not get-atable! As we said before, events are not like hasty-pudding, for they do not thicken.

What is, in fact, the real aspect of affairs in general?

In France the war of words has commenced, the battle of the orators is in full skirmish, the Chambers are open. Guizot and Molé are in tilt, and the Peers listen to the Minister with ears of ice! They say that nothing was ever known so cold as the atmosphere of the Chamber of Peers, or so hot as that of the Cabinet. It would seem that Ministers are unpopular, and Lords and Dukes are apathetic, and that the real cause thereof is the dislike of the grand nation to the documentary evidence that has just been published about Tahiti. The Gallic cock always sticks his spurs into a Minister if he is not allowed to crow over perfidious Albion. It appears to us that we all attach too much consequence to what other people are doing, and the paper war about Tahiti and Morocco was certainly one of the most air-blown bubbles of that departed animal which we call a year. Our own tenacity, as well as that of the French, is quite open to squibbery. The ditty is quite right which chaunteth—

Par exemple—we must make a row out of doors,
If de Joinville's a fancy to shoot on the Moors,
But at home we should never complain of his stock O,
If he wouldn't have silk but would leather Morocco!

So Tahiti's name half engenders a war,
And Fashion would give up pomade for Pomare!
But were we at home, the dark lady to see,
She might have who she liked now to take tay or tea—Tahiti!

And so on in chorus. Nevertheless, we hope Pritchard will get his tin of compensation, and that Molé will not beat Guizot, for just now he is about the best Minister in Europe.

Ireland beats France. Ireland always was the place for a shindy, and now the shilalaghs have got among the priests. There is what we call no end of a row in the church there. The people are abusing the Pope as if he were at the head of Lord Cardigan's hussars instead of the church. There is no temperance in their abuse. The notion of a concordat had made them drunk, and they bring the contents of Vat and Can to bear against the Vatican itself! Dan is writing letters like mad—very respectful to the primate—but reserving a prime hate for him all the while—and in a holy fury against his holiness, who, he says, has nothing to do with repeal; and has no more business with anything temporal, than Father Mathew has with anything spiritual. By the way, how goes the Mathew subscription? There is upon our table the snatch of a glorious ballad upon the subject, with some allusion to the cold-water cure, as contemplated in England. We believe it was written upon Lord John Russell's taking the chair the other day at one of the Anti-spiritual meetings.

"We've seen some ruin—not blue ruin—
In Father Mathew's sad undoing;
Who made pawnbrokers of mankind,
By leaving them his pledge behind!

Too soon found out gin's truant throng,
His drink too weak, his pledge too strong!

But now, of poverty to ease him,
We've wed his sickly Temperance daughter
To all our national wealth of water,
And got up public baths to please him;
Where Ministers and Mothers—so gossiping rumour alleges—
May go and wipe away their great, and wash their little PLEDGES!"

So, hurrah for Public Baths! Father Mathew! Peel! O'Connell! the Pope and the Concordat!!!

Now, reader, can't you sing us a note of admiration?

Talking of notes, there is an advertisement from some learned professor running the round of the papers, saying that Messrs. Togood and Rogers' stolen notes have been committed to Memory! Would not the professor have been better employed in getting the thief committed to gaol?

So ho! So ho!——

For fear the public should think we are alluding to Soho-square, we just "stop the pen" to write down the fact, that this is merely an exclamation.

So ho! So ho!
The Queen is at Stowe!

And all the country people are congratulating the Duke, or reading Shakspeare—staring at the triumphal arches, or shouting, "So much for Buckingham!"

The Royal Visit promises to be a very pleasant one, and the whole ceremony of the journey was magnificently arranged. The Spiciest part of the business seems to have been the presentation of the village Mace, by the Mayor of the hamlet.

Not Hamlet the jeweller—nor Hamlet the Dane—but the hamlet of Buckingham aforesaid; not, however, Buckingham the Duke, but Buckingham the village! It was curious to hear a returned transport in the crowd expressing a democratic indignation at the presentation ceremony.

"I say, Bill—aint it reyther in-for-a-dig for a Mayor to look like a Mace-Cove?"

Another unusual and, indeed, rather unaccountable circumstance, deserves to be recorded;—the Mayor's name was Smith! It would appear, however, that her Majesty is not fond of spice, for when he presented it she desired him to "keep it himself"—probably thinking it might lend a flavour to his next Christmas pudding.—The Queen, however, expressed herself delighted with her reception.

English theatricals in Paris appear to be thriving glorious; Macready at his benefit will have the opportunity of imitating poor departed Billy Abbott, by putting his hand upon his heart, and shouting "La Gloire de la France" to the bouquet-pelters of Paris—and after that to the Royalty of the Tuileries. It would appear, also, that literature is thriving both at home and abroad; for the Americans have sent Miss Jane Porter "an easy chair," whereon to rest her literary limbs, should fatigue be consequent upon the prevailing mania—that is, should Miss Jane Porter be inclined to Polk—. Is there no upholsterer, with a literary turn in his lathe, who will get up a Mesmeric Sofa for Miss Martineau. Let us see, how does the ballad-monger translate her letters to the Athenæum—how does he interpret what she means to achieve?

Animal magnetism is now so to prevail,
That no human inclination is ever hence to fail.
By it, you can shut your mouth and open your door,
As you used to do before!
By it—by stretching his hand, and raising his arm a little from the socket,
A young thief will draw your handkerchief—out of your pocket!
By rapidly passing his fingers o'er a cheque that is blank,
A forger will draw your money—not for you—out of your bank.
Mesmerism, by placing a telescope to your face and keeping your eye ajar,
Will draw out the telescope, and enable you to see twice as far!

Nay, according to Miss Martineau,
It's twice as strong as sartin O!

That when you've "kick'd the bucket," by tying a magnetic cord around you —(mind, this is no sell)—
It will draw you clean out of the bucket, and by that process make you well!

After which there seems very little use in continuing these Commentaries. With Miss Martineau animal magnetism has proved a decided Commentary of Seize-her!

FOREIGN POST NIGHTS.—It is well known to our commercial readers, that previous to the introduction of the penny postage, the Post office was opened on what were called foreign post nights, (Tuesdays and Fridays) till midnight, upon the payment of sixpence for each letter. When this plan came into operation, the privilege was restricted by half an hour, and letters were only received up to half-past eleven o'clock. It was, however, expressly stated that this limitation was only a temporary one, and that as soon as Mr. Rowland Hill's plan came into full operation, additional facilities would be given. So far from this being the case, however, a notice has been issued from the Post-office still further restricting the time when foreign letters may be posted on the Tuesdays and Fridays. After the 21st inst. the box is to close finally at half-past ten. Thus the penny postage plan will prove an inconvenience, at least in regard to foreign letters, so far as the mercantile classes are concerned, as just one hour and a half less time will be allowed for the postage of foreign letters than formerly.

THE MINSTREL'S CURSE.

(From the German of Uhland.)

By LEWIS FILMORE.

In olden time a Castle stood all high and stern to view,
That overlooked the land as far as Ocean's margin blue;
Fair, fragrant gardens girt it round, like wreaths with blossoms bright,
Where sparkling fountains upward sprang in Rainbow-colour'd light.

There dwelt a Monarch proud, who call'd that fair domain his own,
Yet 'mid its Beauty made his seat a dark and dreaded Throne,
For all his soul was fierce with hate, rage on his glances rode,
His speech was ever of the Scourge, and what he wrote was Blood.

Toward that Castle's gate there came a noble Minstrel pair,
One with the gladsome eye of youth and one with time-touch'd hair;
The old man bore a Harp, and rode a steed adorn'd with pride,
His young companion lightly stepp'd the courser's flank beside.

And as they went, the old man said, "be ready now my Son;
Recall our sweetest Lay, and give thy voice its richest tone:
Be all our skill together joined of joy and pain to sing,
That we to-day may soothe to rest, this cruel-hearted King."

And soon the Minstrels stood within the lofty hall of state,
Where, on his throne, amid his court, the King in grandeur sate;
The King with glance as bloody-red as the northern streamers light,
The Queen as soft and mild as beams the moon upon the night.

The old man struck the strings, and drew a tone of wondrous swell
That ever on the ear with sound of deeper volume fell;
And heavenly-clear the young man's voice was heard the notes among,
Arising like the music wild of a spirit-choruss'd song.

They sang of Spring—of Love they sang—of the golden time of Youth—
Of Freedom, and the worth of Man—of Holiness and Truth;
They sang of all that thrills the heart with feelings mild and soft,
They sang of all the noble themes that raise man's soul aloft.

The courtiers in a circle round, the gibe and jest forbore—
The stern, cold warriors of the King, they knelt their God before!
The Queen, at once with sadness and a gentle joy oppress'd,
Unto the Minstrels threw the rose she wore upon her breast.

"Ye have seduced my knights, and now would ye my Queen beguile?"
The Monarch said, and shook his frame with furious rage the while;
Then drew his sword and plung'd it deep in the fair young Minstrel's heart,
Whence, for that tide of golden song, a bloody stream doth part.

As by a storm dispersed, the guests fly scatter'd with alarm,
And the Minstrel youth breath'd out his last upon his master's arm,
Who wrapp'd a mantle round the corse, and plac'd it on his steed,
And bound it fast, and with it left that Castle stern with speed.

But at the Castle's lofty gate halted the singer grey,
And seized his harp that bore the prize from every harp away;
He dash'd it 'gainst a pillar's base that far the fragments flung,
And spake a CURSE that fearfully through hall and garden rung.

"Woe be upon thee, House of Blood! in thee no more be found
The voice of song, of harp-string's note, or music's thrilling sound!
Nor aught but groans, the tread of slaves, and the gush of many tears,
Till Vengeance to a shapeless heap thy walls and turrets wears!

Ye gardens that are radiant now in the soft rich light of May,
That does but darker to mine eyes this gory trunk display—
Ye all shall wither! Stream or brook no more shall through ye flow!
As o'er a stony wilderness man's foot shall o'er ye go!

Woe to thee, murderer! the curse the Minstrel can command!
Thy wealth and power shall save thee not, there's blood upon thy hand!
Thy name shall be forgotten in oblivion's starless night,
Shall perish like the evening cloud that melteth from the sight!"

The Singer old thus spoke the Ban, and Heaven has heard his call;
That Castle to the dust hath gone, with every tower and wall;
A relic of departed pomp, one column stands alone,
But rent, and shattered—that may be by the next breeze o'erthrown.

Around, instead of gardens fair, is waste and desert ground;
No tree now casts a shadow there, no stream runs through the sand;
That Monarch's name no song preserves, no chronicle of verse,
Lost, sunk, forgotten; be it so! such is the MINSTREL'S CURSE!

FINE ARTS.

THE BEAUTIES OF THE OPERA. Part X. Bogue, Fleet-street.

The present number exhibits a portrait of Madlle. Falcon in the part of La Juive. The head and face are sweetly executed, but the hands, particularly the left one, are badly placed and badly drawn. The illustrations interwoven with the text are, if possible, more beautiful than heretofore. It also contains an interesting account of the progress of the Italian Opera in England from the days of Handel to the present time, which will be read with attention, no doubt, by all true lovers of the musical art.

THE HEAD OF CHRIST. By M. PAUL DELAROCHE.

There is no subject which either pen or pencil ought to approach with such timid reverence as that of the head of the Redeemer. Few artists have succeeded in imparting to it that divine expression of countenance, which, while it confesses it bears the weight and degradation of humanity, allows the Deity to shine through. Many have burlesqued its sacred character to a disgusting degree, and some others have pictured it after every clime and fashion. Sebastian del Piombo has represented it as that of a Mulatto (full of mournful feeling nevertheless), and Rembrandt in a variety of powerful but coarse expressions. The head, as imagined by M. Paul Delaroche, is not deficient in merit. There is considerable strength produced, although by weakly materials. The expression is more that of rebuke than mercy—the forehead recedes too suddenly, and the animal predominates in the back part of that head,

"In which we learn there dwelt the double soul
Of God and man!"

Altogether, however, it is a production of the highest order, and if coloured as well as well drawn, would be a greater honour to the French school.

MUSIC.

MUSIC HALL, STORE-STREET.

Mr. Turner's fourteenth annual concert took place here on Wednesday evening. The principal vocalists were Madame Albertazzi, Miss Dolby, Miss C. Felton, Miss S. Chuny, Mrs. W. Cox, and Messrs. Harrison and Machin. The conductor was Mr. L. Leo, the clever composer of the "Hebrew Melodies." The great feature of the night was a humourous new descriptive scene on the popular fairy tale and lyric drama of "Cinderella," by Mr. John Parry. It is full of telling points—the effect of the warning clock at the ball—the dignity of the baron—the spite of the sisters—the good old crone, and the amorous Prince, are all happily seized upon, and transmuted into "very excellent mirth." It is written by Mr. Albert Smith, to whom the public are indebted for "Fayre Rosamond," and the "Polka Explained." It was completely successful. Mr. Turner gave the scene from "Der Freischutz" in excellent style. The room was crowded.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

The terrible drama La Dame de St. Troupez, which has caused such excitement in Paris, aided by the unequalled Frederick Lemaitre, has already crossed the channel, and we believe that several translations are now lying at the different theatres. The piece has proved nearly as great a hit as Don Cæsar de Bazan: but we expect it will turn out to be, in London, better adapted to the theatres over the bridges, than any on this side. There are some powerful situations in the piece, which is understood to be partly taken from the affair of Madame Laffarge; but our audiences in this capital do not relish such strong seasoning, in dramatic concoctions, as those of the Boulevards.

A burlesque upon "Antigone" is, we understand, in preparation for the Adelphi Theatre, by Messrs. àBeckett and Lemon. A three-act drama, by Mr. Buckstone, was also read this week; and a farce, by Mr. Morton, has been accepted. Madame Celeste has been performing at Bristol, but returns this week to rehearse in the drama, where there are also parts for Mrs. Yates and Mrs. Fitzwilliam.

The new theatre, opposite the terminus of the Eastern Counties Railway, will open next week. It is very spacious, and is to be called the Royal Standard Theatre. It has been built by Mr. Nelson Lee—the successor to Richardson, of "fair" celebrity—and has an arena, as at Astley's, for equestrian performances, which can be formed in a very short space of time, by removing the front part of the stage. The company has been drafted from the principal minor theatres of the metropolis.

At Covent Garden a new five-act play, by Mr. Spires, called "Honesty," is in rehearsal, in which Mr. Vandenhoff and his daughter will appear. The last scene is to be one of great extent, representing Smithfield in the time of Queen Elizabeth, with the Priory of St. Bartholomew, Old St. Paul's, &c., in which the area of the whole of the Covent Garden stage will be displayed. "Antigone" has been played every evening, and the houses have been uniformly good; but the Pantomime, in common with most of the others, is decidedly "slow." However, it appears to draw money, and so we presume the end of the management is answered.

The term for which the Lyceum theatre was taken by the Keeleys, expires at Easter. Arrangements are pending to renew it; and if the offer be liberal, it is hoped that the proprietors will make any reasonable concession, rather than allow the theatre to decline into its former hapless position of being a fated establishment; more especially after the success which has attended the efforts of the present management to raise its fallen fortunes.

Miss Cushman, an American lady, of whom report speaks highly, is about to appear on our boards. She is mentioned as an actress of great talent, and singular versatility, being equally at home in comedy, tragedy, or musical burletta.

Letters from Italy state, that another sentence of the Military Commission sitting at Bologna was published in that city on the 23rd ult. Nineteen persons, among whom were several physicians, lawyers, or proprietors, implicated in the conspiracy of 1843, were brought to trial before that tribunal in the beginning of November. Five were acquitted, and the fourteen others condemned to from five to fifteen years' imprisonment. M. Violi, a proprietor, who was visited with the highest penalty, had been delivered into the hands of the Papal police by the Tuscan authorities.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"On fine days we rode a hunting."—Vicar of Wakefield.

Popular attention has of late been drawn to the policy of the Game Laws, by many grave occasions to which they have given rise. These laws are undoubtedly in worse odour at the present moment, than they ever were within our memory, although it is not easy to assign any reason for it. Because evil has come of attempts to infringe them, is certainly no evidence of their moral unfitness. This movement in opposition to them has been followed by the Horatian consequence—dum vitant stulte vitia—and wholesale slaughter has taken place of unoffending deer, and such "no quarter" among hares and pheasants as might scandalise Robin Hood, were he in the flesh. Indeed, it is not improbable, that these ill-timed massacres of game, have added fuel to the poacher's fire; but, whatever the origin of the existing prejudice, something will no doubt come of it. We shall have great outpourings of parts of speech in Parliament, and public meetings—"prosing-made-easys"—and the like, and haply an extension of the Game Bill of Rights. Perhaps we ought to be content with things as they are. A pheasant that costs the "grower" a guinea, may be had in Leadenhall market for three and sixpence, and for ourself we don't think that's to be growled at. Hereafter, however, it will be our province to write more minutely on this question; just now, we are about to give an example of the social benefits conferred by one of the game-ocracy country gentlemen, who, if he gives us the bane, certainly supplies also, a very pleasant antidote.

It is a bold thing to say, but one that few will be found to deny, that there is not a more popular country gentleman in Great Britain than the Duke of Beaufort—as Rob Roy said to Rashleigh Osbaldeston, there may be richer and more learned, but it will be news to us when we hear of a better or a truer patriot. The hunting establishment at Badminton, is among the most aucient in the kingdom; its blood has long been the most renowned. The Beaufort hound is remarkable for high form and power, vast muscle, and the absence of all unnecessary "temper." The pack is distinguished for uniformity of size, or levelness, and performances which stand alone in the records of the chase. In 1839, it is stated that they had a burst, the point blank distance being four miles and a half, which was done in fourteen minutes. It is good with a cold scent, and surpassing with a kindly one. William Long has had the whole direction of the department of the chase at Badminton for a long run of years, and a more efficient manager could not be found.

It is needless here to speak of the brilliant style in which his Grace of Beaufort turns out, or of his courtesy in the field; both are household axioms with all sportsmen. For some time, unfortunately, he was embroiled in that fertile source of fox-hunting strife—the question of country—with Mr. Horlock. That has been set at rest, and the Beaufort hounds have now a territory worthy their exploits. The stud is a noble one; an idea of the profuseness of horse-flesh may be gathered from the fact that his grace has been keen known to mount seventeen of his guests in one day. Most persons who have had experience of the Brighton road—when there was a road to that second-hand metropolis—in its best day, will remember how well his grace shone on the box; they will, therefore, be prepared for him at cover-side in every sporting relation "quite correct." The following is a list of the covers drawn by the Beaufort hounds, with their distances from the kennels:—Badminton is fourteen miles and a half from Bath, and ten miles and a half from Chippenham, a station of the Great Western Railway.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The grand movement this afternoon was the elevation of Kedger to the premiership; it was an economical one. The change, which was plainly indicated in our last, having been brought about by what is technically phrased "bearing up." This, the partial restoration of the Cobweb colt, and a strong feeling to back Annandale, were the features of the day's betting. We should add, however, that Old England, Weatherbit, the Laird o'Cockpen, and the Connaught Ranger, were in considerable force, but at very little improvement in the prices.

THURSDAY.—Their backers were so luke-warm this afternoon, that both Kedger and Alarm receded from the positions assigned them in Monday's returns; the attendance, however, was so thin, that we may not look upon it as a proof of actual want of confidence. The Cobweb colt returned to his old place, but was not backed; two or three parties seemed inclined to "nibble," but did not fancy the terms. A few scores and thirties were laid out upon Old England, Newsmonger, The Laird o'Cockpen, Miss Whip colt, the Connaught Ranger, Clear-the-Way, and Flahawlagh. The provincials continue to feed the two or three Chester Cup books opened in town; it promises to be a very heavy betting race.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

DEATH OF GENERAL SIR HENRY GREY.—This gallant officer, the brother of Earl Grey, who has been in the military service of the country since November, 1799, when he obtained his first commission, an ensigncy, in the 26th foot, died at his house in Hertford-street, Mayfair, on Saturday, having nearly reached his 80th year, 65 of which he had held the Royal commission. He had held the colonelcy of the 13th Light Dragoons since 1811, and the date of his commission as a general was May, 1825; he was the ninth general in seniority in the service.

THE CHINESE RANSOM.—The Pelican sloop, 16, Commander Philip Justice, has arrived at Portsmouth, from China, with another instalment of the Chinese indemnity. The Pelican left Hong Kong on the 3rd of August with a freight of 1,000,000 dollars.

NEW STEAM BASIN AT PORTSMOUTH.—The foundation stone of a steam-basin was laid at Portsmouth on Monday, by Sir Hyde Parker, C.B., superintendent of the dockyard.

SINGULAR DEATH.—On Wednesday an inquest was held at the Crown Tavern, Clerkenwell, before Mr. Mills, on the body of Mary Davies, whose death was alleged to have been caused by the ill-treatment of her husband. It appeared from the evidence of a woman named Emery, that deceased and her husband lived in habits of constant intemperance, and neither of them had been sober since Christmas-day last up to the 4th of January. On that day, while they were at dinner, some words arose between them, and after much mutual abuse the deceased took up the saltcellar and threw it at her husband. It missed him and went through the window behind him. Being irritated at this treatment, he got up and struck the deceased sharply on the back of her head with his open hand, and drove a hair-pin, which was in her hair, a short distance into the scalp; very little blood followed the injury, and nothing further was thought of the matter until the next day, when the deceased complained of a pain in her head. She soon became much worse, and eventually died on the 11th inst. A surgeon who was called in appeared to be of opinion that death was cansed in consequence of a violent cold, coupled with her intemperate mode of life, and the constitutional irritation arising from the injury, and a verdict of "Natural Death" was therefore returned.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.

January 16, 1845.

(From our own Correspondent.)

VOLUNTARY THEOLOGICAL EXAMINATION.—This examination is fixed for Tuesday, the 14th of October next, and the succeeding days. Subjects as follows;—The Greek Testament; The First Apology of Justin Martyr; Ecclesiastical History; the Articles of Religion, and the Liturgy of the Church of England. This examination to be open to all students who have been admitted ad respondendum quæstioni or performed the exercises necessary for the degree of Bachelor of Civil law. Those who pass this examination satisfactorily to be immediately afterwards examined in the first twenty-five chapters of the book of Genesis, in Hebrew. Candidates to send in their names on or before the 10th of October next, to each of the Examiners, viz.:—the Regius and Lady Margaret Professors of Divinity, and the Regius Professor of Hebrew.

PREVIOUS EXAMINATION.—The following are the subjects of examination in the last week of the Lent Term, 1845:—1. The Gospel of St. Luke. 2. Paley's Evidences. 3. The Old Testament History. 4. The 16th Book of the Iliad. 5. The Bellum Catilinarium of Sallust.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.—James William Field, B.A., has just been appointed Assistant-Master of Lueton Grammar School, near Leominster.

The following Church appointments of gentlemen of this University have just taken place:—The Rev. Henry Drury, M.A., of Caius College, to the Vicarage of Bremhill, with the Chapelries of Foxham and Highway (value, £406). The Rev. Thomas James Robinson, B.A., of Queen's College, to the Curacy of Wootton Underedge, Gloucestershire. The Rev. Theodore Shurt, B.A., of Christ's College, to the Curacy of Southery, near Downham Market, Norfolk.

ORDINATION TO BE HOLDEN.—Sunday, January 26th, Bishop of Norwich, at Norwich.

OXFORD, Jan. 14.—In a covocation holden this day, being the first day of Hilary Term, the Rev. Richard Parkinson, M.A., of Trinity College, Dublin, was admitted ad eundem. In a congregation holden at the same time, the following degrees were conferred:—Doctor in Divinity: James Alexander Emerton, Magdalene Hall. Masters of Arts: Rev. William Grey, Magdalene Hall; William Henry Scott, Fellow of Brasenose; Arthur Howard Ashworth, Oriel; Rev. Henry Davis Heatley, St. John's. Bachelors of Arts: Robert Stockdale, St. Alban Hall; Francis Gilbert White, Lincoln; John Spearman Wasey, Trinity.

ATTACK UPON A CLERGYMAN AT EXETER.—The Rev. Mr. Courtenay, the curate of St. Sidwells, in Exeter, was nearly deserted by the congregation on Sunday, when he went into the pulpit with his surplice. On retiring from the church, both after the morning and the afternoon service, he was surrounded and hooted at by a considerable number of persons belonging to the middle classes. It is among them, it is said, that the greatest animosity prevails towards the Puseyite clergy, as they regard them as intent on using the wealth of the church to carry the people back to Rome.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ANOTHER MYSTERIOUS DEATH IN THE REGENT'S-CANAL.—On Wednesday morning, about nine o'clock, a body was observed by some bargemen floating in the Regent's-canal, between the Kingsland-road and Haggerstone bridges, which was taken to Shoreditch workhouse. The deceased was without a coat or hat. There was nothing to lead to his identity, and there was neither any memorandum nor money in his pocket. About one o'clock one of his sons called, when he at once recognised the body of his father, and who stated that he had been missing since the 9th of December (the same day on which Mr. May was last seen alive)—that his father's name was Francis Bryan, a weaver living at No. 26, Virginia-row, Bethnal-green. When he left his home he wore a coat, and it is believed that he had some money in his possession. He has left a widow and four children who were dependent upon him.

THE MYSTERIOUS DEATH OF MR. MAY, OF BETHNAL-GREEN.—On Wednesday Mr. Baker concluded the inquiry concerning the death of Mr. William May, silk manufacturer, of Bethnal-green, of which we have before given some particulars. The testimony threw little or no light upon the suspicious occurrence. Mr. Goodwin, a surgeon, who had examined the body at the request of the jury, was more positive in his opinion as to the cause of death than Mr. Storey, the surgeon examined at the first inquiry. He was of opinion that death took place previous to the body being immersed in the Regent's-canal, and that several of the marks of violence on the body were not caused by contact with the bottoms of the barges, but by some species of violence done on land. The Coroner said the case remained still as mysterious as ever, and suggested an open verdict. The jury recorded that deceased was found dead in the Regent's-canal, with marks of violence on his person, but how he came there, or how those marks were caused, there was no conclusive evidence to show.

MANY SUDDEN DEATHS.—On Tuesday Mr. W. Carter held an inquest at the Sea Lion, Wootten-street, Cornwall-road, Lambeth, respecting the death of Mrs. Elizabeth Kay, aged fifty-six years, a lady of fortune, lately living at Charlotte-terrace, Blackfriars-road. The deceased was the wife of a farmer. On Saturday morning last she proceeded up stairs to arrange her household affairs, and whilst so engaged she suddenly fell backwards and expired. Death was occasioned by disease of the heart. Verdict, "Natural death."——On the same day Mr. Wakley, M.P., was engaged in holding inquests on the bodies of persons who had died suddenly. The first was held at the Carpenter's Arms, Grape-street, Rathbone-place, on the body of George Grey, aged fifty-three, in the employ of Mr. Bardell, in Stephen's-mews, close by. On Wednesday week the deceased, who was a sober man, and so healthy that he had not been ill for years, was cutting chaff with two other men in a hayloft in the mews. He went to get a sack to fill it, and the moment he took it up he fell down, and died without utterance or motion. He had been laughing and jesting the previous part of the day. The jury here informed the coroner that a woman who sold coffee under a gateway in Rathbone-place, had, shortly before they assembled, dropped down dead whilst serving a customer.——The second inquest was held at the George the Fourth, in Guildford-place, Clerkenwell, on the body of George Harris, aged fifty-five, a porter. Deceased lived at 15, Easton-street, and was quite well until about half an hour before his death, which occurred suddenly, in his bed-room, on Thursday week. He had suffered no violence previously, and was a sober man.——The third inquiry took place at the Rose and Crown, Allen-street, Goswell-street, on the body of Robert Wilson, aged three months, a twin child. The mother said that on Monday morning early she was about to suckle the other twin, a female, when she found deceased lying dead on her stomach, with its head beneath her right breast. Verdict, in each case, "Natural death."

EXTRAORDINARY OCCURRENCE.—On Monday the body of a man was found in a field adjoining the Kew-road, Richmond, under circumstances that at first gave rise to a suspicion of foul play. On that morning, between seven and eight o'clock, a man named Charles Strood, who is gardener to Messrs. Steele, nurserymen, Kew-road, was crossing his masters' field, where he observed the body of a man lying near a wall which separates the field from the nursery-gardens. Strood examined the body, which proved to be that of Thomas Mansell, a horsekeeper also in Messrs. Steele's employ. The face of the deceased was frightfully disfigured, and there were wounds on other parts of the body. These suspicious appearances induced the man Strood to communicate immediately with the police, and Inspector Turner, with several constables, instantly proceeded to the spot and the deceased was carried home. Mr. Lomas, a surgeon, was called in, and said the deceased had been dead some hours, and that he had probably died in a fit. The wounds on the different parts of the body appeared to have been caused by the bite of some animal, but neither of them was dangerous. The police afterwards instituted a rigid inquiry into the circumstances, and ascertained that the deceased had gone late on the previous night into the field with some hay for a horse that was turned out; that he was drunk at the time, and must by accident have run against the wall and disfigured his face; and with respect to the other marks and wounds the general supposition is that they were caused by the horse, when it found the deceased lying on the ground, biting him to awaken him, such instances of sagacity in the horse not being uncommon.

THE LATE SUICIDE AT WATERLOO-BRIDGE.—On Monday Mr. W. Carter, concluded an inquiry, at the Hero of Waterloo Tavern, Waterloo-road, respecting the death of Emma Meyer, otherwise Emily Ashburn, aged 20 years. From the evidence adduced, it appeared that the deceased had been leading a dissipated life for some considerable time. Mr. Havers, the surgeon, was of opinion that the deceased had died from the effects of a severe fall, which had occasioned other internal injuries, and were sufficient to account for death. The bruises on the side had been inflicted by her falling on some sharp substance off the bridge. Verdict—"The deceased destroyed herself while in a state of temporary insanity, resulting from poverty and drink."

SUICIDE AT THE RESIDENCE OF SIR HENRY POTTINGER.—On Monday night an adjourned inquest was held before Mr. T. Higgs, on the body of Benjamin Payne, aged 40, late butler to Sir H. Pottinger, who committed suicide.—Sir H. Pottinger deposed: The deceased has not been long in my service, but I have noticed him to be peculiarly stupid in not minding his orders, and a very absent man. A gentleman named Atkinson had frequently spoken to me of his absence of mind, which he thought arose from drink. Before I left London, a short time since, I gave him warning, telling him that he did not suit me. From that time he had been constantly shut up in his room, and frequently complained of a violent head-ache. On the morning he committed the act, only ten minutes previously, he came into my study, and said he wished to make an apology. His eyes were then red, as if he had been drinking largely. I told him that he did not suit me, but that I should pay him his wages and board wages up to the 6th of next month. He asked me for time to get up his plate, which I granted. On the morning he committed the act he told me he had been drinking my wine and brandy, but he would make it good. No doubt the sudden discharge caused him to commit the act. I think he drank to great excess.—Lieutenant-Colonel Malcolm said he had frequent opportunities of seeing the deceased, and he appeared to be a man completely out of his senses through drink.—Verdict: "Temporary Insanity."

TREATMENT OF ITALIAN BOYS.—On Monday an inquiry took place before Mr. Wakley, M.P., at the Horse and Groom, Seven Dials, on the body of Joseph Leonardi, an Italian boy, aged 15, who was found dying in the streets in a state of destitution, and expired in St. Giles's workhouse. The deceased was one of those unfortunate creatures who are brought over to this country to perambulate the streets with hand organs, and to solicit charity. The investigation excited much interest, and several gentlemen connected with an association formed for the protection of the Italian boys, with their solicitor, were in attendance. The employer of deceased, an Italian named Rabbiotti, was also represented by his solicitor.—Two Italians, in the employ of Rabbiotti, were first called, and concurred in stating that he was a kind and considerate master; that they were comfortably lodged, well supplied with food, and by no means hard worked.—A lad named Fortunati was next examined. He said he had formerly been in the service of Rabbiotti, and knew the deceased. He had lived with deceased's master for some time, but was obliged to quit his service on account of the cruelties practised upon him. Their hours for parading the streets were from nine in the morning till eleven at night. They then returned home and went to bed, three of them sleeping together. From what he knew of deceased, he considered his death was mainly attributable to the cruelties he systematically experienced, and to a violent beating given him by his master. One evening the deceased came home, and his return was represented to his master. Rabbiotti took the lad by one arm and one leg, and, dragging him from the bed, struck him violently against the wall, and beat his head against the table, which was standing in the middle of the room. Deceased was labouring under disease of the chest, and constantly complained. Notwithstanding this, he was compelled to go for the usual time into the streets with his organ.—A gentleman who was present said, that the amount of cruelty practised upon these poor defenceless boys by their rapacious masters was inconceivable.—Mr. Bennett, surgeon, deposed to having made a post mortem examination of the body. The lungs were one mass of disease, and exposure to cold would greatly accelerate it. There were no marks of violence on the external surface of the body, and he was of opinion that a natural cause produced death.—The Coroner summed up the evidence, and the jury returned a verdict of natural death, but accompanied it with a severe censure on the conduct of Rabbiotti, for allowing the deceased to be exposed to the inclemency of the weather, whilst labouring under illness.—It was stated in the course of the inquiry that in the Metropolis and principal manufacturing towns of England, there are 1000 Italian organ boys, who draw from the public a sum exceeding £20,000 annually.

FIRE IN THE CITY-ROAD.—On Tuesday night, about half-past ten o'clock, a fire broke out in the patent fire-wood manufactory of Mr. Gorton, City-basin, City-road. The proprietor himself was the first to discover the fire, but imagining it to be no more than the foul state of a chimney, he took but little notice, when the flames burst forth with great fury from the resin-room. Fortunately there was an abundance of water procurable from the canal, and by eleven o'clock the firemen succeeded in arresting the progress of the fire, but not till the workshops were completely destroyed. About forty loads of wood were entirely destroyed. Several persons had duckings in the canal, but no serious accidents occurred.

FIRE IN THE KENT-ROAD.—On Tuesday morning, shortly before three o'clock, a serious fire, involving a sacrifice of property to a large amount, burst forth from the premises belonging to Messrs. Ward and Son, coach-builders, situate at the junction of the Old and New Kent Roads, immediately facing the Bricklayers' Arms. Such was the fury of the fire, that ten minutes could scarcely have elapsed before the entire factory was in flames, from the basement to the roof. The entire warehouse was blazing in every part, and a number of persons having at length gained the factory-yard were busily engaged, as far as the intense heat would allow them, in extricating the carriages in that part of the premises, to the number of thirty, but several had caught fire. Active measures were adopted, in order to preserve the surrounding property; and a very good supply of water being obtained, the firemen in the course of three hours checked its progress. A large wooden building to the eastward of Mr. Ward's premises, adjoining a row of houses, shortly after the outbreak ignited, and it was through the prompt measures adopted by the brigade-men that the entire property was saved. The dwelling-house of the firm was preserved by an iron door in the passage that led from one to the other. Mr. Ward insured the contents of the factory in the Sun Fire-office for £3000, and the building for £800. The loss, however, is calculated at between £5000 and £6000.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A letter from Naples, dated Dec. 30, states that Sir William Follett and Lady Follett had arrived in that capital from Rome. We are gratified to learn that the learned gentleman's health was wonderfully improved, partly, no doubt, by relaxation from his professional avocations, as well as by the change of climate and scene. Sir William may be expected home in about three weeks.

The Emperor of Morocco has inflicted a degrading punishment on the chiefs who took an active part in the pursuit of his army after the battle of Isly, and in the plunder of Souirra, after the bombardment of that city. He has ordered their beards to be shaved off with the razor of the barber.

We are sorry to learn that Mr. Benjamin Wood, the member for the borough of Southwark, and brother to the late Alderman Wood, is at the present time lying in a dangerous state of illness, with little hopes of recovery.

A Constantinople letter, dated Dec. 25, says, "every day brings news of accidents happening in the Black Sea. More than 300 large vessels are beating about the ports, not being able to get in, in consequence of the mouths of the Danube being filled with ice. The Seri Perwas has been obliged to return back, although much pressed to leave for Galatz.

The Gazette de Mons states that a lawyer in that part of Belgium, M. Dethuin, having been left by a lady a fortune of 50,000f., to the prejudice of her brother, generously renounced all claim to it in favour of the natural heir.

After the celebration of a marriage, a few days ago, in the church of Canaple (France), the cure and the whole of the wedding party, adjourned to the dwelling of the bridegroom, for the usual benediction. This ceremony finished, the whole party, amounting to 25, were with glass in hand about to drink health and happiness to the new married couple, when the floor of the chamber gave way, and they were all precipitately let down to the stage below. Happily, no one received any serious injury, unless the torn and tumbled wedding garments of the bride and her attendant ladies were so considered.

The application of electrical telegraphs on the railroad from Leignitz to Frankfort on the Oder, invented by Mr. Trentler, has perfectly succeeded. These telegraphs serve for both day and night, and every one is delighted with the quickness and precision with which the signals are transmitted.

A letter, dated Berlin, the 7th inst., announces that the reigning Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz will give a grand musical festival during the end of the month, to which his Highness has caused to be invited a vast number of artistes and dilettanti from his own and the neighbouring states. Amongst the inhabitants of Berlin who have received invitations for this festival are Prince Albert of Prussia, the British Ambassador to the Court of Prussia, M. Meyerbeer, and Madame the Countess de Rossi.

An electro-magnetic telegraph from Berlin to Potsdam is being constructed, of which the wires will pass by subterranean tunnels. This telegraph will cost about 25,000 thalers, or about £4000 sterling. The distance is about six French leagues.

An answer has been received by the London Missionary Society, to the memorial presented by them to Louis Philippe, respecting the events at Tahiti, but it is couched merely in general terms, and amounts to little more than an acknowledgment of the receipt of the memorial.

The steam-packet Waterwitch, arriving at Hull, from London, on Wednesday, brought into port the master and crew of the barque Ann, Storey, of Sunderland. It appears by the statement of the shipwrecked men that the Ann, a new barque, on the first voyage, was returning from Ichaboe with a cargo of guano, and unfortunately struck on the sand, and, while beating over, shipped a quantity of salt water, which, penetrating the cargo, caused almost instantaneous combustion. A volume of smoke warned the crew of this new danger, and induced their taking immediately to the boat, and scarcely had they done so, when a tremendous explosion of the gas, engendered by the partially fired guano blew the stern out of the vessel, which then filled and sank.

We regret to learn that Mr. Baron Gurney is labouring under severe indisposition, which prevents his lordship's attending to his judicial duties. The learned baron at present is residing at Brighton. The last accounts were favourable.

The Montpelier and Nismes Railroad was opened on the 9th inst.

Very favourable accounts have been received from the great Leipzic fair. English cottons and woollens had gone off "brilliantly" in preference to Zollverein fabrics.

A letter from Oran gives the following as an episode of the battle of Isly:—"At a critical moment during the battle a French battalion, being hard pressed by the enemy's cavalry, found it necessary to form itself in square. On seeing the front rank kneel, the Moroccomen, not acquainted with French tactics, fancied that the soldiers were praying for quarter, and wished to surrender. Ceasing all acts of aggression, the body of cavalry came leisurely up, expecting to receive the arms of future prisoners. The commanding officer of the corps of infantry saw the enemy's misconception, and kept his men in their position till the Morocco troops came within two paces of the front of the battalion, when a general discharge at point blank taught them that the French were not accustomed to surrender so readily."

Upwards of 160 whales were driven ashore last week at Sandwich Bay, South Ronaldshay, Orkney, and are to be disposed of by public auction. This capture will be worth several hundred pounds to the parties concerned.

A short time back, in digging a well at Estrablin, near Vienne (France), a bronze seal was found, bearing the inscription of Hugo, Dei misericordia Francorum Rex (Hugh, by the grace of God, King of the French). It is considered to be a true antique, and to have belonged to the founder of the Capetian dynasty.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

EVENING MELODIES.—NO. IV.

"I felt it would be thus."

I felt it would be thus, when I stood beside thee last,
A robe of festal splendour was then around thee cast;
Yet when they came and told me that death had laid thee low,
I did not start to hear it—I felt it would be so!

For when I saw how oft the secret tear would start
From some deep well of feeling that gush'd within that heart,
And watch'd how sadly soon the colour went and came,
At every word of praise, at every look of blame!

And when I heard thee sing those mournful songs of thine,
And mark'd how all thy soul seem'd pour'd in every line;
Oh! there was that within me which told me what must be—
They never can live long who live so feelingly!

There's a world where tender hearts know not the wounds of this;
And they who feel the keenest only feel most bliss.
When mem'ry softly whispers that thou wert good and fair,
We will not wish thee here, but wish our spirits there! R. R. S.

CRIME IN FRANCE.

In a long statistical account, in one of the Paris papers, of the number of persons in France accused of the crime of poisoning, from 1830 to 1842 inclusive, we find the following results:—The number accused was 541. Of these 251 were acquitted; 65 condemned to death, of whom 37 were executed, and 28 had their judgments commuted; 138 sentenced to hard labour at the hulks for life, and 58 for various limited terms; 29 to minor punishment. Of the total 541, 295 were men, and 246 women; but the poisoning of husbands by their wives were more numerous than of wives by their husbands. To the total number of 541 there are to be added six who have been tried and condemned in default of appearance.

THE LATEST FROM NEW YORK.

"Did you know I was here?" said the bellows to the fire. "Oh, yes. always contrive to get wind of you," was the reply.

A HINT TO LAUNDRESSES.

Don't never wash for a two-pair back, if so be you can help it. He's sure to miss one of his two shirts when you takes home the basket. Squares is good, and so is terraces, if they're opulent, as they don't go to tea gardens on Sundays, and so can't have their feelings hurt by seeing you in their silks and muslins (which, in course, you've sent to a wrong party) at the Condick or Copinhagen, where you may take 'em to air 'em.

A PROHIBITION TO SLAVEHOLDERS.

Dryburgh Abbey, where the body of Sir Walter Scott lies buried, is the property of the Earl of Buchan. Over the large gate, at the entrance to the abbey grounds, is a board, on which is painted, in large letters, placed there in all seriousness, by order of the Countess of Buchan—"Slaveholders from America not admitted."

ANOTHER COMET.

It is said, that on the 28th of December last Mr. D'Arrest, at Berlin, discovered a comet near the star 15 Cygni. Its right ascension at 8h. 8m. and 27s. mean time at Berlin was about 19h. 36m. and 37s.; whilst its northern declination was about 36 deg. 18m. and 53s. Sir James South states, that on Monday evening, at 5h. 48m. 51s. mean time at Kensington, its observed right ascension was about 19h. 14m. and 50s.; and its northern declination about 42 deg. 49m. and 45s.

THE DRAMA IN FRANCE.

The Academie Française nominated a committee of four of its members to award a prize of 10,000f. to the best dramatic piece, in verse, of five acts, whether tragedy or comedy, represented during the period from 1834 to 1844. There has not been brought out within these years a single comedy of five acts in verse, and the number of tragedies is very limited.

AIR—"Bob and Joan."

Deeds of death I sing,
Weep ye hearts most stony,
O'er the blighted spring
Of Theban Anty Goney.
She had brothers twain—
Broths of boys no doubt, Sirs,
Who should jointly reign
Year and year about, Sirs.
CHORUS—Tooral looral loo.

Eteocles first
Quaffed Ambition's nectar;
Then he'd rather burst
Than resign the sceptre.
Polynices said—
"Time is up dear Etty;"
Th' other shook his head—
That's all my eye and Betty.
Tooral looral loo.

"Pooh!" cried Pol. "you joke;
Not resigned? What folly!
Then your ribs I'll poke."
"Try it on dear Polly."
Thus the row began,
'Spite their screaming mother;
High mettled blades—they ran—
Their swords through one and other.
Tooral looral loo.

Now begins the fix,
Eteoles buried,
Quickly o'er the Styx
Was by Charon ferried.
But by King Creon's law
'Twas death to bury Pol, sirs—
Bold Anty cried, "Bashaw!
I'll do it. Nix my doll, sirs!"
Tooral looral loo.

"Who dared?" exclaimed in wrath
The King. "Who dared to do it?"
"Twas I, and nothing loath!"
Cried Anty. "Then you'll rue it!
Now hear my mandate dread:
So may I never thrive, Miss,
You buried him when dead—
I'll bury you alive, Miss!"
Tooral looral loo.

And that he does, by Jove!
Libel on all Princes—
Creon, cruel cove,
Vile tyranny evinces.
Anty's grave is dug;
She sings her swanlike dirges,
Then into Death's stone jug
Our heroine immerges.
Tooral looral loo.

Now Creon had a son
In love with Anty Goney,
Who did not like the fun
To be left loney poney.
So Hœmon, brave and true,
And doomed by an old wizard,
His dagger boldly drew,
And whipped through his own gizzard.
Tooral looral loo.

When Creon saw the corse
Of his lost son, poor Hœmon,
His anguish and remorse
Would melt the very demon.
But when they cried "Your wife
Is dead." The deuce is in it!
He dropped a horrid knife,
And cheer'd up from that minute.
Tooral looral loo.

And now the moral, Lud!
Though hard we'll take our shy, Miss,
'Tis like a sailor's cud,
And should be "Ne quid nigh," Miss.
Our tragic tale is done,
Thalia craves your pardon,
For rhyming into fun
The woes of Covent Garden.
Tooral looral loo.

AMERICAN ELOQUENCE.

A New York paper gives the following specimen of democratic eloquence:—"This is a great country—wide—vast—and, in the south west, unlimited. Ours is a great growing country. Scoop all the water out of the Atlantic ocean, and its bed would not afford a grave sufficient for its corpse. And yet America has scarcely growd out of the gristle of boyhood. Europe? What is Europe? She is no whar; nothing; a circumstance; a cypher; a mere obsolete idea. We have faster steam-boats, swifter locomotives, larger creeks, bigger mountains, bigger plantations, better mill privilege, broader lakes, deeper cataracts, louder thunder, forkeder lightning, braver men, hansomer women, and more money than England dar have! (Thundering applause.)

ANCIENT VALUE OF MANUSCRIPTS.

Manuscripts were in former times important articles of commerce; they were excessively scarce, and preserved with the utmost care. Usurers themselves considered them precious objects for pawn. A student of Pavia, who was reduced, raised a fortune by leaving in pawn the manuscript of a body of law; and a grammarian who was ruined by a fire, rebuilt his house with two small volumes of Cicero.—D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature.

RECIPE FOR LONG LIFE.

A venerable old gentleman, aged 76 years and upwards, a resident in Bolton all his life, was walking in Bradshawgate the other day, when a worthy magistrate asked him "What, my respected friend, will you take for your recipe for long life when you die?" "Oh, Sir," replied the old gentleman, "I can give it you now. My parents were poor, but industrious, and had a large family to bring up. We were put to work early—I was set to work at the age of six years, and continued so to labour until I was seventy years old. In short, with God's protection, I worked regular, played regular, ate regular, drank regular, went to bed regular, got up regular—did all by regularity during my life. That, Sir, is my recipe."

A FEMALE SMOKER.

A woman named Jennings died recently at Burghclere, Hants, at the extraordinary age of 103, retaining all her faculties to the last. She was a most inveterate smoker, having addicted herself to it for more than sixty years, consuming during that period two ounces of tobacco weekly. At this rate, smoking cannot be very prejudicial.

RATS TURNED TO GOOD ACCOUNT.

Some French speculators are engaged in the destruction of rats, from which they derive great advantage. The skin is prepared with great care, and proves a great value as a fur. The carcase, properly speaking, is sent to a melting-house at Grenelle, where it is boiled down for the sake of the grease, which is found to be an excellent material for the manufacture of candles. The flesh that remains of the animal is sold for the nutriment of birds, ducks, and pigs. The leg and thigh bones, moreover, which are described as being as fine as ivory, are employed in the manufacture of ear and tooth-picks.

THE FIRST PRINT KNOWN.

The earliest engraving hitherto known, which represents Saint Christopher bearing the infant Jesus on his shoulders, is marked with the year 1423; but an accident has carried this date five years backward. A few weeks ago some person at Malines, who was about to burn an old chest which contained a quantity of mouldy papers, perceived, pasted on the inside of the lid, a print which was become very obscure from dirt and age. A person, however, was present, who had a knowledge of prints, and who carefully took off the fragments; and, having united them again, found clearly marked the date of 1418. This rare specimen, which belongs to the Flemish school, has been purchased for the Royal Library at Brussels, at the price of 500 francs.

SKETCHES IN MEXICO.

DEMONSTRATION BY THE UNITED STATES AGAINST MEXICO.

New York papers to the 24th ult. have been received by the packet ship Liverpool. They contain a document of considerable importance, viz., a special message from President Tyler to Congress upon the affairs of Mexico and Texas. President Tyler states that this message has been rendered necessary by the receipt of despatches from Mexico, and after characterising the language of the Mexican Government as "highly offensive," he proceeds to give his opinion of the course which he considers it incumbent upon the United States to pursue. He places before Congress in strong and warlike language, the "outrages," both in acts and language, which have been directed against the United States for a long time past, and adopts the same arguments as those used by Mr. Shannon, thereby showing that the present Government, in all its branches, justifies the conduct of Mr. Shannon in his negotiation with Mexico. Mr. Tyler makes the following declaration in regard to the annexation of Texas. He says:—

MEXICAN SOLDIER.

"The subject of annexation addresses itself most fortunately to every portion of the Union. The Executive would have been unmindful of its highest obligations, if it could have adopted a course of policy dictated by sectional interests and local feelings. On the contrary, it was because the question was neither local nor sectional, but made its appeal to the interests of the whole Union, and of every State of the Union, that the negotiation, and finally the Treaty of Annexation, was entered into; and it has afforded me no ordinary pleasure to perceive that, so far as demonstrations have been made upon it by the people, they have proceeded from all portions of the Union. Mexico may seek to excite divisions amongst us, by uttering unjust denunciations against particular States, but when she comes to know that the invitations addressed to our fellow-citizens by Spain, and afterwards by herself, to settle in Texas, were accepted by emigrants from all the States; and when, in addition to this, she refreshes her recollection with the fact that the first effort which was made to acquire Texas was during the administration of a distinguished citizen from an eastern State, which was afterwards renewed under the auspices of a President from the south-west, she will awake to a knowledge of the futility of her present purpose of sowing dissensions among us, or producing distraction in our councils by attacks, either on particular States, or on persons who are now in the retirement of private life. Considering the appeal which she now makes to eminent citizens by name, can she hope to escape censure for having ascribed to them, as well as to others, a design, as she pretends, now for the first time revealed, of having originated negotiations to despoil her by duplicity and falsehood of a portion of her territory? The opinion then, as now, prevailed with the Executive, that the annexation of Texas to the Union was a matter of vast importance. In order to acquire that territory before it had assumed a position among the independent Powers of the earth, propositions were made to Mexico for a cession of it to the United States. Mexico saw in these proceedings, at the time, no cause of complaint. She is now, when simply reminded of them, awakened to the knowledge of the fact, which she, through her Secretary of State, promulgates to the whole world as true, that those negotiations were founded in deception and falsehood, and superinduced by unjust and iniquitous motives. While Texas was a dependency of Mexico the United States opened negotiations with the latter power for the cession of her then acknowledged territory; and now that Texas is independent of Mexico, and has maintained a separate existence for nine years—during which time she has been received into the family of nations, and is represented by accredited ambassadors at many of the principal courts of Europe—and when it has become obvious to the whole world that she is for ever lost to Mexico, the United States is charged with deception and falsehood in all relating to the past, and condemnatory accusations are made against

MEXICAN WATER-CARRIER.

States which have had no especial agency in the matter, because the Executive of the whole Union has negotiated with free and independent Texas upon a matter vitally important to the interest of both countries. And after nine years of unavailing war, Mexico now announces her intention, through her Secretary of Foreign Affairs, never to consent to the independence of Texas, or to abandon the effort to reconquer that republic. She thus announces a perpetual claim, which at the end of a century will furnish her as plausible a ground for discontent against any nation which at the end of that time may enter into a treaty with Texas, as she possesses at this moment against the United States. The lapse of time can add nothing to her title to independence."

Notwithstanding this denunciation of the conduct of Mexico, however, Mr. Tyler intimates that the United States will not resort to such a decided step as a declaration of war, although the conduct of Mexico justifies such a step: but,

"Actuated by a sincere desire to preserve the general peace, and in view of the present condition of Mexico, the Executive, resting upon its integrity, and not fearing but that the judgment of the world will duly appreciate its motives, abstains from recommending to Congress a resort to measures of redress, and contents itself with re-urging upon that body prompt and immediate action on the subject of annexation. By adopting that measure, the United States will be in the exercise of an undoubted right; and if Mexico, not regarding that forbearance, shall aggravate the injustice of her conduct by a declaration of war against them, upon her head will rest all the responsibility."

This hint of immediate action has been already adopted by the House of Representatives. No less than three bills on the subject have been introduced and discussed.

In the Senate, on the 19th ult., Mr. Atchinson introduced his bill, extending the jurisdiction of the United States over the territory of the Oregon. A long debate followed, and the bill was ultimately referred to a select committee.

The tariff had been the subject of debate, but it does not seem likely that there will be any alteration in it this session.

The accounts from Mexico represent that country to be in a state of great excitement. The insurgent general Paredes had increased his force to 10,000 men, and the insurrection was spreading.

The steamer Acadia has since arrived after a rapid voyage from Boston, and by this means the accounts reach to the end of December.

There is important news from Mexico by this arrival, brought by the Eugenia from Vera Cruz. Mr. Cushing had arrived in New York, from Mexico, the vessel having sailed on the 12th ult., from Vera Cruz.

The following is the order in which he relates it:—

"Santa Anna had assumed the functions of military chief of the revolution.

"The four departments of Zacatecas, Aguascalientes, Sinalva, and Sonora, concurred at once in the pronunciamento of Jalisco, and thus the five north-western departments were in arms at once against Santa Anna. Between these and Mexico there intervene the two departments of Guanajuato and Queretaro.

"Paredes advanced to Lagos, on the frontier of Jalisco, and there established his head-quarters, with an army of 1400 men, to await the progress of events. In the contiguous department of Guanajuato was General Cortazar with 2000 men, on whom Paredes depended for support; but the rapid movements of Santa Anna himself prevented Cortazar from joining Paredes (if he had the intention), and compelled him, for the present at least, to declare for Santa Anna.

"For, instantly on hearing what had taken place in Guadalajara, Santa Anna, who was then at Magna de Claro, in the department of Vera Cruz, and in whose neighbourhood was a large body of troops, professedly collected for an expedition against Texas, set out for Mexico, being invested by the

THROWING THE LASSO.

Presidente interino with the conduct of the war against Paredes. He set out for Juan Jalapa on the 7th of November, at the head of 8500 men, crossed rapidly the department of Puebla, where he received some additional troops, and on the 18th arrived at Guadaloupe, a town near Mexico, where he fixed his head-quarters.

"He might have left the departments of Vera Cruz and Rubla full of professions of loyalty to his government, and he found the same professions in that of Mexico; and similar professions came to him there from Queretaro and Guanajuato; and he proceeded to march from Guadaloupe, and to assemble at Queretaro a force of 13,000, with which to overwhelm the little army of Paredes.

"But, even at this moment, all powerful as he was received, at the head of a great army, and with all the departments behind loyal, symptoms began to appear of the uncertainty of his cause. For, though the Congress did not professedly support Paredes, yet it insisted that Santa Anna should proceed constitutionally, which the latter was unable or indisposed to do.

"The Mexican Constitution provides expressly that the President cannot command in person the military force either by land or sea without the previous permission of Congress. But Santa Anna had taken the command without even pretending to ask the consent of Congress; and in so doing had himself performed a revolution quite as positive and serious as that of Paredes.

"On arriving at Queretaro, Santa Anna found that although the military authorities were professedly in power, yet the junto departamental had pronounced for the institution of Jalisco. Therefore, he made known to the members that if they did not repronounce in his favour, he would send them prisoners to Perote.

"The position is now an entirely critical one, therefore everything depends on whether his troops adhere to him against the Congress and the Constitutional Government. If they do, he becomes the military dictator of the country.

"This subject occupied the Chambers on the 29th and 30th of November; and their attitude has now become so menacing that the Presidente interino Canilizo (after consultation with Santa Anna) took the high-handed step of deciding to close the session of Congress by force, and declaring Santa Anna Dictator of the Republic.

"Accordingly, on repairing to the palace on the 1st of December, the members found the doors shut against them, and guarded by soldiers; and on the 2nd appeared the proclamation of Canalizo, as Presidente interino, declaring the Chamber dissolved indefinitely, and conferring all the powers of Government, legislative as well as executive, on Santa Anna, as Presidente propietario, the same to be exercised by himself as Presidente interino until otherwise ordered by Santa Anna.

"For some days this forcible demolition of the Constitutional Government by the creatures of Santa Anna remained without producing any apparent effect in Mexico. But on the very day when the news reached Puebla General Inclan, commandant general of that department, in concert with the civil authority, pronounced against Santa Anna, and in a few days (on the 6th) the garrison and people of Mexico rose against the Government, impri soned Canalizo and his Ministers. Congress re-assembled—the President of the Council of Government, General Herrera, assumed the exercise of the functions of President according to the Constitution, and new Ministers were appointed the next day, whose authority was immediately acknowledged in Vera Cruz.

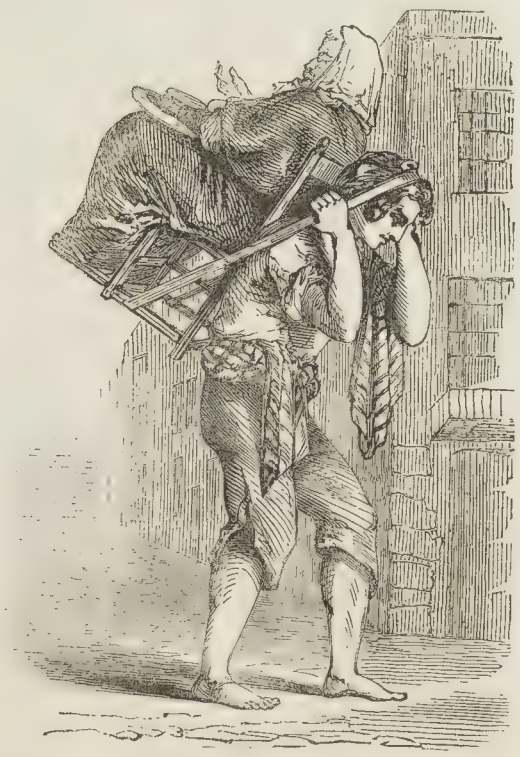
"They refused, and three of them were immediately arrested by his order, and sent off under a strong guard in the direction of Mexico and Perote. When the report of these proceedings reached Mexico, the Congress immediately summoned before it the Ministers of War and of Government, to know whether they had authorised General Santa Anna to imprison the members of the junta department of secretary.

"Meanwhile, Santa Anna is constitutional President of the Republic, but unconstitutional in command of the troops employed against Paredes. The new Minister of War has ordered him to give up his command.

"If he refuses, he becomes undoubtedly a rebel and a traitor, because the new Provisional Government in Mexico is constitutionally constituted. If he consents, he ceases to have any troops for his support—he is placed at the mercy of his enemies.

Mr. Cushing was the bearer of the commercial treaty concluded between China and the United States. It appears that he was attacked and robbed by a set of banditti, at El Pinal, near Puebla. He lost many private papers of great value.

In New York business was dull, it being just the close of the year, and the 1st of January settling day.



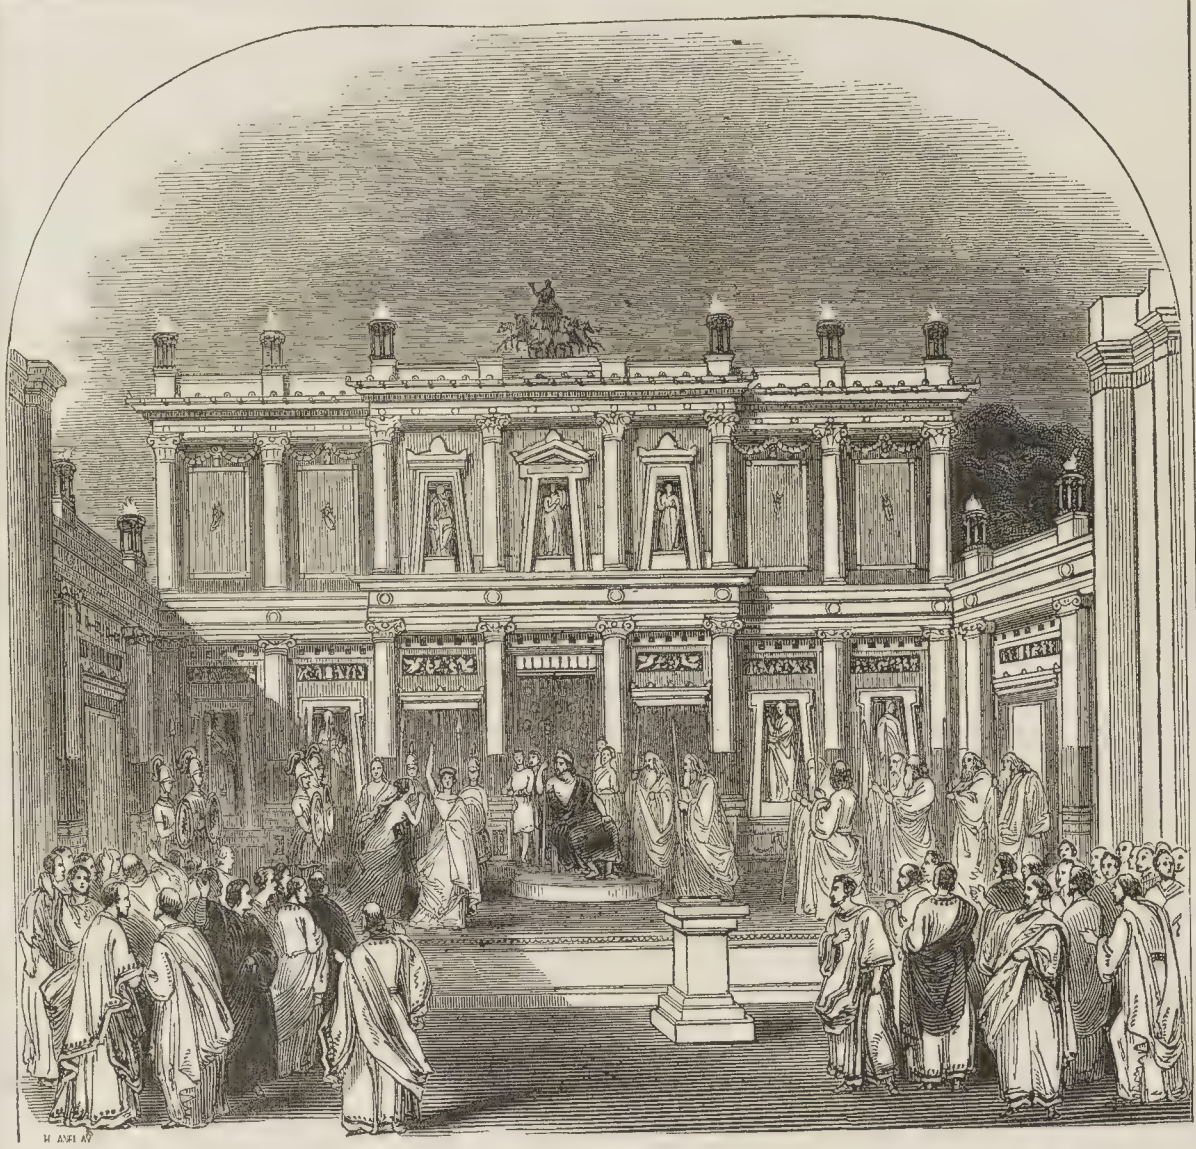
No especial change had occurred in State Stocks generally, with the exception of Pennsylvanian Fives, which have advanced from 60 to 73½ and 75

We annex a few characteristic sketches of the Mexican population, which will, doubtless, be interesting at this moment.

1. A Mexican Soldier, in undress: the jacket and trousers are of linen, and the head-dress is a shako of muslin: the entire dress is white, with crimson collar, cuffs, and epaulettes.

2. A Mexican Dragoon: the coat is blue, with crimson facings; trousers, light claret; and a broad-brimmed hat, with a muslin band.

3. A Mexican Ranchero seizing with a lasso an officer from the front of his battalion; the dress of the former is a green jacket and trousers, and a broad straw hat.



MEXICAN BEGGAR.

4. A Mexican Water-Carrier: his apron and cap are of leather, and the water is borne in earthen vessels by straps, in the manner shown in the Engraving.

5. A Mexican Beggar, carried in a chair upon the back of a strong man.

The Engraving in our front page represents one of the principal streets in the fine city of Mexico; with a specimen of the palace-like style in which the principal houses are built. It is the street of silversmiths; to the right is the Convent of San Francisco.

SCENE FROM "ANTIGONE," AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT-GARDEN.

Who could have ever dreamt of Sophocles appearing on the stage from which Shakspeare has been driven, or that the Greek's tragedy should be mutilated into a choral opera? But, nil admirari, we should not wonder at anything now-a-days.

The tragedy of "Antigone" was represented at Athens some two thousand years ago, and such was the rapture of the people on its production, that the author was rewarded by an appointment to the governorship of Samos. The Athenians knew how to respect genius. But the "Laomedontian Maid," or, as Statius calls her, never was in such wretched plight as she is now made to appear. This does not apply to her personation by Miss Vandenhoff, whose performance of the part cannot be too highly praised; but to the wretched reduction of the Greek tragedian's powers into a weak dilution of his poetry; in addition to this, there is some cumbrous music, most wretchedly performed: music which requires great masses of vocal strength, such as we noticed on its production at Exeter Hall, but which, with a paucity of voices, one and all out of tune, was execrable.

"Antigone devota malis,"

That this production has been successful on the Continent is not to be wondered at, for it was brought out under the immediate order and patronage of his Majesty the King of Prussia at Potsdam, and subsequently at Berlin, Vienna, Hamburgh, Frankfort, and other principal towns in Germany. Again, at Paris it was looked upon by the admirers of the Greek model as a rénaissance of the days of Crebillon and Racine, and hailed as the precursive sign of the downfal of English and German dramatism. But the music, after all, was too heavy for the volatile Gauls, for it was the drama and the resuscitation of its style that was more welcomed than anything else. Its production on the English stage under the best auspices would have been hazardous; but got up as it is, with a bad chorus and a worse orchestra, nothing could have had less hope of success. Still the "pure gold" of Mendelssohn's music "shone through the ungraceful foliage which surrounded it," although its effects were very faint echoes of those we had heard before.

The scene by Mr. Macfarren, representing the proscenium of an ancient Greek theatre, is very classically and correctly painted. The acting of Mr. Vandenhoff in the part of Creon, was dignified and severe, and formed a beautiful, or rather a strong contrast, to the gentle, but still resolute, character of Antigone, which was personated by Miss Vandenhoff with most touching tenderness.

"Of voice, look, gesture, everything the muse
Of Tragedy herself might well display!"

Mr. Bartholomew has had a difficult task in his adaptation of this tragedy to the English stage, but we congratulate him on the success with which he has performed it. Nevertheless, we fear that it was a thankless undertaking, and suspect that Sophocles and Mendelssohn will never supplant Shakspeare and Locke.

The scene of our illustration is that wherein "Antigone" is brought in by the guards, and acknowledges having buried the body of her brother.

PLAN OF A GREEK THEATRE.

PRINCESS'.

A very amusing drama, translated from a piece which appears to have created some sensation in Paris—we believe, at the Variétés—was produced here on Monday evening, and was perfectly successful. It is called "Monseigneur, or Paris in 1720." The drama contains a character of that class so peculiarly suited to Mr. Wallack's style of acting—a robber of polished manners and inexhaustible resources, with a dash of morality running through all his swindling: a union of attributes taken from Massaroni, Don Cæsar de Bazan, Claude Duval, and Barrington. The plot is too long to describe, running through four acts, (or tableaux, as they are termed, after the French, in modern stage nomenclature). It is chiefly remarkable for its extreme ingenuity, being full of those surprises and situations, in working out which the dramatists on the other side of the Channel leave our own authors so far behind. The dialogue is not distinguished by any particular smartness, but moves along smoothly enough; and has the great recommendation, if not witty, of never being verbose and unnecessary to the progress of the action. The chief rôle, Monseigneur, was, as we have stated, ably filled by Mr. Wallack, and his assumption of it was throughout a finished piece of acting. We question whether any one on the London stage could have played it with so much effect: his easy assurance, and cool intrepidity in the midst of danger—his elegance of deportment or sturdy resolution, when either required to be called into action, with the ncidental "bits" of sentiment, on discovering his brother, were all admirable. Next to him Mr. Granby, a careful actor, deserves to be commended for playing so well the debauched old banker and stock jobber, M. Labarre: nothing was overdone, and yet every point told well with the audience. Mr. Oxberry was immensely funny as the jeweller's apprentice, Germaine, raising his voice to a most ludicrous pitch in those absurd screams of terror and simplicity which are sure to bring forth the laughter of the audience; and Mr. Walton, as the dishonest cashier of Monseigneur's band, Bernard, left us nothing to find fault with. A mock scena, descriptive of the delights of the ballet, was given with much effect by Miss Emma Stanley, who played Rosaline, a danseuse at the opera; and Miss Marshall made a piquante little grisette, such as one might have seen in 1720, picking her way, from top to top of the paving stones, in the Faubourg St. Germain, as she took home her work to her aristocratic employers. It is not often that we find a professed dancer speaking so sensibly as this young lady. Altogether the drama was very well acted, and fully merited the success it achieved. The applause at the fall of the curtain was unanimous; and Messrs. Wallack, Oxberry, and Miss Stanley were called for by the audience, when it was announced for repetition. We think we may conscientiously recommend it to the notice of our play going readers.

There is some nice scenery by Mr. Beverley introduced in the first and fourth acts. But is there not an anachronism in the view of the Marché des Innocents? The time of the piece is 1720, and if we remember rightly the fountain introduced was not erected until 1788, when it was built in the market-place, principally from the materials of an old one, the work of the celebrated Jean Goujon, which stood at the angle of the Rues Aux Fers and St. Denis.

At the STRAND, Mr. Wild has been performing in his old piece, "The Road of Life;" and, at the OLYMPIC, Miss Davenport has appeared in Horatia, and with effect, albeit she might be better supported. The Pantomime at this latter house is aided by an active Clown—Mr. Flexmore.

SOPHOCLES AND THE "ANTIGONE."

Methinks I see the mighty Poet's eye
Adding indignant lightning to his tongue,
As 'fore the Judges he reciting stood
To vindicate his intellect against
A foul conspiracy by children form'd!*
Mark, how each glowing line improves his sense
And turns to shame th' unnaturals whose thirst
Is for the old Man's pelf and not his brains.
Oh! History, on thy memorials nought
Is half so beautiful as Poetry
Defending Reason!

The revival of the "Antigone" of Sophocles at Covent Garden having called public attention to its author—the great Greek dramatist and tragedian—we have, at the desire of several esteemed friends, prepared the accompanying sketch of Sophocles, from a fine antique bust, which was found about the year 1775, near Gensano, seventeen miles from Rome, and which is now preserved in the British Museum. The head is carved in the somewhat precise and formal manner of the early Greek school, but with more of the individuality of character which belongs to a later style. It is, without doubt, an authentic work; and presents, in all probability, a good likeness of the poet.

BUST OF SOPHOCLES.

Sophocles was born in the second year of the 71st Olympiad, 495 B.C., at Colonos, a small town near Athens, and was contemporary with Æschylus, Euripides, and Pericles. His genius and talents were not confined to poetry: he was associated in command with Pericles and Thucydides, and assisted in reducing the isle of Samos. In his maturer age he exercised the functions of a priest. His tragedies are said to have been a hundred and twenty in number, of which seven only have come down to us. He lived to the age of 90 years, and gained numerous dramatic prizes.

In addition to this notice, we have subjoined a plan of a Greek Theatre, which will show, in comparison with a modern structure of the kind, how impossible it is, with our present means, to produce anything like an identical representation of a drama of antiquity. In the Greek Theatre, the chorus, which is arranged at Covent-garden in so irregular and awkward a manner, occupied the whole body of our present pits, a situation in which the musical responses would be listened to by the audience without interruption of the dramatic action. The chorus was in fact a poetical commentary, supposed to be uttered by the audience, and which, therefore, was very properly placed in the midst of the assembly.

* The treachery of the children of Sophocles is well known. They wished to become possessors of their father's wealth, and, tired of his long life, they accused him before the Areopagus of insanity. The only defence the poet made was, to read his tragedy of "Œdipus at Colonos," which so delighted the judges, that they pronounced that no insane man could have written it. We should like to know what verdict they would have passed upon Nat. Lee!

The following inscription for the tomb of Sophocles translated by the first lyrist in the world (or of any time) may not be inadmissible here:

"Around thy tomb, oh! Bard divine,
Where soft thy hallow'd brow reposes,
Long may the deathless Ivy twine
And Summer pour her waste of roses!"

THE MURDER AT SALT HILL.

Some further information of an interesting character has been obtained relative to the murder of Sarah Hart, at Salt Hill. It should be remarked that although the facts here supplied proceed from a respectable channel, they are of an ex-parte character, and explanations may hereafter be given by the accused. Nevertheless, although very desirous not to do anything to prejudice him, yet as the public take such an interest in the matter, it is our duty to satisfy their curiosity as far as possible. The following particulars may be implicitly relied upon:—

From inquiries made by the metropolitan police, in consequence of a communication made by Mr. Perkins (the superintendent of the Eton police) to the commissioners in Scotland-yard, it was ascertained that a person in the garb of a Quaker had purchased some prussic acid at the shop of Mr. Hughes, a chemist and druggist, residing at 89, Bishopsgate-street-within. Perkins left Eton on Sunday last for London, and proceeded to the shop of Mr. Hughes, where he ascertained that a Quaker-looking person had purchased a small quantity of prussic acid on the 1st instant, the very day the murder was committed; and, also, a similar quantity on the following day. The person who served the poison was an assistant to Mr. Hughes, named Thomas. As the tracing the possession of prussic acid to John Tawell was a link in the evidence extremely desirable to be obtained, Mr. Thomas left London on Monday afternoon, accompanied by Perkins, for Aylesbury, in order to identify the party accused. Upon arriving at the gaol that evening they found the prisoner had been locked up for the night, and it was not deemed advisable that he should be seen until the following morning. Accordingly, next morning Mr. Thomas attended at the prison. He was first shown several of the prisoners, but amongst those he could not identify any one as the person to whom he had sold the poison. He was then taken by the gaoler into a cell in which were several other prisoners, and he immediately pointed out John Tawell as the man who was served at Mr. Hughes's shop with prussic acid on the 1st and 2nd instant. The prisoner, who appeared considerably disconcerted at seeing Mr. Thomas, said to him, on Mr. Thomas saying to the gaoler, "That's the man who bought the poison," "I think I have seen thee before." He manifested a desire to enter into a conversation with Mr. Thomas, but this was prevented, and the parties retired. It is said that Mr. Thomas has so clear a recollection of the features of the prisoner, that he can swear most positively to his being the person.

The following particulars connected with the purchase of prussic acid by the accused, on two different occasions, may be interesting:—He called at Mr. Hughes's on Wednesday, the 1st instant, between twelve and two o'clock in the afternoon, taking with him a small bottle with a glass stopper, and asked for fourpennyworth of hydrocyanic (prussic) acid. On the bottle was a printed label, upon which was printed, "Scheele's Prussic Acid," and also other particulars with respect to its strength, and the quantity sufficient for one dose. Mr. Thomas not being able to remove the stopper from the bottle, gave him another bottle of the same size, and placed upon it a similar label. The prisoner then left. It will be recollected that on the same evening, as early as six o'clock, he was seen at the residence of the ill-fated Sarah Hart, who was found in the agonies of death, from the effect of prussic acid, as was proved by the medical witnesses at the Coroner's inquest, within half an hour afterwards. On the following day (Thursday, the 2d inst.), the prisoner again called at Mr. Hughes's, and asked for another 4d. of hydrocyanic acid, stating to Mr. Thomas (by whom he was served with the poisonous preparation), that he had had an accident and broken the bottle he had bought the day before. In the meantime Mr. Thomas having been enabled to loosen the stopper of the prisoner's own bottle, this bottle was returned to him with the required quantity of prussic acid, a label having been previously affixed to it, describing the poisonous properties of its contents. It was about half-past eleven o'clock on that morning that John Tawell was at the shop of Mr. Hughes, and within an hour afterwards he was taken into custody at the Jerusalem Coffee-house, Cornhill, by Inspector Wiggins, of the D division of the metropolitan police.

No trace of either of the small bottles containing the prussic acid he purchased at Mr. Hughes's have yet been discovered. What he intended to have done with the contents, had he not been apprehended so shortly after he made the purchase of the deadly drug, will, perhaps, for ever remain a mystery.

A piece of paper, which had been tied over the cork of a small bottle, was found in the fireplace of the deceased in Bath-place, on the night of the murder, but it is so discoloured, from the effects of smoke, that it is now impossible to ascertain what was its original colour. It is in the possession of Mr. Champneys, surgeon, Salt Hill, and will be produced on the trial.

Some humane and benevolent individuals, residing at Slough and Salt-hill, and in their immediate vicinities, have taken compassion upon the helpless state of the two children, and opened a subscription, not only to aid them at the present moment, but to endeavour to get them placed in an asylum where they may be taken care of and educated. Mr. Botham, the proprietor of the Windmill Hotel, Salt-hill, has kindly consented to receive subscriptions on their behalf.

Mrs. Hadlow appeared before the magistrates at Eton on Wednesday afternoon, for the purpose of stating that the body exhumed the previous day, at Farnham, was that of her daughter, Sarah Lawrence.

Mr. Larkin also produced a silver watch, with the initials "S. H." engraved on the back, maker's name, "Bennett, London, No. 604," found at the residence of the deceased on the evening of the murder, which he was ordered to retain, to be produced, if necessary, at the trial of the accused.

The mother of Sarah Hart, through the activity of the police, has been discovered, residing with her second husband, named Hadlow, a blacksmith, at Gravesend, and, strange to say, neither of them had heard of the supposed murder until they received a letter from one of the police, communicating the particulars. The mother and her husband arrived at Eton on Tuesday afternoon, when a meeting of the county magistrates took place, with a view to the further investigation of the case. After the depositions of several witnesses were taken, the woman proceeded to the churchyard at Farnham, where the body of the deceased was disinterred in the presence of Mr. Norblad, Mr. Champneys, and Mr. Moss, surgeons, the churchwarden of the parish, the foreman of the jury, and a number of other persons.

The coffin was placed on trestles at the church porch, and the lid being removed, the mother placed her hand on the face of the corpse, and exclaimed in the deepest agony of feeling, "This, indeed, is my poor girl." Decomposition had not taken place, and the corpse had undergone no change in appearance since its interment. The coffin was then consigned to the grave. It appears, from information obtained from the mother, that the deceased's name is Lawrence, she being a daughter by a former husband. She was born at Chatham in the year 1805. The last time she saw her was between four and five years ago, when she was living with the prisoner Tawell, at Bridge-street, near Southwark-bridge, as his servant, but she was not aware of her having the two children of whom the prisoner is supposed to be the father. At this period the prisoner had established a charity-school in the above neighbourhood, to which he subscribed £100 per annum.

Superintendent Larkin produced before the magistrates on Wednesday, the drugs found at the prisoner's house at Berkhampstead. There were upwards of fifty phials, containing various liquids, which underwent an inspection by the surgeons, Mr. Norblad and Mr. Champneys, none of which contained prussic acid. In obtaining the drugs the officer received every assistance and courtesy from the wife of the prisoner, who is a very elegant woman; and the daughter, a young lady of seventeen years, assisted in packing up the drugs in a hamper.

The following is an extract from the Old Bailey records of 1814. It relates to the person who has been committed for trial for the alleged murder of his old servant, Mrs. Hart, near Slough:—

"London.

"John Tawell (30 years of age), from the Poultry Compter, committed by the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor (Birch) on oath of Edward Anthony Thorogood and others, for feloniously and falsely forging and counterfeiting a bank note for payment of £10, with intent to defraud the governor and company of the Bank of England.

"Dated 4th of February, 1814.

"Detained on oath of Joshua Bray and others, for feloniously, knowingly, and wittingly having in his possession and custody a forged bank-note for payment of £10, knowing the same to be forged and counterfeited.

"Dated 4th of February 1814—Indicted. Confessed possession."

The confession of the minor offence of having possession of the bank-note, the making of which confession as a means of escaping the capital punishment was considered to be at that period a very great favour indeed, had the effect of causing a sentence of transportation for fourteen years upon the convict.

The Poultry Compter was the prison which is now called the Giltspur-street Compter.

ATTEMPTED MURDER OF A WIFE, AND SUICIDE BY THE HUSBAND.

An attempt was on Wednesday made, by a man named Clements, to murder his wife, and he afterwards committed suicide. The particulars of this frightful affair are these. The deceased John Clements, is in the employ of Mr. Elberton, woolstapler in the Grange-road, Bermondsey. Since last June he occupied, with his family, consisting of a wife and three children, a ready furnished first floor at No. 24, Little George-street, in the immediate vicinity of his employer's premises. For some time past Clements had exhibited considerable depression of spirits, but not to such an extent as would lead to the supposition that he meditated the dreadful act which he carried into effect on the present occasion. He complained of being unwell on Wednesday morning before he left home to go to work, and returned before his usual time, between ten and eleven o'clock, at which time he requested his wife to make him some tea, and to toast some bread for him. At this period their eldest son, a boy about 13 years of age, was in the sitting-room with his parents, and as it was about the dinner hour he was sent to the public-house for a pint of porter. In about a minute after the boy had quitted the house, the landlady, a Mrs. Pudner, was alarmed by hearing a loud scream, followed by the noise of some person falling heavily on the floor immediately over the room in which she was sitting. A knock coming to the street door, a young man, named Bond, was let in, and the moment he entered Mrs. Clements came running down stairs, with her throat cut, and the blood gushing from the wound. When she got into the passage she fell from exhaustion and loss of blood into the arms of Mr. Bond, ejaculating "For God's sake call a doctor." Bond then carried her into the back parlour, and having placed her in a reclining position, he hurried away, and gave information of the transaction at the police-station of the Rotherhithe division. Two policemen were immediately sent to the house for the purpose of taking Clements into custody, but upon their entering the room he was discovered lying on the floor in a pool of blood, with his throat cut nearly from ear to ear, and a razor, with which he had perpetrated the deed, close by his side. A medical man speedily arrived, but the unfortunate man was quite dead. On examination of the wound in Mrs. Clements's throat, although of a dangerous description, it was found there were some hopes that she might survive, and no time was lost in conveying her to Guy's Hospital. Her account of the occurrence, as well as she could recollect, from the haste in which it was carried into effect, was that her husband had been complaining for some days of his head, and, being in arrear of rent to his landlord, it seemed to weigh very much on his mind; in the preceding night he awoke in a fright, and said to his wife that the officers were going to apprehend him, and asked her if she did not hear them in the lower part of his house. She endeavoured to reason with him on the groundlessness of his fears. When he subsequently returned from his employer's premises, and while she was engaged in toasting a piece of bread at the fire, he suddenly rushed upon her and drew the razor across her throat. She felt the blood trickling down her neck, and with an effort she rushed out of the room before he had time to repeat the act, and ran down stairs, where she sunk into the arms of the man Bond from loss of blood. The unfortunate deceased must have destroyed himself immediately after his wife escaped out of the room; for, when another lodger went into the apartment, he was found as above described, with his throat cut, and deluged in blood. It appears that the deceased had come up from the country about seven months ago with his family, and that he was considered a very sober and industrious man. He had no previous quarrel with his wife, with whom he lived on terms of affection, and as yet no cause can be assigned for having attempted her life, and then committed self-destruction, except that of a disordered imagination.

Clements is a native of Stourbridge. He is about 60 years of age. His wife is about the same age. He has been married thirty-five years, and had a large family. Two of his sons (the eldest of whom is about thirty years of age, and is a married man with a family,) are living at Hereford, where they work with Mr. Morgan, a woolstapler, who has also factories at Glasebury, in South Wales, and at Ross, in Herefordshire. The deceased man, Clements, also worked for Mr. Morgan, at the Glasebury establishment, where he continued for about fifteen or sixteen years, when being out of employment, and there being a demand for labour in London, he, with five others, was sent for to London, by the stewards of the Woolstaplers' Society (such being the custom of the trade club to those who are members of it). He arrived in the month of June last, and immediately afterwards obtained employment at Mr. Elkington's. He continued to work for him until about the month of October, when, trade becoming rather slack, he was again out of work. From that period to the 29th of last November he was a pensioner on the books of the club, receiving a weekly allowance from the society of 10s. From that day he has been in full work, earning upon a fair average from 25s. to 30s. a week, and consequently, being of sober habits, he was not in want of the comforts of life.

The poor woman is not considered out of danger, arising from the great loss of blood she has sustained, yet as no vital part appears to have been touched, hopes are entertained of her recovery. The wound ranges along the back of the neck, and is six inches in length and nearly one in depth. Several of the muscles and sinews are divided, but the cut has not reached the bone. From the manner in which the wound had been inflicted, it must have been given when she was in a stooping posture, as if she had been toasting some bread at the fire, and it would seem as if he had made a chop at her with the razor. He was sitting at the dinner table, behind him was a small bed, from which it is imagined that he obtained the razor whilst her back was turned towards him. The wretched man had received a very good education, and for a person in his station in life was remarkably well informed.

An inquest was on Thursday held at the Royal George Tavern, before Mr. Carter, on the body of the deceased man, Clements. The evidence substantially corroborated the above account. The principal additional facts were those stated by Mr. Elkington, by whom the deceased had been employed. Mr. Elkington said that deceased had for some time appeared exceedingly low and melancholy; and, upon reasoning with him, in order to arouse him from his lethargic state, he elicited from him that ever since the middle of last year, when he lost his daughter, to whom he was tenderly attached, he had suffered severely from nervous excitement, which quite unfitted him for labour, and on Saturday last deceased had actually called at the counting-house under this delusion, and stated to him (witness) that he could no longer think of robbing him, and therefore he begged to be discharged. Witness was of opinion that deceased had been of unsound mind since December last. The jury decided upon the following verdict—"That the deceased met with his death by his own act, being at the time in a state of unsound mind."

A WOMAN EXECUTED FOR MURDER AT IPSWICH.—On Saturday Mary Sheming, who was convicted at the late assize at Bury St. Edmunds, of the murder of her grandchild, paid the forfeiture of her life in front of the county gaol, at Ipswich. The particulars of the case appeared very recently in our paper. It was marked with peculiar atrocity. The culprit persisted in her own innocence, and alike charged her daughter Elizabeth with the murder, and then endeavoured to fix the guilt upon another daughter, named Matilda, who for some time has been a prisoner in the same gaol, under a conviction of larceny. On the Thursday she had a last interview with her husband and all her children. The meeting, strange as it may seem, was particularly affectionate on all sides; she manifested great emotion when she saw her daughter Caroline, with whom she exchanged forgiveness, but nothing passed to throw any additional light upon her guilt. The parting between her and Matilda was extremely painful; the shrieks of the latter were heard all over the prison upon being separated from her mother, who maintained extraordinary firmness, and appeared to pray heartily for her child's future welfare. About eleven o'clock the culprit walked with a firm step from her cell to the chapel, where she was engaged in prayer up to about ten minutes to twelve. She was asked several times whether she had any confession to make, and was solemnly warned that she had not many minutes to live. To all these questions, which were put in a compassionate tone, she replied firmly that she was innocent, but that she had repented of all her sins. The sad procession was then formed, the chaplain walking first, reading select portions from the burial service, followed by the culprit, who walked firmly, supported, however, by Calcraft, the executioner from Newgate, and by a female attendant; followed by the Under Sheriff and by two of the officers of the gaol. As the procession passed across the area from the door of the Governor's house to the lodge of the gaol, the wretched culprit sighed deeply, and exclaimed, "Oh, dear! oh, dear!" several times; but she otherwise continued remarkably firm. Upon being brought into the interior of the lodge she was seated on a stool, when the executioner prepared to tie her wrists with cord, and to pinion her arms; and here her firmness seemed, if possible, to increase, though surrounded by the awful paraphernalia of death. She ascended the staircase leading to the scaffold, assisted by the executioner and his attendant on either side, but betrayed not the slightest emotion as she took her station under the drop. As she was going up the steps a slight impediment arose from her gown getting entangled, and she contrived partially to shift the cap from her face. The rope having been adjusted, she was left alone on the platform, requiring no support, but keeping her position with a firmness that astonished all present. In this position she remained for about five minutes, whilst the chaplain offered up several impressive prayers. She appeared to make no response whatever, nor did she utter a word. The prayers being concluded, the platform fell, and, after a few struggles, the wretched culprit ceased to exist. The execution was witnessed by about 5000 or 6000 people, many of whom had come from considerable distances.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Since Monday large arrivals of English wheat have taken place, chiefly from Lincolnshire. To-day the show of samples of wheat of home produce was extensive, owing to which the demand for that article was exceedingly dull, at barely Monday's prices. In foreign wheat we heard of no sales worthy of notice. The demand for barley was very limited, and only the finest qualities were purchased at Monday's quotations. Malt was very difficult to sell, yet previous rates were supported. The supply of oats was again large, and a decline of 6d per quarter was submitted to by the factors. In other articles no alteration.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 7520; barley, 4080; oats, 2490 quarters. Irish: wheat, —; barley, 240; oats, 27860 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 200; barley, —; oats, 270 quarters. Flour, 5450 sacks; malt, 2640 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 39s to 47s; ditto, white, 44s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 32s to 34s; grinding barley, 25s to 27s; distilling, 29s to 30s; malting ditto, 29s to 32s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 60s to 61s; brown ditto, 55s to 58s; Kingston and Ware, 62s to 63s; Chevalier, 64s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 23s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 21s to 22s; ditto, white, 21s to 23s; tick beans, new, 36s to 37s; ditto, old, 40s to 42s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 36s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s, per quarter. Town made flour, 42s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 32s to 35s, per 28 lb. Foreign.—Fine wheat, 43s to 54s; Dantzig, red, 44s to 50s; white, 50s to 54s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s to 24s; oats, brew, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 15s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, American, 19s to —; Baltic, 18s to—, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—The arrivals of clover seed having been large, that article is heavy, at barely stationary prices. In other kinds of seeds we have no alteration to report.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d, per 4lb loaf.

Tea.—A moderate amount of business has been transacted in this market since our last while prices are steadily supported. No public sales are yet declared.

Sugar.—In West India sugar the transactions have been to a fair extent, while Mauritius and Bengal parcels are held at full currencies. Refined goods have gone off steadily, at 72s for brown and 73s for standard lumps.

Coffee.—Ceylon commands a steady sale at 52s to 52s 6d for good ordinary. West India coffee moves off freely, but in East India and foreign parcels we have very few transactions to notice.

Provisions.—Very large supplies of Irish butter having come to hand since our last report, the market has become much depressed, and easier terms have been accepted. Dutch butter is heavy, at 108s to 112s for the finest descriptions. Bacon is extremely dull, at an abatement of 1s per quarter. Waterford sizeable landed has sold at 43s to 45s. In lard very little doing, at 1s per cwt less money. Hams are again lower. Other kinds of provisions are about stationary.

Tallow.—The demand for all kinds of tallow is heavy, at further reduced rates. P.Y.C., on the spot, is selling at 39s 6d to 40s per cwt. The prices for the next three months are 39s 3d to 39s 6d per cwt. Town tallow, 41s to 41s 6d, net cash.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 10s; useful ditto, £4 12s to £5 4s; fine upland ditto, £5 5 to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 14s to £1 16s; wheat straw, £1 16s to £1 11s per load.

Hops (Friday).—Although the supply of hops on offer is comparatively small, only a moderate business is doing here, yet prices are steadily supported. Many of the holders are looking forward to higher rates. Sussex pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £6 18s to £7 10s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £8 0s to £9 10s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 12s; Mid Kent bags, £7 15s to £8 15s; East Kent ditto, £11 0s to £12 0s.

Coals (Friday).—Adairs', 19s; West Wylam, 20s; Hilda, 21s 3d; Caradoc, 23s 6d; Hetton, 24s; Adelaide, 22s 9d; Stewarts', 24s; Lambton, 24s per ton.

Wool.—English qualities are in good request, at full prices. Foreign and Colonial parcels are rather inactive, owing to the approaching public sales.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes being large, the demand has become somewhat inactive, at from £2 10s to £4 per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—Although the supply of beasts offering to-day, was but limited, the beef trade was in a very sluggish state, at a depression of quite 2d per 8lbs. We had on sale 12 beasts and 30 sheep from Holland, in very middling condition. For sheep—the numbers of which were small—the inquiry was somewhat active at fully Monday's quotations. Prime small calves sold readily, at an advance of 2d per 8lbs. Other qualities of veal were quite as dear. The pork trade was active, at higher rates. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £19 each.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 0d to 4s 2d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 8d to 3s 2d; second quality ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; large hogs, 3s 6d to 4s 2d; neat small porkers, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; sucking calves, 18s 0d to 30s 0d; and quarter old store pigs, 16s 0d to 28s 0d each. Beasts, 585; cows, 160; sheep, 2950; calves, 117; pigs, 375.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday.)—We had a steady demand for each kind of meat, at about Monday's quotations. Per 8lbs. by the carcass: Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 2s 6d to 3s 6d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 2d; middling ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 6d; small pork, 3s 8d to 4s 4d. ROBERT HERBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The commencement of the week was marked by an inclination to decline, both in Consols and Exchequer Bills, which arose from some speculative sales on the receipt of the Supplemental Message from the President of the United States. The jobbers, however, were much occupied with preparing for the Account, which is usually heavy at this period of the year, from the long closing of Consols. On Wednesday considerable flatness pervaded the market, and Exchequer Bills receded to 58 to 60, from the demand for money arising from the Settlement. The jobbers, the moment an inclination to decline was visible, began to sell; Exchequer Bills, and Consols, at one period receded to par. This fall was increased on Thursday, Consols quoting at one period 99¾, but ultimately improving to par, which is the closing price. The rumoured death of the Emperor Nicholas is not much credited, and has not affected prices. The final quotations are—Consols, par; Reduced Three per Cents, 100⅜ to ½; New Three and a Quarter per Cents, 103⅜; Bank Stock, 211½; Exchequer Bills, 57 to 59.

The flatness that affected the English market was felt in the Foreign House at the beginning of the week, the speculative securities all yielding a point, or being heavy at previous prices. Mexican has not materially altered upon the receipt of the news from Mexico, although the cause of Santa Anna is regarded as nearly hopeless if the accounts received are to be relied on. Some parties are inclined to think that the chances of a regular dividend will be increased by the election of a new President. It must, however, be remembered, that a civil war, of however short duration, exhausts the resources of a state, and a new government is always too much occupied with looking after its own interests, to pay much regard to the position of the bondholders here. The closing quotation is 34½ to ⅝, a price which it has quoted during the week. Spanish Actives advanced on Wednesday to 27½ to ¾; the Three per Cents, 37¼ to ½, but receded on the following day, so little reliance was felt on the budget of M. Mon. The closing quotations are:—Actives, 26⅞ to 27; Three per Cents, 37⅜; Brazilian quotes 90; Portuguese, 59; Chilian, 100⅜; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 63¼; Four per Cent Certificates, 98.

The Share Market has not been marked by any particular feature, the decision of the Board of Trade with reference to the Portsmouth lines excepted. This has given an impetus to South Western shares, which have risen to 81½, and the Eighths to 28, and the New to 10¼ pm. The settlement passed off easily, and the closing prices of the week are—Birmingham and Gloucester, 112; Bristol and Exeter, 77½; Caledonian, 4½; Cambridge and Lincoln, 3⅜; Chester and Holyhead, 5⅞; Churnet Valley, 4; Direct Northern, 2⅜; Eastern Counties, 16⅝; Great North of England (new), 27; Great Western, 170; Lancaster and Carlisle, 22⅜; Brighton, 50⅜; Greenwich, 11; Croydon, 17; Birmingham Stock, 228 to 230; Portsmouth Direct, ¼ dis; London and York, 3⅞; Lynn and Ely, 2⅜; Manchester and Leeds, 123; Midland Counties, 128; North Kent, 3¼; Norwich and Brandon, 14½; Richmond and West End Junction, 3⅜; Rugby, 1⅜; Dover, 42½; Great Northern of France, 5⅜; Paris and Rouen, 40⅜; Rouen and Havre, 24 to 25; Orleans, Tours, and Bordeaux, 8; Orleans and Vierzon, 10⅝.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The Bank of England have issued a notice which will doubtless supersede the usual quarterly notices put forth at the period of shutting for the dividends. The rate is as before, two-and-a-half per cent., and the period of repayment is limited to the 11th of April next. This is another instance of the intention of the Directors to enter the Money Market as competitors with the Joint Stock and private bankers. Consols improved yesterday towards the close of business, closing at par to ¼. There was no alteration of importance in the Foreign House. In the Share Market, Birmingham and Gloucester advanced to 112, but receded, and closed at 107½. Great Western also improved. South Western were done at 82, and closed at 80½.

M. JULLIEN'S FANCY DRESS BALL will take place on MONDAY, JANUARY 20th, 1845.—(The First of the kind ever given in Manchester.)—M. JULLIEN, in announcing the above BAL, begs most respectfully to draw the attention of the Nobility, Gentry, and Inhabitants of Manchester and its vicinity, to the very great approbation expressed by the visitors of his Two Bal Masques at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, and also his long experience in conducting such like soirees at the Academy Royal, Paris, and other places on the Continent.

The DECORATIONS will be in the same style as at M. Jullien's last Grand Bal Masque at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, which was universally pronounced, by the Press, as well as by the Visitors of the Bal, to be unequalled by any Public or Private Fete ever given in England.

The ORCHESTRA will consist of ONE HUNDRED MUSICIANS, including the Concert Orchestra, conducted by M. JULLIEN.

The Quadrilles, Waltzes, and Galops, will be arranged with every possible variety, while the New Mazurka and the Fascinating Polka lend additional interest to the Ball.

The Doors will be open at Half-past Eight. Dancing will commence at Half-past Nine. The Dances and arrangements of the Salle de Danse will be under the direction of Four Masters of the Ceremonies, with whose regulations M. Jullien respectfully intreats the compliance of the company, his wish being, alone, that of securing their comfort and convenience.

Admission to the Ball—Ladies' Tickets, 5s.; Gentlemen's, 7s. 6d.

 The Dress Circle will be set apart for spectators, who may thence enjoy the brilliant and unique scene. Price 4s. each.—The Dress Circle will have no communication with the Ball.

Tickets and Places can be obtained at all the Music-sellers, on and after Monday, January 13th, till the night of the Ball.—Further particulars will be duly announced.

JULLIEN'S CHIMES QUADRILLE is Now Published, and to be had at all respectable Music-sellers in the Kingdom. This Quadrille, founded on Charles Dickens', Esq., work, is considered one of the most original compositions of Jullien.

 Ask for Jullien's Chimes Quadrille, signed by the Author.

MR. GEORGE YATES has recommenced for the Season his CLASSES and INSTRUCTIONS in PERSONAL DEPORTMENT. Also, the present Mode of Dancing. A Class of Eight formed in a Private Family attended on school terms.—Letters addressed to St. Peter's, Hammersmith; or at Mr. Green's, 33, Soho-square.

JONES' £4 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset House. They comprise every modern improvement, and are warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week. THE BEST ALMANACK FOR 1845.
Now Publishing, 64 peges, handsome quarto, gilt edges (no Advertisements), with EIGHTY ENGRAVINGS!
Price One Shilling, the

ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK, and PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1845.

It contains a greater variety of Information and seasonable entertainment than is to be found in any other Almanack. The Wrapper is beautifully printed in colours; and the artistical execution of the entire Almanack entitles it to a place upon every drawing-room table in the empire.

The Press is universal in praise of this beautiful Almanack.

EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best Illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.

"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the Calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post Nov. 20.

"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries; and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 15.

"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets, as they will be visible in the ensuing year are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.

"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood-cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 17.

"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical observations, and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this 'Illustrated Almanack' is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy. —Era, Nov. 24.

"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the foolish alma nacks of times that are passing away—and, we may add, one of the most successful. It is filled with illustrations, some of which, representing the signs of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardeners' Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper."—Gardeners' Chronicle.

"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. T illustrations are very beautiful. Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

CHRISTMAS FESTIVITIES.—At this peculiar season of festivity and mirth, when friends and lovers assemble at the social board, or whirl in the giddy mazes of the dance, both sexes are more than usually desirous of shining in personal attraction, and devote a greater share of attention to the toilet; it is at this particular season that the Virtues and Singularly Happy Properties of those Auxiliaries of Personal Beauty, ROWLAND'S UNIQUE PREPARATIONS, shine pre-eminent in their power; while the rich luxuriant tress, the white and swan-like neck, and the pearly set of teeth, form admirable trophies of their Inestimable Qualities! The August Patronage conceded by our Gracious Queen, and the several Sovereigns of Europe, together with the Beauties which adorn the circles of Princely and Regal magnificence; and the confirmation by experience of the infallible efficacy of these creative renovating Specifics, have characterised them with perfection, and given them a celebrity unparalleled. They have proved the theme of the poet; they are celebrated in the periodical literature of the whole civilised world; the lays of Byron; and the voice of the universal press, have proclaimed the incomparable virtues of the "Oil Macassar," and of its accompanying preparations. As presents for both sexes none can be more recommendatory, or more now in general use.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL is a Delightfully Fragrant and Transparent Preparation for the Hair! and as an invigorator and beautifier, is beyond all precedent. It bestows the most brilliant gloss, together with a strong tendency to curl.—Price 3s. 6d.; 7s.; Family Bottles (equal to four small), 10s 6d.; and double that size, 21s. per bottle.

ROWLAND'S KALYDOR is an Odoriferous Creamy Liquid—the only safe and efficacious preparation for dissipating every Imperfection of the Skin. The radiant bloom it imparts to the Cheek, and the softness and delicacy it induces on the Hands, Arms, and Neck, render it indispensable to every toilet —Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included.

ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, a White Powder, compounded of the rarest and most fragrant exotics. It bestows on the Teeth a Pearl-like Whiteness, frees them from Tartar, and imparts to the Gums a healthy firmness, and to the Breath a grateful sweetness and perfume.—Price 2s. 9d. per box, duty included.

CAUTION.—Unprincipled Shopkeepers, for the sake of gaining a trifle more profit, vend the most Spurious Compounds under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty). It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the word "ROWLAND'S" is on the Wrapper of each Article. For the protection of the public from fraud and imposition, the Hon. Commissioners of her Majesty's Stamps have authorised the Proprietors' Signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus—

A report of the death of the Emperor of Russia reached London on Thursday last; it was not given as authentic, and in all probability will prove to be a mere rumour. It nevertheless sufficed to attract public attention to the family of the Emperor, and particularly to the Grand Duke, the heir to the throne. Leaving the intelligence to be confirmed or disproved by the lapse of the very few days, which is all that will be necessary to do so, we have thought it a fit occasion to give the accompanying sketches, and a few particulars of the junior branches of the Imperial Family, which are not generally known. The heir to the Russian throne is Alexander Nicholas, Cæsarewitch, and Hereditary Grand Duke of Russia. He was born on the 29th of April, 1818. He has been carefully educated, and is well trained in his father's system, but it may be doubted if he will inherit his father's energy. The second son, Constantine, was born on the 21st of September, 1827; Nicholas, a third son, was born 8th of August, 1831; the fourth son, Michael, on the 25th October, 1832. They have all the rank of Grand Dukes. The Emperor has, besides, two daughters, the Grand Duchess Maria, born Aug. 18, 1819; she was married to the Duke of Leuchtenberg. The Emperor was fondly attached to her, and when she died in September last, his grief was so excessive as to incapacitate him for a long period for business; in fact, it is the debility consequent on this attack of illness that has given rise to the present report of his death. The Grand Duchess of Olga is his youngest daughter: she was born on 11th September, 1822. The Marquis de Custine says that both the sisters were remarkable for their beauty, and were the greatest attractions of the Russian Court. The Duchess Olga is still unmarried, as it is said she does not wish to be separated from her family. The Empress Alexandra is daughter of the late and sister of the present King of Prussia. She was born on the 13th of July, 1798. The family name of the Emperor of Russia is Romanzoff.

The Theatre and Assembly-rooms at Berwick-upon-Tweed have been destroyed by fire. The theatre was built in 1782, by J. Porter, Esq.: many eminent performers have appeared on it. Commencing with Kemble, there have followed G. F. Cooke, Master Betty, Macready, Grimaldi, Clara Fisher, T. P. Cooke, and a host of others. The Assembly-room was of modern construction, having been formed about 1826. The origin of the fire has not been ascertained.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"A Subscriber."—It is termed Scholar's Mate, because it is the first mate the scholar is taught to avoid.

"Gambit."—We believe it was when the Westminster Chess Club was first established that the rule became paramount. When your Pawn reaches its eighth square you may claim any lost piece you wish.

"A Lover of Chess."—Refer to the solution, and you will see that the King moves to Rook's 3rd, and not to B 3rd.

"R. R."—We perceive no error.

"X. Y. O."—It is a drawn game.

"E. G. P."—The French are fond of playing the Q P 2, Queen's Gambit, and other branches of the K P 1 game. It is an opening susceptible of great variety.

"Jwenis."—We shall be glad to receive his assistance. The club in Paris is superior to any of our clubs, inasmuch as it can boast a greater number of first-rate players. The English are, however, superior to the French in coolness and caution. Mr. Staunton possesses these requisites of a fine player in an eminent degree. We cannot promise, as yet, the list of English and foreign players.

"A. J. L."—The King cannot move to B 3rd.

"R. S. B."—After this, we must decline playing other people's games. It is hardly fair.

Problems have been received from "R. Dudding," "Eidobanne," "C. Wood," "Sundry whereof," and "H. Taylor."

Will "J. S.," of Bolton, send us the solution of his last problem. We believe the mate can be deferred a move.

We are sorry to inform our readers, that the proposed match between Mr. Staunton and M. St. Amant is postponed sine die. Mr. Staunton, who still feels very weak, will not consent to give St. Amant his revenge, unless they play in a private room, in the presence only of the appointed seconds. To this arrangement M. St. Amant would not agree, consequently the match is broken off, and Mr. Staunton has returned to London. We are inclined to think that our worthy champion is right not to risk his well earned reputation, and we advise him to keep quiet for some little time. Chess, above all other games, requiring that great blessing, mens sana in corpore sano.

A match by correspondence has just commenced between Marseilles and Algiers.

The match between Paris and Pesth, is likely to end in favour of the Hungarian players. M. Szen, the Hungarian, who is a splendid player, directs the moves on the part of the Pesth game.

General Guingret, the much-respected President of the Chess Club in Paris, died on Sunday last. This loss will be severely felt in the Cercle des Echecs.

Solution in our next.

According to an account from Bruck, in Styria, of the 25th ult., a person employed at one of the signal stations on the railroad from Bruck to Gloggnitz was murdered, and his body laid across the rails, in order that, on the arrival of the first train, it might have passed over the body, and that it might appear the man had fallen a victim to his own imprudence. The engineer, however, fortunately perceived the body, and stopped the train. The director of police at Gloggnitz was sent for, and this functionary, on opening the man's house, found that it had been plundered of every article of value. The destruction of an entire train, which appears to have been one of the objects of the miscreants, would have been accomplished had they forgotten to hoist the signal flag.

The boy Jones, of palace-loving notoriety, is in Greece, and has tried to see the King. The following is an extract of a letter from an officer on board her Majesty's ship Warspite, Smyrna, Dec. 23, 1844:—"The boy Jones, who belongs to this ship, disappeared one night at Athens, and every one said he was gone to call on King Otho. I believe that was his intention, as he was found near the palace, and brought back, very much disappointed to think he could not pay his intended visit. He is a strange-looking fellow, appears half asleep, and seldom speaks to any one. It is the custom to punish when a man deserts, but Jones is put on the black list, and his grog stopped as long as he remains in the ship.

THE POST OFFICE VAN, CALLING AT THE OFFICE OF THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Well! here we are, and who shall say
That through this British nation
Our art-gem'd paper, crown'd with sense
Has not made a sens-ation?

We're always News—yet ever old—
Antiquity takes pains
To date our very office from St. Clement, and the Danes!

The Danes! pooh! never mind the Danes!
A bus without a tax on,
Has pulled up at our office door
For us to pile our Sacks-on!

Yes! week by week that Royal coach
Comes for us "two in han',"
And that they mayn't be in ar-rear
Victoria sends her Van!

And there's quite a row in the alphabet
On every Friday, when
The V. I. R. comes driving up
To fetch the I. L. N.!

The only contradiction is,
When pulling up this way,
With "Are you ready?"—we say "Yes,"
And the horses, they say "Neigh."

Forgive the quadrupeds their joy
You bipeds, and behold
What a lot of papers must be bought
When such a lot are sold!

And mark this! lotteries are not crushed,
For if they are, pray what's
The use of that van's going off
Without it's drawing lots!

Ah, sometimes 'tis good fun to see
The quizzing people scoff,
At the guards getting in their bags
That they may bundle off!

You see our modesty is such,
We turn ourselves off—whack!
At shortest notice—and that way
Do give ourselves the sack!

"How do you reach the country, pray?"
"Do you that question broach?
Why, Sir, we go by ream, by quire—
By railway, and by coach!"

"As quick as railway?"—"Quicker, Sir!
Nay, rail not—spare your smiles;
We send at least 5000 NEWS
To every Fifty Miles!"

We're taken all the world throughout,
Whatever class you sift;
And here the very Queen's own van
Is giving us a lift!

Fame built us a new Temple up,
And ever since she sported it,
By what a host of columns, Sir,
Has not the NEWS supported it!

To set the Thames on fire was deemed
A wondrous thing by us;
But we last week packed up and put
The River in a Bus!

And that same van which now you see,
Is loaded and a going,
Will, through the ILLUSTRATED NEWS,
O'er England set it flowing!

Still let no inundation-dread
Fright district—village—town;
Believe us, long as we can swim,
Our readers shall not drown!

And swim we must—so full and fast
The thirsty public drink us——
Swim! we believe you—what on earth,
We ask, could ever sink us!

Some of our readers may be interested in the following calculations of our last week's numbers:—

The Papers placed separately would reach 678 miles 672 yards, exceeding the distance from the Land's-end to John O'Groats.

The Weight of Water absorbed in the process of wetting . 4 tons. 9 cwt. 3lb.

The Weight of Printed Paper . 30 tons 10 cwt. 51 lbs.

The Paper would cover a surface of 367,468 sq. yards. 10 ft. 32 in., or 75 acres 4468 sq. yds.

Cut into slips of one inch, would reach round the Earth, a distance of about 24,000 miles.

Excise Duty paid on the Paper £365

Duty for Penny Stamps 1250

The whole cost of the Print alone was upwards of £2000

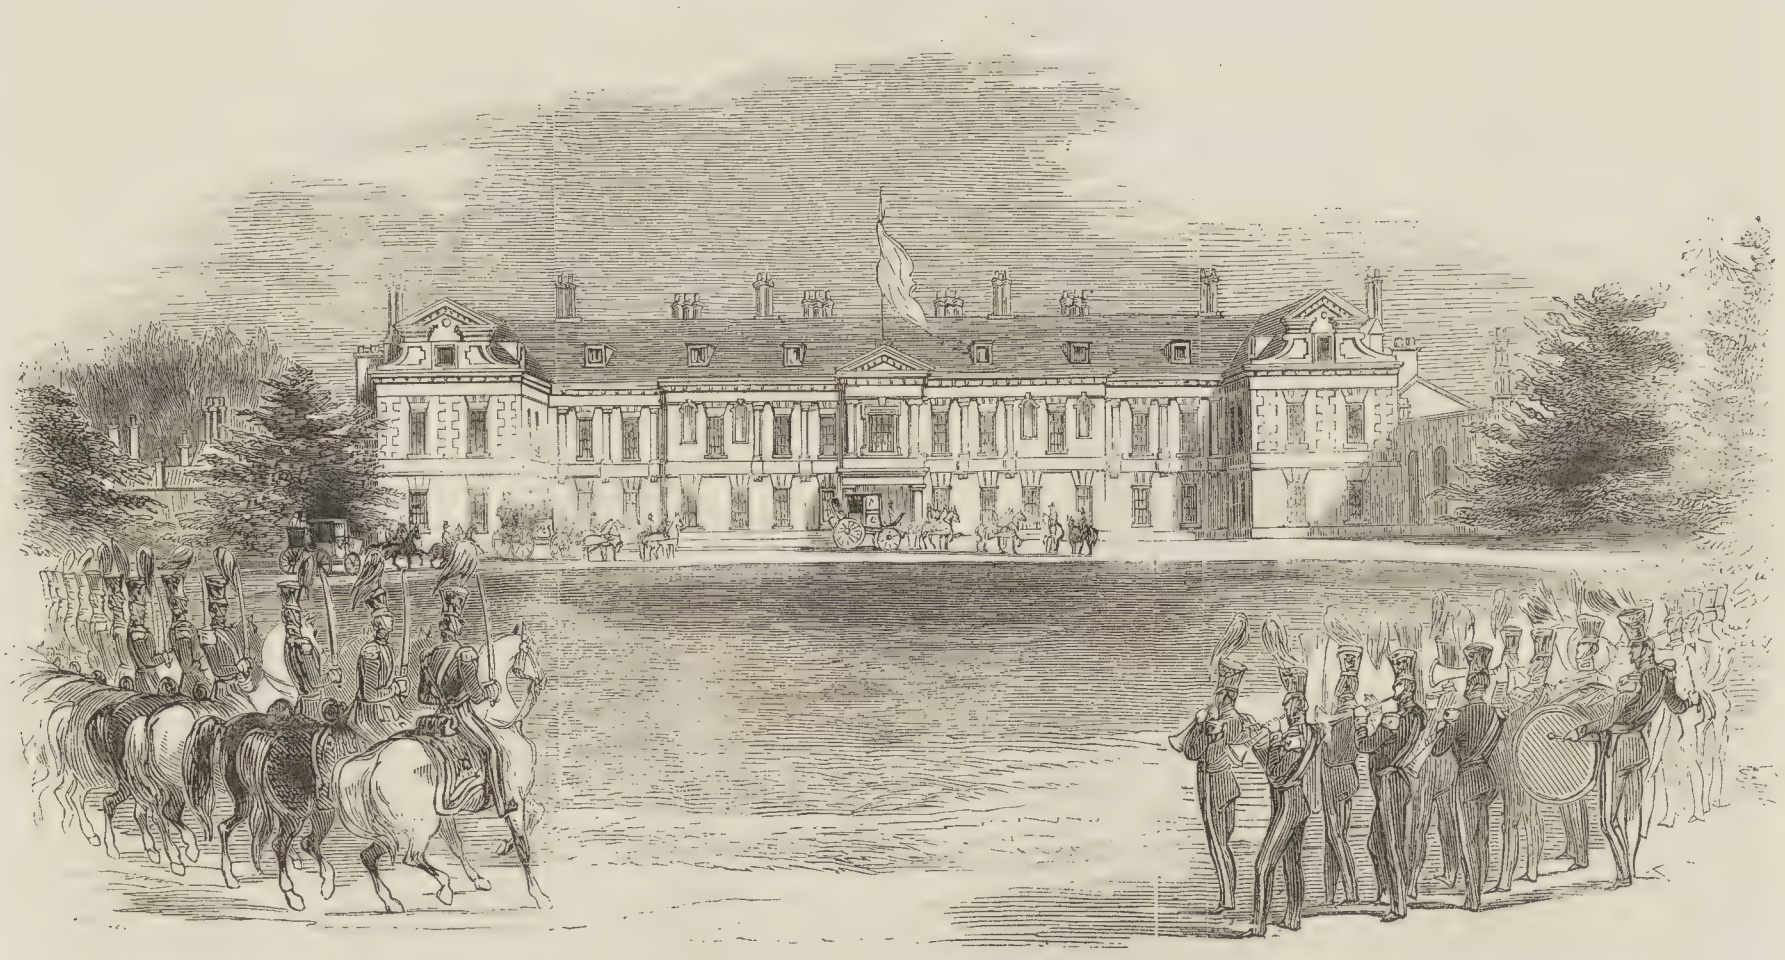
ENVY AND IMITATION.



NOTHING so much proves the great influence of England among the nations of the world than the continual efforts made by every power either to injure us or imitate us. One or the other they all seem bound to attempt; the ill success of the endeavour only proves their want of ability, not the lack of inclination.

We need not allude to the ravings of the war party of France, that hates England with an intensity second only to that with which it pursues M. Guizot, because he reasons with some amount of common sense on the subject; nor need we adduce the hostile Tariffs of America, nor the barriers raised against our commerce by the policy of the German Zollverein; what recommends them is their supposed efficacy in checking the influence of England. The politicians of Europe paint us in debates, journals, and reviews as a nation of Machievels, ever intent on the two greatobjects—wealth and dominion—using fraud or force indifferently, and engaged in plotting when not actually occupied in plundering. As to the Government it is a concentration of all the activity and wickedness of the people, using fleets, armies, and slave trade treaties as so many engines of political and commercial aggrandisement. They cannot believe that a nation can become great, or keep its supremacy, without recourse to fraud or violence, or both; and meeting the flag of England on every sea, and feeling her influence in every land, they ascribe her power and wealth to causes which not only have not gained them, but which if put in practice as a system, would soon weaken one and waste the other. It is almost ludicrous to remark the terror which continental writers feel or affect, of England. Yet the truth is that we are a peace-loving people, not by any means disposed to meddling with the affairs of others, having enough business of our own, and too happy, if we can plough and weave, and buy and sell, and feed our millions, and pay our taxes quietly—tasks not always done without much difficulty. Except when actually assailed, our policy towards foreign nations has been one of good natured indifference rather than of imperious dictation. When the French chose to dethrone Charles X. we approved their spirit by recognising the new ruler; we made no opposition to their occupation of Algiers, which, if it has become a disgrace and difficulty to them is not our fault but their own. The French Ministry has intrigued in Spain to its heart's content; it cannot be said that England has checked it. The French fleet bombarded Tangier, and except some professional criticisms as to the manner in which it was done, our neighbours had nothing to complain of as to our conduct in the affair. They have roused a vindictive spirit of revenge in Tahiti, but here again it is not our fault that the natives do not appreciate the blessing of French civilisation, which always comes in such a questionable shape, that, as by a common instinct, both the Arab and the Tahitian resist it to the death. Yet in the face of undoubted facts, we are represented abroad as the great troublers and disturbers of the peace and repose of the world.

The charge is ridiculous, but there is one thing even still more so; along with this rooted dislike, England is the object of the most servile imitation.

The proofs of this abound; not content with their immense military force, so suited to the national character and position, the French are continually urging on their rulers to create a great navy, merely because England possesses one. They make the not uncommon mistake of confounding effects with causes. We have a great navy because we have a vast commerce, and extensive colonies, that create a mercantile marine unrivalled in the world; for these alone can a large naval force be required, and from these alone can it be created, supplied, and maintained. The French have not these, but wish to have what springs from them; they will possess the sign if they cannot possess the thing signified. But there is a still stronger instance of the rage of the continental nations for imitating England. France may to some extent be justified for her wish to rival us; we are near neighbours, she has a long line of sea coast both on the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, and she has a past history not without records of naval power. But now it seems Germany must have a national fleet! Germany, that occupies the greater part of the centre of Europe, and whose only coast-line is of limited extent, and that on an inland sea—the Baltic—must erect itself into a naval power! Nay, some steps have been already taken towards effecting it; fleets and ships being wanting, they have procured the next thing to them—a flag! It is the old imperial ensign, the black and golden eagle, which is also the standard of Austria. The journal which announces the plan of a German navy with an enthusiasm that does not appear to doubt the possibility of its own scheme, is published hundreds of miles from the ocean!

We know that there is a growing desire in Germany for a closer union among the different states of what was once the empire, but which is now cut up and divided into numerous states, some large and powerful like Austria and Prussia, others so small as scarcely to exceed a tolerably large landed estate. The Diet of the Confederation has, it is said, agreed on a national flag, to be borne by all the military contingents furnished by the several states when serving together, and by all vessels belonging to German port. This regulation is prompted by the same spirit as that in which the Customs Union was formed. But the jealousy of England and the determination to rival her if it be only by imitation on a scale ridiculously small, break out in the attempt of an inland people to make themselves a naval power. Maritime greatness has in all ages been determined by natural position, which has of course an effect also on national character. Tyre and Sidon, Carthage, Venice, Spain, and Portugal (in the days of their greatness) were all favourably situated for becoming maritime and trading cities or countries; more than all of them, England, by her insular position, has these advantages. America too, must become a great maritime power. But the same cannot be predicted of the German Empire, whose land-locked millions must seek national greatness in other directions. They may change the military contingency that Hanover, and Bremen, and Hamburgh, and Oldenburg now furnish, into a certain number of ships; they may fit out a fleet upon paper, but the German people are, and will remain, an inland and non-maritime nation. They may raise armies, as they have done before, and maintain a stout struggle with some future Napoleon, who may seek to extend the dominion of France beyond the Rhine, but they will in vain seek a supremacy on the ocean; even a rivalry with those powers who have already attained naval greatness is to them impossible.

Individuals frequently mistake their own capabilities, and it would seem that nations are not exempt from the same infirmity. Russia, scarcely more than a century removed from absolute barbarism, adopts the language and literature of what was the most refined and elegant Court of Europe. France, with an immense army and a military history almost unrivalled for the greatness of its triumphs, desires a navy, which she has neither the material to supply, nor the possessions to employ; and Germany, with still less capability than France, indulges in the same dream; because England having such an arm is great, they must have it also! Better far would it be if each nation followed its own peculiar bent, and worked out that purpose for which circumstances have most adapted it. What the thoughtful Dante says of the impolicy of forcing the dispositions of individuals to duties unsuited to them, may with but slight change apply also to nations and communities, and it would be well if his principle were borne in mind:—

> Nature ever,
> Finding discordant fortune, like all seed
> Out of its proper climate, thrives but ill;
> And were the world below content to mark
> And work on the foundations Nature lays,
> It would not want supply of excellence.
> But ye, perversely, to religion strain
> Him who was born to gird him with the sword,
> And of the fluent phraseman make your King;
> Therefore, your steps have wander'd from the path.

When a nation wholly unfitted by its position, and the character of its people, for maritime pursuits, strives to erect itself into a naval power, it does not "work on the foundations Nature lays," and the result will prove how greatly her steps "have wandered from the path."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The Parisians at this moment live only by candle light. Their lives are passed betwixt concerts, balls, routs, music and dancing, and none of those who profess to belong to the beau monde, think of rising from their beds before dinner time, or retiring to them before morning—hardly before sunrise. The Court has this year given an example which all eagerly follow. Louis Philippe's last ball was magnificent; 4000 invitations had been issued. The dresses of the ladies present were peculiary splendid. The profusion of diamonds was remarkable; nevertheless two princesses, the Princess de Joinville and the Duchess d'Aumale, bore away the palm. Two suppers were served on the occasion, one in the Dinner gallery, at which the Duchess de Nemours with infinite grace presided; and the other laid out in the salle de spectacle, where the Queen herself did the honours. These apartments, whose dazzling light was reflected by the sparkle of jewels—the long tables covered with every costly and exquisite viand, surrounded by 800 ladies, in the most brilliant costumes—presented a scene of unusual magnificence. The Arab chiefs were here, as every where, the object of general curiosity and interest. Their presence is now de rigueur in every fashionable assembly, so that the Parisians say that "where there is a réunion of five Frenchmen, two of them are sure to be Moors." Their poetical highflown compliments and enthusiasic devotion to the fair sex, render them especial favourites with the ladies. At this ball, their popularity, if possible, increased; for, during supper, a madrigal of the composition of one of their number was handed round. Its style fully bespoke its Turkish origin, and it expressed the gallant regret that the French had not sent an army of ladies instead of soldiers to conquer Algeria, for then the victory would have been immediate and bloodless. The brilliant and unwonted hospitality of the Duke de Nemours gives occasion for much comment; and it is insinuated that by means of good dinners, where the representatives of each shade of political opinion are indiscriminately invited, and brilliant balls, where the Parisian élégantes, half coquettes, half politicians, may shine, the future Regent hopes to win popularity, and thus to procure that dotation, which all the efforts, address, and power of the Government have failed to obtain.

Macready has, up to the last moment, enjoyed increasing vogue in Paris. Hamlet, however, that most difficult and philosophical of all the creations of your great Poet, has enjoyed by far the greatest portion of public favour, thus affording another illustration of the truth, that men always admire most what they can least comprehend. It has been again given at Court, where it was quite amusing to see all the audience with the English translation on their laps, studying as intently as if they had been at school. The "Day after the Wedding," a translation from "La Jeune Femme Colère," followed. In this amusing little piece, Mdlle. Plessey took the part of the heroine, the Gallican accent of the pretty actress only giving, in the opinion of her numerous admirers, a new charm to her performance. The day after, the English actors took their leave of the French public in "Romeo and Juliet," amidst much enthusiasm. Miss Helen Faucit was covered with showers of bouquets—it was quite an arduous task to pick them up, and Romeo stood by contemplating her exertions without an offer of assistance, with a sang froid which astonished and amused the Parisians.

The example of the Court is of course followed by the Ministers and Ambassadors. At all the official abodes the sounds of Mazurka and Polka strive with each other for mastery. The Countess d' Appony gives alternately a ball and a rout; the Prefect of the Seine does the same. A remarkable phenomena is said to have taken place at the last ball given at the prefecture. The rooms were crowded, the heat was intense, and so large a quantity of electricity was emitted from the room, that, passing through the vaulted ceiling of the saloons, which is of iron, it was discharged on the outside in sparks of fire. The Faubourg St. Germain is not behind-hand in the gaieties of the season; two splendid balls have been given by the Princess de La Tremouille and the Marquis de Villars. Our foreign visitors, above all, add more than their share to the tide of festivity. The splendid receptions of the Countess de Basoumowska, a Russian lady of noble family, are eagerly resorted to by all the fashionables, but the English residents, more numerous than any others, surpass them also in their splendid hospitality and their thirst for amusement. The project of private theatricals at Lady Cowley's, occupies much attention, as well as those to be given by Mrs. Thorn, at her splendidly-furnished hotel. The houses of Mrs. Macnamara, Mrs. Tudor, and Mrs. Goold, are resorted to with the greatest eagerness. The luxury and splendour displayed by your fair countrywomen, forms a source of astonishment even in this capital, to which the representatives of every nation bring their tributes, and where they vie with each other in magnificence.

The Grand Opera here, which has recourse to every expedient that promises to bring funds to its empty treasury, has produced, by way of a novelty, a corps de ballet, which looks like an arrival from Lilliput. Thirty-six little girls, the eldest twelve years, the youngest five years of age, the pupils of Madame Weiss, mistress of the ballet, at the theatre of Josephstadt, at Vienna, all arranged, "in gradation just," execute pas d'ensemble with remarkable precision. Not one of the tiny feet is a second behind its fellows. The performance is concluded by a curtsey to the audience, simultaneously executed by the whole troupe. Within two or three days, three of the youngest of the unfortunate little beings have been stolen, and the police are endeavouring to trace the perpetrators of the deed. The poor children are totally helpless; they cannot speak French, and hardly their own language.

The first of M. Berlioz's concerts, which I mentioned to you last week, has taken place, but it is likely also to be the last. The performers were more numerous than the audience, and whilst the former were occupied in creating a clamour and din, in which neither the faintest approach to method or melody could be traced, the latter were yawning and stopping their ears.

Amongst the other squabbles which are constantly agitating the world, you have, doubtless, heard of the enmity existing between those two champions of the opposing styles of literature—M. Saint Marc Girardin and Victor Hugo. This latter entertains a profound grudge against his rival for the unsparing criticism with which he, as professor of the Sorbonne, has visited his works. Great were the expectations of amusement, therefore, with which the Parisians crowded to the Institut the other day. M. St. Girardin was to pronounce the customary oration, and Victor Hugo had been selected to answer it. The speech of M. de Girardin concluded, Victor Hugo rose, and after slightly touching upon the subject of that day's consideration, proceeded in a fluent but somewhat bombastic strain, to speak of "the mission of the poet, the sacredness of his calling"—placing him on a level with the priest or the magistrate, and concluded by denouncing, as almost impious, those who would dare to infringe an inviolability so sacred.

FRANCE.

The debate on the Address in the Chamber of Peers is concluded; the Ministerial majority was 75; the numbers being, for the address, 114; against it, 39. Just before it closed, the Duke de Broglie made a very eloquent and effective defence of the Ministry for the course taken in regard to Morocco. Most of the Parisian journals speak in favourable terms of this appeal of the Duke de Broglie.

The Address agreed to by the Chamber of Peers was presented to the King on Sunday. The answer given by his Majesty was as follows:—

"Gentlemen,—It is pleasing to me to receive in this address new testimonials of the sentiments of which the Chamber of Peers has given me so many proofs. This signal approbation of the line of policy which we have followed with so much perseverance and success, will facilitate its continuance. In appreciating as you do the favourable disposition which enabled my Government to re-establish with that of the Queen of Great Britain that happy accord which had already preserved the world from so many dangers, you give new pledges for the stability of general peace, and of the gradual increase of the prosperity which our country now enjoys. I thank Providence for permitting that my children should have proved themselves worthy of the sentiments you have expressed towards them. The affection of France for my family and me is the sweetest recompense I can obtain for my labours and our entire devotion."

Much interest has been excited in Paris by the trial of a band of thieves, known as la bande des habits noirs, from the members of it being dressed in black. It consisted of nine individuals under the command of a chief named Mack, who during the last few years have committed numerous burglaries in Paris and its vicinity. The trial lasted several days, and in the course of it twenty-seven burglaries, varying in amount from 200,000f. to 100,000f. were proved against the gang. The band was regularly organised, having agents in different parts of Paris, and the feats of skill and dexterity related of its chief members rival those of a Cartouche or Jack Sheppard. Three were acquitted for want of proof; the others were all found guilty. Mack was sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment with hard labour; the others to various terms of imprisonment and labour, from fifteen to four years. Mack has since appealed against his sentence.

The debate on the Address commenced in the Chamber of Deputies on Monday. Five deputies spoke on that day—Messrs. Gustave de Beaumont, de Tocqueville, and Marie against the Address, and Messrs. Liadieres and Gasparin in support of the Government. The discussion presented but little interest. The speech of M. de Tocqueville is the only one deserving of particular notice, and even this is more on account of his reputation as a writer than for the intrinsic merit it displayed. M. de Tocqueville, after observing that, if, as the Ministerial party asserted, a coalition existed, M. Guizot had set the example of it by his memorable league with the "Centre Gauche" and "Gauche," against Count Molé, attacked the foreign policy of the Cabinet, and especially the policy pursued towards this country, which he pronounced neither firm nor dignified. Yet he considered a war with England a great calamity, and honoured and esteemed the English people "because he knew them." M. de Tocqueville maintained that an alliance with us might be useful under certain circumstances, such as immediately after the Revolution of 1830, but that it should never be a permanent alliance. Both nations had, indeed, free institutions, but they had not the same objects in view. The vital object of France was to make those institutions triumph in Europe, and that of England was quite the reverse. France was the head and heart of democracy, whilst in England, aristocracy and the ancient state of Europe prevailed. Hence the institutions of the two countries were in principle quite at variance.

M. de Tocqueville gave this opinion of the condition of England:—

"I think it should be ever present to the thoughts of those who treat with her—England requires, in order to live, that all the markets of the world be open; and, to secure the supplying of all those markets, she must be mistress of the sea; she must not only be powerful, she must be all-powerful; she must not only command, she must reign. Such is the real situation of England. Thus, when you ask England to open you a market, even the smallest, she is obliged to deny it. Be as eager towards her as you please, she will refuse. Make all the concessions of amour propre you please, you will obtain nothing. What! you will say, England, that reigns over so many markets, cannot let you have that of Belgium! No, she cannot. What! England, that occupies whole continents in Oceania, cannot let you quietly occupy there two petty islands! No, she cannot. She, that possesses a large portion of Asia, cannot relinquish to you the inhospitable coast of Africa! No, she cannot; and never will. When, therefore, you demand of England a reciprocity of interests, you demand something that the ablest statesmen of this country have never hoped to obtain; you pursue a chimera; and I could assert, without his having done me the honour of telling me so, that, on this point, the Minister for Foreign Affairs is of my opinion with a nation that requires to be, not powerful, but all-powerful. Intimate and efficient friendship can exist but on the condition of renouncing those things in which it wishes and must be all-powerful."

M. de Tocqueville concluded by declaring that alliances were useful only in times of "action;" that they only served to obstruct an independent policy when peace prevailed, and that this had been fully proved by the concessions and sacrifices which the Ministry had throughout made in order to secure the friendship of England.

On Tuesday the debate was resumed. After a temperate speech from M. Peyramont, in vindication of the Government, M. Thiers arose, amidst marked attention, and immediately entered into a consideration of the conduct of the Cabinet in the Morocco affair. The success of the war, he admitted, had been brilliant, both on sea and land; it had been inevitable and necessary. He merely objected to the treaty, which offered no serious results. He did not mean that the payment of a few millions should have been stipulated for, but the negotiators should have insisted on some guarantees being conceded which would render it impossible for the Emperor to recommence the war. Any extension of the frontier of Algeria on the side of Morocco would be a great fault; but how was France to punish any new agression on that side, if she could not seize on any of its provinces? M. Thiers here paid a tribute of praise to Marshal Bugeaud and the Prince de Joinville for the ability of their operations, but the Government, he said, was alone to blame for the sterility of their results, since it had neglected to furnish them with means of doing more. The Marshal had only a handful of men, and was unable to advance upon Fez. The naval means were equally deficient, and the Prince de Joinville had been obliged to evacuate the island of Mogadore, for want of provisions and troops indispensable for occupying the town. It was not in consequence of the difficulties offered by the season that the treaty had been so hastily concluded; it was owing to the apprehension of new complications with England. France had made England the judge of her grievances, which the latter had pronounced to be well-founded, and it appeared, even by the documents seized after the victory of Isly, that she recommended the Emperor to satisfy them. France was consequently at the time in a favourable condition to obtain an advantageous peace. But then she was engaged in one of the most serious complications with England; the young diplomatist who represented her in London described in terms of great emotion the dangers of the position, and insisted on speedy satisfaction being given by France. The Ministry, in their alarm, had then seen the necessity of throwing the heavy baggage overboard, and on the 29th and 30th of August, within an interval of twenty-four hours, satisfaction was granted to Lord Aberdeen for the treatment of Mr. Pritchard at Tahiti, and directions were forwarded to its negotiators at Cadiz to insist only on the redress of the four grievances which France complained of previous to the commencement of hostilities, and to conclude peace at any price. All these concessions, he maintained, had been made under the impression caused by the complication of Tahiti, and the interests of France in Morocco had been sacrificed to that consideration. M. Thiers then referred to the question of Tahiti, in which he accused Ministers of having blindly compromised the interests of the country. He then proceeded to vindicate the conduct of Admiral Dupetit Thouars and Messrs. Bruat and d'Aubigny, and disapprove the censure passed on their acts by the Government. The latter alone, who should have been aware of the danger which so injudicious a step would occasion, were to blame. Had the English force stationed at Tahiti been equal to that of France, a collision would certainly have occured between them, and the Ministry would have been unable to save the peace of the world.

The Débats states that at the ball and supper given at the Tuileries, seats apart were reserved for the Arabs, whence they could command a view of the whole of the gorgeous scene. Struck with the sight, the poet of the party said to M. Roche—"You had no need to embark so many soldiers to conquer us—it would have been quite sufficient had you sent only one-half of these beautiful ladies to subdue us."

The Paris papers state that the Duchess de Nemours is likely soon to increase the number of her family.

SPAIN.

There is nothing of consequence from Spain. The Chamber of Deputies at Madrid is engaged in discussing the Clergy Dotation Bill.

The Queen-Mother communicated, on the 15th, to the members of the Committee on the Estimates, the fact of her marriage with M. Munoz.

An election for a deputy for Madrid has commenced in that city. It seemed probable that M. Galvano, the ministerial candidate, would be elected.

PORTUGAL.

We have letters from Lisbon of the 15th inst. The Chamber of Deputies has been occupied in discussing the bill for the abolition of the foreign Conservatorial Courts, but the bill has not yet been passed. Many amendments were moved. The shares of the parties who took the tobacco contract in September last, do not appear to go off, but seem to be a drug in the market. A fracas of an unusual and disgraceful kind took place in the theatre of the Rua das Condes, Lisbon, on the evening of the 9th instant. A Mr. Donaldson was announced to sing several comic songs, English and Irish. Mr. Donaldson was described in the announcements as an Irish comic singer. But whatever his vocal powers or pretensions to comic humour might be, he certainly met with neither fair play nor considerate treatment. He was hissed, hooted, and pelted, not with the projectiles only that used formerly to come from the one shilling galleries of some of our theatres—not only orange peel, but oranges were flung in profusion at the foreign actor, and not only oranges, but potatoes. The latter missiles came from the boxes—or, to speak more correctly, from a box—where a sprig of nobility, surrounded by his associates of the haut ton of his circle—a small one, be it added, in this community—appear to have come duly prepared to make war on the Irish actor. The sport of the young gentlemen was attended with consequences that were not expected, the loud expression of disgust and indignation at their conduct on the part of the foreigners of all nations in the house, and of a large portion of the respectability of the Portuguese who were present. A French gentleman, of Irish extraction, an officer in the Portuguese service, of the name of De Burgh, was the first person who remonstrated with the gentlemen in the box who took the leading part in this brutal attack on a stranger. He tendered his cards to the gentlemen en masse, and the offer was responded to by several of them rushing into the pit where he was, with the view of assailing the champion of the unfortunate actor. The ill-advised step was the occasion of a general fracas. The belligerent parties found a very troublesome customer in the captain, and a number of allies, English, Irish, and Scotch, who needed only a very gross outrage on a countryman to unite them cordially and quickly. It is due to the Portuguese part of the audience, with few exceptions, to state that no efforts were wanting of theirs to restore order, and that among respectable people only one opinion is entertained of the brutality of the attack.

THE WEST INDIES.

The Medway steamer has arrived with the mails from the West Indies. Her dates of departure are—from Demerara 21st December, Trinidad 17th, Jamaica 23rd, Barbadoes 21st, Grenada 24th, St. Thomas's 31st, and Fayal 13th of January.

The West India papers are barren of news. The fever is represented to have been very bad amongst the civilians at Jamaica, and was still raging when the Medway left. Mr. Freeman, the collector of customs at Kingston, had had a severe attack, and was not expected to recover. The military, generally speaking, had escaped, and the whole of the troops were healthy. The weather had been extremely hot, and one of the passengers, who had resided nearly 20 years on the island, states that he never remembered it so oppressive in the month of December.

Among the passengers by the Medway, were the captain and 13 others from the brig John Naylor, which was totally lost off Fayal. The brig was from Ichaboe, with a full cargo of guano, and belonged to the port of Liverpool.

The captain reports that there were upwards of 400 ships at Ichaboe when he left, loading and waiting for their turn. He supposes by this time the guano is pretty well exhausted.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE CASE OF LORD HUNTINGTOWER.—Monday was appointed by the COURT OF BANKRUPTCY for another hearing of Lord Huntingtower's case. Lord Huntingtower was in court, and his father, Earl Dysart, appeared as one of the spectators. It appeared, however, that Mr. Ford, an essential witness in support of one of the claims, was absent, and, after some discussion, it was arranged that the case should be adjourned till the decission of the Ecclesiastical Court respecting the suit between Lord and Lady Dysart, This will be in June next. To this arrangement Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque consented.—Mr. James: If your honour pleases; and that will give time to see if anything further can be done to perfect the arrangement originally proposed, which must be the course most satisfactory to the creditors.—Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque said, it was not too much to expect, that between the present time and that period the friends of the insolvent would see the necessity of endeavouring to make some arrangement to terminate this unsatisfactory—and it was not too much to say—this disgraceful state of things.—Mr. Chambers said, it was the hope that something of this sort would be done that made him refrain for the present from going into his case of opposition.—Mr. James said, it was a lamentable fact, but such was the case, and Lord Huntingtower was ready to swear it, that he had not one shilling in the world for his support except that which he received through the affection and kindness of his mother, from the sum allowed by the Ecclesiastical Court for her maintenance. "I state that," said Mr. James emphatically "in the face of this Court, in the presence of Lord Dysart." Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque: Then it remains with Lord Dysart to consider whether it is proper to allow his eldest son, and the heir to his title at least, to be made here day by day a public spectacle.—Lord Dysart made no observation, but smiled. A day in July was then named for Lord Huntingtower's next appearance.

ILLUSTRATED PLEAS.—In the BAIL COURT on Tuesday Mr. Fitzherbert said he had a novel motion to make to his lordship—it was to strike out certain pleas in an action, Sealy v. Browne, containing pictures, drawings, and plans, which had been copied into his brief, and he certainly thought such a brief had never before been delivered to counsel. He would hand it up to his lordship—Mr. Justice Williams: Why, it is an illustrated brief (laughter). Mr. Fitzherbert: Yes, my lord, illustrations are quite the fashion now (a laugh).—Mr. Justice Williams: What is the nature of the action? Mr. Fitzherbert: It relates, my lord, to an alleged infringement of a patent, but it will be impossible to demur to pleas of pictures representing light and shade (laughter) and therefore he (the learned counsel) trusted that his lordship would grant a rule to show cause why the paintings, drawings, or pictures (he scarcely knew what to call them) should not be struck out of the pleas which had been delivered. He was aware that a person might be libelled by a picture drawing; it had been so held by the Court; but if a man was represented as a donkey, with ass's ears (a laugh), the animal would not be drawn and painted in the brief and pleas, but represented and set forth in clear and intelligible language. The picture would be described by words. Mr. Justice Williams: It certainly is a novel case. You may take a rule to show cause, but it had better be argued before the full Court Rule nisi granted.

POLICE.

AFFECTING CASE OF DISTRESS AND DEATH.—At WORSHIP-STREET, on Monday, Rowland, the warrant officer, reported to the magistrate the result of the inquiries he had been directed to make relative to an appalling case of bereavement and distress which had taken place in the family of a poor weaver named Ney, living in Ridge's-fields, Twig-folly, near Old Ford. Mr. Broughton's attention was first directed to the case by Mr. Harvey, a schoolmaster, in Bethnal-green, who stated that the object of his solicitude, a man of most industrious habits and excellent character, had, by close labour, contrived creditably to support a wife and numerous family, amounting to eight children, all of whom lived with him at home and were in perfect health, until about three weeks since, when they were attacked by a malignant fever, whose ravages had swept no less than six of the children to the grave. The man was actuated by such feelings of honest pride and independence that he had steadily refused to accept any assistance from the parish to defray the medical and funeral expenses of his unfortunate family, and his slender finances had been so thoroughly drained by his sudden misfortune that he was now reduced to a state of extreme want and wretchedness. Rowland now intimated to the magistrate that he had visited the poor family, and had found them in the exact condition that had been represented. He had ascertained that the disease of which the poor children had died was scarlet fever terminating in dropsy; that four of the family were already buried, and in addition to the other children, who were now lying in the house dead in their coffins, another child, making the seventh victim to the disease, was in such a dangerous state as to preclude the hope of its recovery. In consequence of their incessant attendance upon their children, the father and mother had been wholly unable to pursue their usual occupation, and were therefore reduced to the greatest distress; and from the hopeless condition of the other child, and the mental and physical debility of the parents, there did not appear much likelihood of their being able to resume work for some time to come. He had learned that the circumstances of the case had been reported to Mr. Christie, the relieving officer of Bethnal-green, who had given it his prompt attention, and directed that the poor people should receive 5s. per week until something better could be done for them; but so small an amount of assistance was inadequate to meet their situation, and the father expressed the strongest repugnance to permit his children to be buried like paupers at the expense of the parish. Mr. Broughton directed the officer not to lose sight of the unfortunate family, but to render them what further assistance he might consider urgently requisite.

THE BELGIAN AMBASSADOR ANNOYED BY A MANIAC.—On Tuesday, his Excellency the Belgian Ambassador, residing in Portland-place, attended at MARYLEBONE office, when the following charge of extraordinary conduct on the part of a well-dressed young man, named John Julius Koch, was gone into before the sitting magistrate, Mr. Rawlinson. The prisoner is a young man of foreign parentage, and is the son of a gentleman holding a respectable situation in a large mercantile house in the City. Susan Bryan, nurse to his Excellency, deposed to various annoyances in the park while out with the children; but though the prisoner made "horrid faces" and "frightened the baby," he never uttered a word. Two policemen stated that they had also seen the prisoner's misconduct. The last offence was committed on Monday. The Ambassador here stepped forward and said that the prisoner once spoke to him as he was leaving home of an evening, but what the purport of his address to him was he could not say; he (prisoner) was the son of a foreigner, and his father, who was a highly respectable man, seemed unfortunately to have no control over him. The Ambassador concluded by expressing an opinion that the state of mind of the prisoner was defective, and that he might, unless restrained, do something of a serious nature. The Ambassador was about to enter into further particulars relative to him and his lady having been annoyed by the prisoner, when Mr. Rawlinson desired that he might be sworn. His Excellency objected, stating he would not be allowed to take the required oath in this country, holding the situation which he did as one of the corps diplomatique. Mr. Rawlinson (to whom the doctrine seemed quite new) asked his excellency if he, while he resided in England, and, therefore, under the protection of the laws of this country, should, in the event of his pocket being picked in the street, or his house being robbed, object to give such evidence upon oath as might have the effect of bringing the guilty party to justice. The Ambassador signified in a few words that he should, from the position which he occupied, object to be sworn. Mr. Rawlinson (to the prisoner): What is your object in annoying the Ambassador's family in this way? Prisoner: I must acknowledge my fault. I have no more to say. Jones, usher of the court, said that a few weeks ago the prisoner was brought up charged with firing off a pistol in the Regent's Park, and for that offence he was fined. The prisoner was remanded, and will be brought up again next Tuesday.

and, ad interim, an examination will be made by the surgeon of the prison as to his state of mind.

CURIOUS CASE OF BIGAMY.—At the MANSION-HOUSE, on Wednesday, a respectably attired female, who gave her name as Mary Keele, and stated her age to be 39 years, but whose appearance denoted that she had seen some twenty summers more, was charged with bigamy. The facts of the case are somewhat novel and curious, the charge being preferred by the mother of the husband by the second marriage, a young man who only attained his majority in the month of August last.—Mrs. Sarah Keele, the prosecutrix, stated that she was the wife of George Keele, who was not in any business, and that she resided at St. Stephen's, near Canterbury. The prisoner at the bar had contracted marriage with her (the witness's) son some time about last Michaelmas. Witness had known the prisoner for about a fortnight before the marriage took place. The prisoner's husband by the first marriage was a man of the name of John Weller, who went to Australia about three years ago, and there, as the prisoner had stated, died. Weller has a sister living at Canterbury, who had informed the witness that her brother (the husband) was still living, and in perfect health, in Australia, and that a letter had recently been received which could be proved to be in his handwriting. On learning this the witness came up to town and gave the prisoner into custody, as she was getting out of an omnibus, in Bishopsgate-street.—The Lord Mayor: Is there anybody here to prove the former marriage?—The witness: It can be proved by the first husband's sister, who resides at Canterbury.—William Gurney Keele, who appeared to give his testimony with great reluctance, stated that he lived in Back lane, Hackney, and was in the service of Messrs. Marnatt and Manley, nurserymen. He was married to the prisoner some time in the month of October last (he could not remember the day), at St. George's, Hanover-squarc, which was the church in which the first marriage was solemnised. He had become acquainted with the prisoner from going to her house on the business of his employers at Canterbury. Witness believed her to be a widow—indeed he had heard about three or four months ago that her first husband was dead. He heard this from the prisoner, who told him that some person had called upon her and told her that her husband was dead, and that information had been corroborated to her by a gentleman who had stated that he had seen "the last of her husband" in Australia. This the prisoner told witness before the marriage, or he would not have proposed to her a marriage. He had engaged to marry her about a fortnight before the marriage actually took place.—The prisoner, when called upon for her answer to the charge, and when questioned by the Lord Mayor, manifested the most perfect self-possession, and evinced, both in manner and deportment, that she had moved in a superior station in life to that into which she had descended by her marriage with the son of the prosecutrix. She stated that when she married the young man Keele, she fully believed that her first husband, Weller, was dead; and her belief had been founded upon the information of a female four years ago, and also of a seafaring man, who had called upon her about the same time, and stated he did so at the dying request of her husband, of whom he had seen the last in Australia. She did not know the name of either of those parties, nor could she produce them; the last told her he was going back immediately on a voyage to Australia, and she has never seen him since.—The Lord Mayor: Have you any objection to state when it was you were married to your first husband?—The Prisoner: Not the least, my lord, as far as I can recollect it. I think it was in the month of June, twelve or thirteen years ago. I forget the precise day. My maiden name was Mary Frances Witham.—The Lord Mayor directed the constable to search the register of St. George's, Hanover-square, for the certificate of the first marriage. The Lord Mayor intimated that the prisoner must be remanded in order to procure the attendance of the witness from Canterbury; and he inquired of the prisoner if she had friends in London who would be answerable for her appearance.—The Prisoner replied that she had been out of London for many years, and had been taken so unexpectedly into custody that she had not had an opportunity of communicating with any person. She had, however, friends to whom she could send.—The husband (Keele) hereupon came forward and expressed his readiness to be answerable for his wife's appearance on any future day the Lord Mayor might appoint.—The Lord Mayor (addressing the young man) said, Well, as you are the aggrieved party, I will take your recognisance in £50 that the prisoner shall appear here this day week to answer any charge that may be then preferred against her.

ANOTHER LADY THIEF.—At LAMBETH Police-Office, on Wednesda Augusta Hamilton, who represented herself as the widow of an officer, w charged with robbing her ready-furnished lodgings. Mrs. Rayner, of No. 1, Mason-street, Walworth, stated that the prisoner came to reside at her house a short time ago. The prisoner was then dressed in a very genteel manner, and seemed lady-like in her appearance. She stated that she could give no reference, as she had just come from the country, and that she was the widow of an officer in the army, was highly connected, and that her boxes and luggage would arrive on the following morning. The prisoner, on obtaining possession of the lodging, commenced pledging everything she could lay her hands on. Richard Davis, P. 55, stated that he found a quantity of duplicates in the possession of the prisoner, some of which related to the missing property of the prosecutrix. The officer informed the magistrate that the prisoner was well known, and had already been tried at the Surrey Sessions, and received six months' imprisonment. The prisoner made a long statement, and said she was the widow of a midshipman, and had come up from Hastings.—Mr. Henry said it was a very bad case, and he should send the prisoner to the Central Criminal Court for trial.

COUNTRY NEWS.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—The general half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of the Midland Railway was held at the Derby station on Monday. Mr. George Hudson, of York, the Chairman of the Board of Directors, presided. The report from the Directors gave a satisfactory account of the position and prospect of the Company's affairs, and concluded by recommending the payment of a dividend to the proprietary at the following rate, viz., of £3 on each £100 of consolidated stock, £3 on each £100 of preference stock, and £2 6s. 3d. on each £100 of Birmingham and Derby consolidated stock. The Chairman addressed the meeting at great length. During his speech he adverted to the late melancholy accident on the Nottingham line. That event, he could assure the meeting, had been to him the cause of the greatest pain and distress; and however much persons might accuse them, if they would look to the circumstances, he thought the directors were fully acquitted, and that neither the number of men in the employment of the company, nor the officials of the establishment, had anything to do with that unfortunate event, but was only one of those unforseen occurrences to which man was subject. The report was adopted, as well as the proposition, that there be a dividend, at the rate of £3 on the consolidated, £3 on the preference, and £2 6s. 3d. on the Birmingham and Derby consolidated stocks, payable on the 5th February next.

INDICATION OF SPRING.—As an intimation of the approach of spring, and as a proof of the fallacy of certain predictions as to the severe and long winter with which we were to be afflicted, we may mention that during the present week there has been plucked from the open hedge of an orchard attached to the residence of Mr. Richard Major, of Silverton, Devonshire, a quantity of primroses in full and perfect bloom.

SERIOUS FIRE IN MANCHESTER.—On Tuesday evening a fire which did great damage took place in the warehouse of Messrs. Smith and Ingle, papee manufacturers, Piccadilly, Manchester, which spread with great rapidity. The whole of the warehouse of Messrs. Smith and Ingle was soon in flames, which rushed from the side windows, spread across the yard, and soon communicated to the wood-work of the Mosley Arms Hotel, the cornice and window frames of which house were repeatedly on fire. Fortunately, the latter were immediately forced outwards by men stationed in the different chambers; and the interior was thus preserved, though not without the greatest exertions of the firemen. Meanwhile the White Bear Inn was in the most imminent danger. The furniture, bedding, &c., were hurled out of the chamber windows, and much mischief was done by the hasty and thoughtless way in which the property was thrown about in removal. The engines worked very effectively; there appeared to be a good supply of water, and, before the firemen had been an hour on the spot, the flames were completely subdued, though of course not extinguished. The light material (paper) with which the warehouse was filled was carried forth in large blazing fragments, which fell in thick showers on the roofs of all the surrounding warehouses. That of Messrs. J. A. Simpson and Co., Piccadilly, and some of those in Back Piccadilly, were repeatedly in danger from this cause; but at eleven o'clock all seemed to be safe, and the flames nearly extinguished. The entire stock in the warehouses on the west side of the Mosley Arms-yard, is utterly destroyed. But little damage is done by fire to the adjacent inns.

DEATH FROM EXCESS OF JOY.—On Friday se'nnight a poor woman, named Lucy Young, who kept a little shop in Eastbourne, Sussex, and was behind in her payments, was so overjoyed at their settlement by Mrs. Davies Gilbert, that she went into a fit, and shortly expired.

INCENDIARY FIRE IN SUFFOLK.—A most destructive fire took place early on Sunday morning, on the extensive premises of Mr. John Harrison, farmer of Timworth, near Bury, Suffolk, when two large barns, containing barley, wheat, and beans, two stables, two granaries, large range of bullock-sheds, a cow-house, a straw-shed, and a barley stack containing 120 coombs, three cows, and a calf, which were tied up in the cow-house, a large quantity of farming implements, all of which were totally destroyed; the horses and bullocks were rescued from the flames through the exertions of the labourers of the parish, whose praiseworthy conduct deserves every commendation. There is no doubt the fire was the act of an incendiary.

SHIPWRECK NEAR CARNARVON.—On Saturday last a large ship, during the awful gale that was then raging, went to pieces in the bay of Carvarvon. Pieces of the wreck were strewn along the beach for miles. It is scarcely possible for a wreck to be more fatally complete. From the name on the medicine chest and other sources, we learn that the vessel was called the William Turner, belonging to Belfast, 488 tons register, George Evans, master, and that she was homeward bound from Ichaboe to Liverpool, with a cargo of guano, which is entirely lost, not a vestige of it remaining. It is our painful duty to add that not one creature escaped alive. One of the crew of the Eliza Scotland, which vessel sailed from Ichaboe before the William Turner, states that the vessel must have had about thirty people on board.

ATTEMPTED MURDER AT DEVONPORT.—On Tuesday week a corporal of the 44th Regiment, quartered in George's-square Barracks, Devonport, with his musket deliberately shot at a sergeant, whilst the latter was in the barracks in conversation with another corporal. The ball passed through the sergeant's coat and waistcoat, grazing his breast, struck against the wall, and rebounded into the barrack-square. The corporal was immediately arrested, but gave no explanation of what induced him to commit such a rash act, nor did he express any regret for having done it. It appeared that he had been absent without leave, and on examining his kit, his great coat was missing. This the sergeant, in the course of his duty, reported; and it is supposed that revenge prompted him to make the attempt on the sergeant's life. A general court-martial will shortly be assembled to try the prisoner.

CONFLICT WITH, AND COMMITTAL OF BURGLARS.—On the night of Thursday week, a daring burglary was committed at Gerrard's Cross, Buckinghamshire, on the premises of Mr. Thomas Yeowell, the French Horn Inn. The above premises have on two previous occasions been burglariously entered, the last time not three months since, by, it is believed, the same gang of desperadoes, who have had their rendezvous in the neighbourhood of Uxbridge. On the last occasion the thieves effected an entry through the brick wall in front of the house, and carried off with them two flitches of bacon, two cheeses, a time-piece, two pounds of cigars, three coats, three pair of gaiters, a flannel waistcoat, and a variety of other articles, besides a bottle of brandy, and a bottle of peppermint. The burglary was first discovered about five o'clock next morning, when information was immediately dispatched to Mr. John Larkin, the superintendent of the Iver and Burnham police, who, taking with him George King, one of his officers, started for Uxbridge, and obtained the assistance of Sergeant Roadnight, T 11, to whom the persons of the gang, whom it was anticipated would make for Uxbridge, were known. The officers accordingly stationed themselves in the neighbourhood of Long-bridge, on Uxbridge-moor, which divides Middlesex from Buckinghamshire, and about nine o'clock they observed three of the gang, named Robert Ball, Samuel Townsend, and Robert Shoppee, coming over the bridge, in a state of intoxication. On their coming up to where the officers were secreted, the latter rushed out, each seizing his man, when a fearful conflict took place between them. The thieves fought furiously, but the prisoners were secured, and taken to the station-house at Uxbridge, when there was found on Shoppee a pair of scissors, which had been stolen from the French Horn, and on Townsend an ornament which had been on the top of the time-piece stolen. The officers then proceeded to Gerrard's Cross, in search of the property. They also took with them the prisoners' boots, when they were found to correspond with footmarks, which were traced from the French Horn to a dung-heap at some distance, and on searching it there was found concealed the greater part of the stolen property, the wearing apparel being wrapped up in a smock frock belonging to the prisoner Ball. At the French Horn a bludgeon was also found, belonging to Townsend. On Saturday the prisoners underwent a short examination before the Uxbridge magistrates, by whose direction they were transferred to Buckinghamshire. They were brought before the magistrates at Iver on Wednesday, and evidence of the above facts having been given, were committed for trial for the burglary.

A MAN COMMITTED FOR ATTEMPTING TO POISON HIS WIFE AND CHILD.—On Saturday last a man named Dickman, a journeyman baker, was committed by the Uxbridge magistrates, on a charge of leaving poison in a cup, for the purpose of destroying the life of Elizabeth, his wife, and his infant child. The circumstances of the case are these:—The person upon whom the attempt at murder was made is a young female, twenty-two years of age, named Elizabeth Dickman, the wife of the prisoner, and her child, an infant, six months old. Dickman and his wife were married twelve months last October, and almost from the time of their marriage have been continually quarrelling, the husband ill-using his wife and threatening to do for her some time or another. For some time past Dickman has been out of work and idling about the neighbourhood. On the night of Tuesday week he did not come home until after his wife was in bed, and on the following morning he got up before she did, and said he should go and enlist for a soldier. Before, however, he left the house, his wife heard him moving about in an adjoining room, and also heard a noise, as if he was moving some crockery. About nine o'clock she got up and made ready her breakfast, and on sitting down to it with her sister, she poured out a cup of coffee and added to it sugar and milk, when she observed that the milk instantly became curdled. It did not, however, deter her from drinking the contents of the cup, but she had not done so many minutes before she felt a heat in her throat and pain in her stomach. She was then alarmed, and poured out another cup of coffee, which on putting in sugar and milk became more curdled than the first, and on trying some coffee in a basin with some milk only, which did not curdle, she was convinced that her husband had mixed something with the sugar, for the purpose of poisoning her and her infant. She immediately took the sugar basin and ran with it to the shop of Mr. Chave, a chemist and druggist, and stated to him her suspicions; when, on Mr. Chave tasting and examining the sugar, he declared it to be mixed with oxalic acid. Strong emetics were administered to Mrs. Dickman, by which means the poison was removed, and after suffering intense pain and sickness for about two hours she recovered. Had she drunk the second cup, or mixed some of the sugar with her infant's food, which was her usual custom, there is no doubt both of them would have died from the effects of the poison. On Wednesday evening Thomas Dickman, who is not yet 20 years of age, was apprehended at the residence of his mother. On Friday he was brought to Uxbridge, and examined before T. T. Clark, Esq., a local magistrate, when evidence to the above effect was shortly gone into, and he was ultimately remanded on a charge of attempting to murder his wife and child, until a minute analysis of the contents of the sugar basin should be completed by Mr. Rayner, surgeon, of Uxbridge. Dickman was again examined on Saturday, and, as above stated, he was committed for trial, it being clearly proved that there was oxalic acid in the sugar.

ATTEMPTED MURDER IN WALES.—The town of Pwllheli was thrown into a state of much consternation on Tuesday morning week, by the intelligence that a foul and deadly attempt had been made on the previous night, about 11 o'clock, on the person of Mr. Evan Williams, of Gelliwig, Leyn, while returning home in company with Mrs. Williams from Carnarvon. Having proceeded nearly as far as the Penrhos Church, on the new road, they found that they were followed by some person; who, when he had approached them within a few yards, fired a gun, the ball from which entered Mr. Williams's back, and passed out through the abdomen. The unfortunate man immediately fell to the ground, telling Mrs. Williams that he was a dying man, whilst she, almost frantic with horror, cried out "Murder," and ran to the nearest farmhouse, called Gegin Bach, informing the inmates of the catastrophe. The villian, in the meantime, had made his escape. The wounded sufferer was taken to the farmhouse, and medical aid obtained as quickly as possible. Mr. Williams remains in a very weak state; but favourable hopes are entertained of his ultimate recovery. The cause of the villanous attack is wrapped in mystery, and the assassin has hitherto eluded every attempt at his apprehension.

SERIOUS CASE OF EMBEZZLEMENT AT MANCHESTER.—On Monday morning a young man named Evan Price, one of the shopmen in the employ of Mr. Daniel Percival, haberdasher and clothier, King-street, Manchester, was examined on charges of embezzling money to the amount of several thousand pounds, the property of his master. Several cases of the embezzlement of small sums were proved against him. A hat-box had been found in the house of a gentleman at Mold, which had been brought there by the prisoner's sister. Upon opening the hat-box, Mr. Beswick, the chief superintendent of police, found £500 in gold, and £70 in notes, together with banking books, containing deposit accounts of the prisoner with two banks at Chester, the Royal Bank of Liverpool, the North and South Wales Bank at Mold, a promissory note, and a mortgage deed, altogether showing that the prisoner was possessed of £3516 1s. 6½d. in cash and securities. Mr. Daniel Percival stated that the prisoner had been in his employ since April, 1839. He had a salary of £40 a year, with board and lodging. It was his duty to put all the receipts into the till. Witness had had suspicions that all was not right for some time, and communicated them to Mr. Beswick. The prisoner, who seemed deeply to feel the situation in which he stood, was committed for trial at the South Lancashire assizes.

AN INCIDENT CONNECTED WITH THE PARRICIDE IN LANCASHIRE.—A few days ago the furniture, &c., which belonged to Mr. Gallop, who was poisoned by his daughter, at Crewe, was disposed of equally to his two sisters, a brother, and a nephew, they having administered to them as his heirs, and the Crown having no claim to the property, in consequence of its never having been in possession of the unfortunate girl who was lately executed. A Mr. Vickers, tailor, wished to purchase a chest of drawers, but, being anxious to have them a bargain, he refused to give the sum asked for them. It was nearly decided that he should have them, only some eighteenpence preventing the completion of the bargain, when the step-daughter of the deceased said there was a secret drawer, which might contain something of value. This drawer was forced open, and was found to contain 107 sovereigns. This £107, together with £75 in a building fund, is all the money that has been been discovered belonging to the deceased, though, a short time before his death, he was understood to have said that he was worth £400. He was a man of somewhat eccentric habits, and his daughter, by those who best knew her, was not considered altogether of sound mind.

AN AFFECTING CASE OF STEALING AT CANTERBURY.—On Thursday week a very affecting case came before the magistrates of Canterbury in the nature of a charge against a poor woman, named Mary Hamilton, for having stolen a broom, the property of Mr. Jackson, brush-maker. What rendered the case so affecting was, that the prisoner had a child in arms, and was surrounded by six others, the eldest not eleven years old—some shoeless, others without covering to the head, and all in rags—the pictures of misery and wretchedness—awaiting, with excessive anxiety, and tears in their eyes, the fate of their distressed parent; and it was also known that there was another child of the same family in the hospital, and a ninth roaming about. The father, it was stated, had gone to Dover. It appeared that the prisoner had gone into prosecutor's shop on Wednesday at noon for some trifling article, during which, it was supposed, she stole the broom, which she subsequently sold to Mr. Cayley, baker, for 1s. 6d. worth of bread. The policeman arrested her at the moment of coming from Mr. Cayley's shop, and on his accosting her about the lost property, Mr. Cayley came forward and stated that he had just purchased such a broom as was described. He also added, that he had before seen the prisoner selling articles of that description, and had no idea of its value when he gave her the price asked. Mr. Jackson appeared as prosecutor, who, with others in his employ, deposed to the facts, and identified the broom, which was valued at 3s. 6d. Prisoner, in her defence, stated that she found the broom in St. Margaret's street, and being pressed with hunger, as well as all her children, who had not had any food since the previous morning, she thought no harm of getting what she could for it. She was in the greatest distrets, and begged mercy of the bench. The magistrates stated the pain which they felt at the course they must pursue. She might have committed the offence through want, but it had been clearly established against her, and they must commit her for trial at the quarter sessions. Her cries of lamentation, mingled with those of the children, were deeply exciting. In reply to her earnest inquiries as to what would become of her children, the prisoner was told they would be taken care of; and an order was given for their removal to the workhouse. Thus, for a paltry broom, the cost price of which is perhaps about 2s., and which need not have been stolen, had Mr. Jackson's attendants been more watchful, the city will to have to maintain a family of eight or nine persons, for two or three months, besides incurring all the costs of the prosecution, and the attendance of five witnesses at the trial.——[This is one of the many instances of the value of summary jurisdiction. We are no advocates for invalidating the valuable right of trial by jury, but it is evident that cases often arise where honest and sensible magistrates can execute strict justice tempered with mercy, and at the same time save much expence, and prevent great misery.]

FALL OF EARTH IN A MINE, AND EXTRAORDINARY PRESERVATION OF LIFE.—On Tuesday an inquest was held at the Coseley Tavern, at Coseley, Staffordshire, on the body of Benjamin Smith, a miner, whose death, with that of two other men, was caused by an enormous fall of earth in a mine in which they were working. The accompanying statement, given before the coroner by one of the survivers, contains a fearful narrative of the condition of the workmen after the accident, and of the preservation of one man. Joseph Parkes said: I live at Coseley, and am a miner. On Friday last I was at work with the deceased, Benjamin Smith (who was about thirty-two years old, and a miner, living at Coseley), in a coal-pit at the Fox Yards, in the parish of Tipton, and while we were at work there, about half-past nine o'clock that morning, a quantity of clod and earth fell in, to the amount of more than a thousand tons, and almost every man in the pit was stopped up. Some few of the men were a distance off, and got clear away; but the deceased, myself, and four others, were stopped up in one of the hollows. Great exertions were made to get us out. Several tons of stuff were soon removed, and in about an hour one of the six men was got out very badly hurt, but he is still alive. Another was got out soon after without much injury. As fast as the miners got the stuff away more fell in, but in the course of the day all the remaining men, except myself, were got out, but I was not got out till about ten o'clock that night. I was not at all hurt, but was very weak through the damp and confinement, and being without food. I had not had anything to eat from the previous night, so that I was more than 24 hours without tasting it. I was quite sensible all the time, and conversed with all the men. I talked with Smith as long as he lived, which was about an hour and a half, as near as I can guess, after the stuff fell in. Two other men were killed. One of them lived about an hour, and the other about an hour and a half. I was afraid to stir, although I saw my suffering companions close to me nearly buried in the earth. It was light a part of the time from a candle, but after it went out we were in darkness all the time. Some of the men had their arms wedged down, and asked me to remove the clods from their mouths to allow them to breathe, and I did so several times although it endangered my own life, as the stuff continued falling. Other corroborative evidence was given, and the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

MRS. TAWELL.—Mrs. Tawell, of Berkhampstead, is the sister-in-law of Mr. Timothy Cuthford, many years manager in Newcastle of the branch establishment of Stockton Bank. The former wife of John Tawell was the daughter of Mr. Edward Appleby, of North Shields, who was well known to many persons now living as a rich and eccentric old gentleman. The present Mrs. Tawell is the daughter of the late Mr. Edward Appleby, formerly of North Shields, but who died at Houghton-le-Spring some years ago. Her first husband was a Mr. Cutforth, by whom she has one daughter still living. She was married to John Tawell (accused of the murder of Sarah Hart) in 1841; the issue of which marriage is an infant of about 15 months old.

IRELAND.

HIRED ASSASSINS IN IRELAND.—The Clare Journal reports a circumstance which shows in a strong light, the present state of things in part of Ireland. It says, "Of those savage acts of premeditated murder which ever and anon spring from the various provinces of Ireland, and justly place assassins on a level with the insatiate and prowling panther, one has, fortunately, been checked in the bud by its discovery in this locality. The fellow who was commissioned to do the deed is named Denis O'Brien, and his victim was to have been Mr. Thady Cullinan, of Shannavoe. The way the plot was discovered is uncommon. O'Brien, who lived at Cratloe, near Limerick, having undertaken to do "the job," solicited the assistance of another individual. This man, recoiling from the horrid conspiracy, refused his co-operation, and lodged informations against the sanguinary ruffian. O'Brien was therefore apprehended, and lodged in prison, and after an examination has been committed. Mr. Cullinan was to have been despatched on Monday last; and only owes his life to the refusal and resistance shown by this person to O'Brien when he mooted the question.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—There was something like excitement at the Repeal Association on Monday, it being known that Mr. O'Connell would again attend. Mr. W. S. O'Brien was in the chair, and many of Mr. O'Connell's female admirers were present. An expected speech from the "Liberator" was, of course, the great attraction. He commenced by declaring that there should be no compromise, no cessation of agitation, no half-measures, as nothing the English Parliament could give would satisfy them; they would be content with nothing short of Repeal. (Cheers.) He felt as if he were that day only beginning the Repeal agitation; and that he would almost be sorry when it was obtained, such infinite pleasure did he experience in seeking for it. The Government of England could neither bribe nor intimidate them. That was already proved. The months, perhaps the days might be counted, before the occasion arrived when England would want Ireland, when she would require the bravery of Irishmen, and she should have it: but he marked his price—the Repeal of the Union. Nothing could be more vain and futile than the expectations of the English Whigs and Tories that the Irish people would relax their efforts for the restoration of their liberties (cheers): but when they found out that they had been deceived in that hope, they would take other means to obtain their end by seeking to divide and disunite Irishmen (cheers), by insidious attempts to ereate dissension, or by holding out hypocritical hopes that their wrongs would be redressed. (Cheers.) He wished to direct the attention of the association to these latter plans. In a short time they would have the Queen's speech, full of very flattering phrases to the Irish people, and expressing eager wishes to do all sorts of good things for them, and to bestow all manner of benefits upon them. (Laughter and cheers.) Nothing would gratify the Royal lady more than the utterance of these sentiments, but they were the mere words of the Minister put into her mouth, and Sir R. Peel would not be at home if he were not hypocritical and acting his real character of Joseph Surface. (Cheers and laughter.) Now, he could tell them that there would be an abundance of promise that the Irish people should be placed on an equal footing with their English fellow-subjects as regarded representation, franchise, municipal reform, the church, and a resident gentry, but there would not be a single atom of performance. It was, in his opinion, quite useless for the Irish members to go over to Parliament, for it would only serve to consolidate the ranks of their Ministerial opponents, who would hunt down poor Paddy with all the delight of a fox-hunter. After again assuring his auditors that the Irish never would relax in their exertions for Repeal, Mr. O'Connell attacked the Whigs, defended his opinions on the Charitable Bequests Bill, and then remarked upon the rescript from the Pope. He denied that Repeal had received a check from this rescript. He said "there was no prohibition of or interference with Repeal at all. (Hear, hear.) The Bishop who had seconded the adoption of it had, upon that very day, sent in his subscription to their body (cheers); and the prelate who had moved it had attended at the late Limerick banquet. (Cheers.) There was nothing whatever of the effect so attributed to it, and a more good-natured, harmless rescript (laughter), had never been sent to any country. The bishops who had signified their obedience to that rescript had declared that they would obey the spirit of it, but not the letter. In that way received, and regarded in its true spirit, which was that of charity to all, there was no dictation in it whatever, and, so far from its containing anything of command or prohibition, it did not not bear upon the question of Repeal at all." (Hear, hear.) After some further remarks on the subject, the hon. gentleman said it was his opinion that two delegates should be sent from the Catholic laity to Rome, to remonstrate with his Holiness against any ecclesiastical interference with the temporal affairs of the Irish people, to assure him that that portion of the clergy and laity who had joined the popular movement were not in any degree inferior to those who had not as yet pronounced for it, and to strongly implore of his Holiness to discountenance any attempts which might be made to induce him to impede the efforts of the Irish people to obtain their legislative independence. He would name those two delegates; the one was Lord French, the other, though he might be laughed at for saying so, should, in his opinion, be Mr. J. O'Connell. (Cheers.) He also thought that some of the bishops should be sent over with this deputation; that, in fact, they should take a bold and decided step and crush and quiet this affair for ever. Mr. O'Connell, after calling on the people to organise for Repeal in every possibly legitimate way, and declaring that while he admired peace and order, he was ready to expire for Repeal, concluded by moving that it be referred to a committee to consider what ought to be the conduct of the Irish representatives during the coming session of Parliament, and that they report thereon next Monday. The question was put and carried. The rent for the week was declared to be £395 3s. 5d.

ANOTHER MURDER IN TIPPERARY.—On Saturday morning a man of advanced age, named Samuel Smith, was murdered at Barrisnafarny, near Moneygall. His head was shockingly fractured, and death must have been instantaneous. He was murdered, it was thought, in consequence of being engaged in trying to remove some defaulting tenants from their holdings.

QUEEN VICTORIA PLANTING AN OAK AT STOWE.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO STOWE.

In our late impression last week we announced the return of her Majesty from Stowe, and we now give a few interesting particulars of what occurred on Saturday last, previous to her Majesty's departure.

Her Majesty having arranged to leave Stowe for Windsor Castle on Saturday morning, the whole corps of Bucks Hussars, except those engaged on escort, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Bernard, assembled in the open space at the north front of the mansion shortly before nine o'clock.

Her Majesty rose early, and breakfasted in her private apartment with the Prince Consort.

Shortly before ten o'clock the distinguished circle of guests within the mansion assembled in the marble-hall to witness her Majesty's departure.

Sir Robert and Lady Peel left about half an hour before the Queen, as also did Lord Aberdeen and Sir J. Graham. Lord Delawarr left shortly after.

At five minutes past ten the Queen entered the Hall, escorted by her noble host, and having graciously acknowledged the salutations of the distinguished personages present, her Majesty took a most affectionate leave of the Duchess and Lady Anna Grenville, and most cordially saluted the Duchess a second time, after having entered her carriage, showing both to the Duchess and to his Grace how strongly she felt the reception which had been given to her Majesty and the Prince Albert, and the anxiety of the noble host and hostess to do every possible honour to her Majesty and the Prince during their sojourn at Stowe.

The large engraving at page 52 represents the Royal departure, and the magnificent North Hall, designed and painted by Kent. The sculpture, by Banks, Scheemakers, and other moderns, is very fine; and there are likewise here some beautiful specimens of antique art, besides a valuable collection of original portraits. As a truly superb nucleus hangs the great heraldic lantern, a tasteful work of our own times. It is of an octagonal form, each side being divided into three compartments. The centre compartments contain the shields and supporters of the Grenville, Temple, Nugent, and

HOUSE AT BUCKINGHAM, WHERE CHARLES I. LODGED.

Chandos families, as well as those of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and King Henry VII., from whom the present Duke of Buckingham and Chando is lineally descended. The upper and lower compartments are occupied by shields of quarterings commemorating the most important matches with the heiresses of many distinguished families, through whose alliance so large an accumulation of heraldic honours have descended to the present head of the Grenville family, and also by some of the ancient badges and devices which were at various periods adopted by the houses of Plantagenet and Tudor. The ground, or field, of the paintings is diapered like that of the great seal of King Henry VII., the meshes being lozenge formed, with a fleur de lis on each knot, and a rose on each lozenge; the latter being a device of the house of Lancaster, and the former to show his descent from the royal blood of France, through his grandmother, Queen Katharine of Valois, the widow of King Henry V. The whole of the heraldry was arranged by Mr. Smith the Duke's librarian, and the very numerous coats of arms, exquisitely enamelled on plate glass, form a most complete historical pedigree of the Grenville family.

As a distinguishing mark of her Majesty's approbation of the soldierlike appearance of the Bucks Yeomanry, and the admirable manner in which the fine corps had discharged their duties, the Queen was most graciously pleased herself to notify to the Duke of Buckingham, previous to entering her carriage, her pleasure that the distinction of "Royal" should thenceforward be conferred upon the regiment of yeomanry under his Grace's command. This is an honour which we believe was never before conferred by her Majesty in person upon any corps of yeomanry in her Majesty's service.

On leaving the mansion her Majesty was received by a guard of honour consisting of a detachment of the Bucks Hussars, under Captain Roberts, and as her Majesty stepped into the carriage, into which she was handed by the Duke of Buckingham, a royal salute was fired from the summit of the Bourbon tower, under the direction of Captain Anderson, of the Royal Marines.

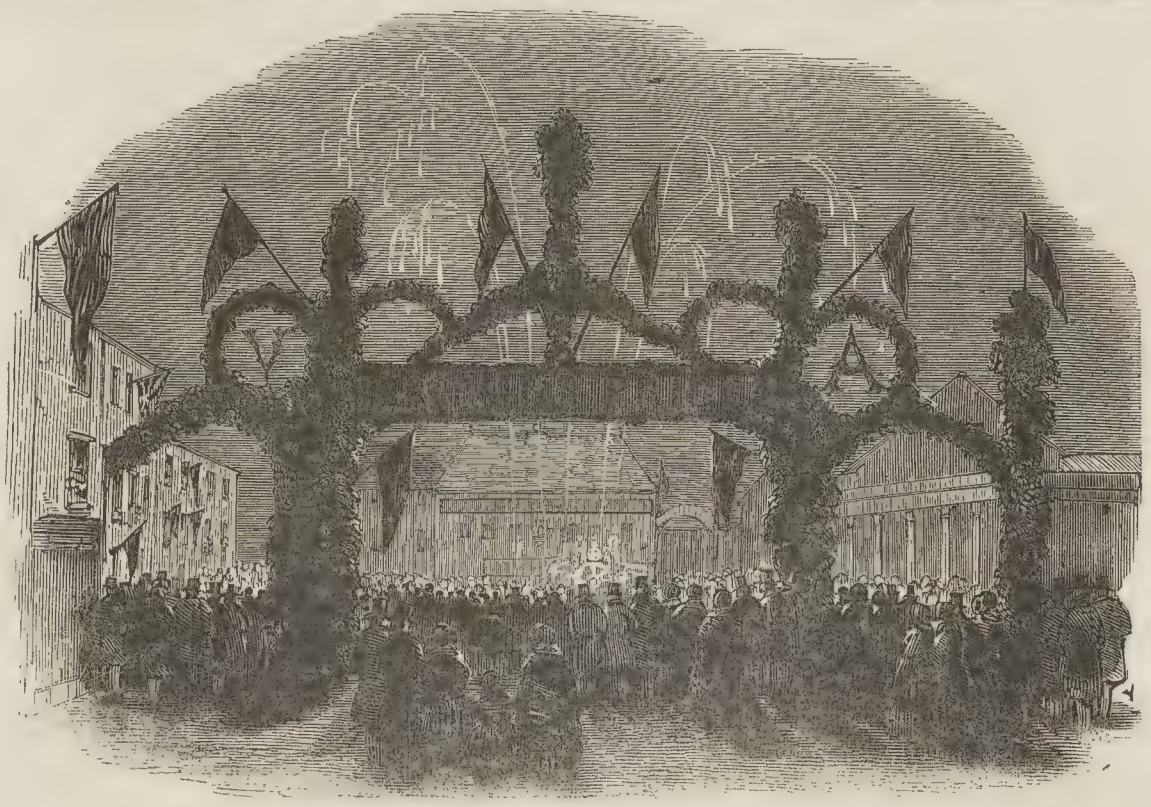
The Royal cortège left Stowe precisely at ten minutes past ten o'clock, proceeding through the park under an escort of the Bucks Hussars, commanded by Captain Carrington and Lieutenant the Marquis of Chandos, in the direction of the town of Buckingham.

As the Queen's carriage passed under the Corinthian arch, her Majesty was again saluted from a field battery, manned by the artillery corps of the Bucks Hussars, under Captain Holmes.

At the boundary of the borough the cortège was received by the municipal authorities, who preceded her Majesty's carriage to the further confines of the town, amid the loyal acclamations of its inhabitants.



The Duke of Buckingham, in his full uniform as Colonel of the Bucks Hussars, and wearing the stars and ribbon of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, rode by the side of her Majesty's carriage as far as Page Hill.

On taking leave of her Majesty at Page Hill, on the confines of his grace's magnificent domains, the Duke had the honour of receiving from her Majesty a renewal of her expressions of acknowledgment for the magnificent hospitality with which she had been received at Stowe.

THE CHANDOS TESTIMONIAL.

On the borders of the county, just previous to entering the town of Stony Stratford, her Majesty and the Prince were met by the Lord Lieutenant, Lord Carrington, on horseback. The Royal cavalcade proceeded slowly through the little town, the decorations of which, both public and private, do great credit to the inhabitants. Her Majesty was greeted with loyal cheers as she passed along. On quitting the town the pace was quickened, and at a rapid rate the cortège drove up to the Wolverton Station, where it arrived at a quarter before twelve o'clock. Her Majesty was here received by Lord Carrington, with whom she conversed for a few minutes, Prince Albert cordially shaking hands with him. The Marquis of Chandos (who had commanded the escort to the station), and the High Sheriff were also in attendance. After retiring for about ten minutes to the rooms appropriated for them, her Majesty and Royal Consort proceeded across the platform and entered the Royal carriage, the door of which was held by the Lord Lieutenant. The staff of the Royal Bucks Militia, and a squadron of the Bucks Hussars dismounted, were drawn up on each side of the passage to the Royal carriage, and several of the county magistrates were present. Her Majesty on her departure was enthusiastically cheered by the persons assembled.

FIRE WORKS, MARKET PLACE, BUCKINGHAM.

We subjoin a few picturesque commemorations of the Royal progress.

The scene at page 52 represents a most interesting scene on Friday afternoon, the locality being that portion of the grounds in which is placed the Temple of Concord and Victory, whence is seen, to great advantage, the Grecian Valley, beautifully planted. Shortly after three o'clock her Majesty left the mansion, leaning on the arm of the Duke of Buckingham, and proceeded to the above spot. Prince Albert followed with the Duchess of Buckingham; and many of the other guests were of the party. On reaching the south side of the Temple, the Royal party paused; and the Duke of Buckingham having handed the Queen an oak sapling, her Majesty placed it in the ground, and then received from Mr. Ferguson a spade, with which the Queen covered the roots; the Duke of Buckingham and Mr. Ferguson completing the work, whilst her Majesty kept the tree in an upright position.

But this we hope in future years
When high its royal head it rears
Above its fellows round—
That long 'twill be
A leafy tree
Near "Concord's Temple" found!
While she that plac'd it there still prove
The idol of her people's love!

Prince Albert then planted a young cedar tree at a short distance from the spot; and her Majesty and the Prince having planted two other similar trees on the north side of the Temple, the Duke of Buckingham called out "God bless her Majesty the Queen," a sentiment answered, first, by the cheers of the noble party present, and re-echoed by about two hundred persons who were congregated in the park, at a point from whence a view of the pleasing ceremony was obtained.

Upon the opposite page is a scene of right loyal rejoicing, a superb display of fireworks, in the Market-place, opposite the County Hall, at Buckingham, on Monday evening: the display was kept up, greatly to the amusement of the inhabitants, for nearly four hours; the expense being defrayed by the corporation.

In the column adjoining is a memorial of the troublous times of Charles I., and the loyalty of the town of Buckingham, which has been ever remarkable for its orthodoxy and strict attachment to the principles of the Constitution, both in Church and State. Here, King Charles I. found an asylum, and took up his quarters, while the neighbouring towns of Aylesbury, Newport Pagnel, &c., were garrisoned against him. The room where his Majesty lay, in "the Capital House" here, is yet known by the name of "the King's chamber."

In "Osborn's Tracts," vol. ii., p. 292, is this printed account of the King's journey, viz.:—"On Saturday, June 22nd, 1644, the King came to Buckingham, to Sir Thomas Richardson's, from Sir Thomas Coghill's house, at Blechington; went Wednesday, June 26th, to Brackley, to the college there, and stayed only one day; went thence to Dedington to the parsonage, and thence to Moreton Henmarsh."

Beneath "the Capital House" is engraved "the Chandos Testimonial," which was placed upon the dining-table at Stowe, immediately facing her Majesty. "Every friend and well wisher of his Grace," says the Bucks Herald, "and even the few (if they exist) who grudge him his well-merited popularity and exalted station in this country, must be in some manner acquainted with the origin and presentation of this magnificent piece of plate. They need not be told of its having been presented to his Grace by the people of Buckinghamshire, as a token of their high estimation of his services—of his public and political character, and of his private worth—they need scarcely be reminded of its beauties as a work of art. There, however, it stands, fulfilling its high destiny—that of being admired by our gracious Sovereign, who has bestowed upon it her close inspection." The inscription is as follows:—"Presented by a very numerous body of Farmers of Buckinghamshire, and other Friends connected with Agriculture, to RICHARD PLANTAGENET, DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM AND CHANDOS, K.G., K.C.H. and P.C., on the 18th day of May, 1842, to record their Admiration of Public Principles, steadily maintained in unsettled times, and as a tribute of respect and gratitude for his services whilst MARQUIS OF CHANDOS, as one of the Representatives of his native County in Parliament, where, for upwards of 30 years, he was the energetic, consistent, and successful Champion of the Agricultural Interests of the United Kingdom."

With this magnificent Testimonial we close our Illustrations of the Royal Visit to Stowe.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO STRATHFIELDSAYE.

Oh! Strathfieldsaye!
The happiest day
That ever grac'd thy warrior-home—
Was when our Queen
In peace was seen,
And quiet majesty, to come
Within thy walls,
And make their halls
Re-echo with the hymns of joy—
Neither the drum
Or "busy hum"
Of camp came thither to destroy
The sweet oblivion of that strife
Which has so long perplexed man's life! W.

On Monday afternoon, about half-past two o'clock, the Queen and Prince Albert left Windsor Castle, to pay their promised visit to the Duke of Wellington, at Strathfieldsaye.

Her Majesty was attended by the Marchioness of Douro, the Hon. Amelia Murray, the Earl of Jersey, and Lord Charles Wellesley.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert was attended by Mr. G. E. Anson and Colonel Bouverie.

The Royal party proceeded across Ascot-heath towards Bracknell, up to which place there were no preparations for welcoming her Majesty, deserving of particular detail. Opposite the Crispin, the escort was relieved by another party of the 17th Lancers, under the command of Captain Hayworth.

At Bracknell, though the place is small, the inhabitants had done the utmost the short notice rendered possible, to welcome their Sovereign. In this respect they presented an example of what must have struck those who have witnessed her Majesty's various progresses through the country—the extraordinary rapidity with which those preparations which have been so often described, and which are so similar in different places, are got up. No sooner is it known—and very often this is not till nearly the eleventh hour—that her Majesty is to pass along a particular route, however remote or rural, than a new life seems infused among the inhabitants, and all is bustle and excitement. Triumphal arches spring up in a night, in places where such things were scarcely heard of before. Flags and banners waved from the houses, processions are formed, addresses concocted (where the places visited are of sufficient importance), and such inroads are made upon the evergreens, for the formation of the various devices, and the decoration of the streets, that the visit of a swarm of locusts could not more effectually denude the trees and underwood. At Bracknell, the good folks did their utmost to make the village gay and handsome on the occasion of the visit of the Queen. There were no less than four triumphal arches of evergreens, one at the entrance, two at different points in the road through the place, and one at the other end, opposite the Red Lion Inn. The first arch was inscribed "Welcome," with "V." on one side, and "A." on the other. It was hung with flags. The second arch bore the inscription "Loyalty to the Queen," and was also hung with flags. The third was in some degree similar; and the fourth, that opposite the Red Lion Inn, was inscribed, "May happiness attend you," and also, "For God, the Queen, and the People." It was also hung with flags, and the front of the inn was very handsomely decorated with evergreens. Almost every house in the village was in some way adorned, in honour of her Majesty's visit. A considerable crowd had assembled, who cheered loudly as the Royal cortège drove up, a band playing the national anthem. Upwards of 300 charity children also were assembled, who were afterwards regaled at the expense of the inhabitants.

Here the Royal party changed horses, and the escort was also replaced by another party of the 17th Lancers, under the command of Captain Crawshaw. While the change of horses was taking place, the Queen was presented with a bouquet of beautiful flowers by Mrs. Croft. Her Majesty received it very graciously, and was most loudly cheered as she passed.

At Coppice Beech-lane-gate, a short distance further on, a handsome arch was thrown across the road.

THE TOWN OF WOKINGHAM, OR OAKINGHAM.

The chief preparations were made at Wokingham, a "corporate town," with an alderman (who is the chief magistrate), burgesses, and other officers. Here considerable exertions had been made to welcome her Majesty. As soon as the intended visit was made public, and it was known that the Queen would pass through the place, the alderman (Mr. Creaker), attended by some members of the Corporation and the Rev. Mr. Morris, went as a deputation to Windsor Castle to express the wish of the Corporation to present her Majesty with an address. At first, the answer was unfavourable; but, subsequently, an official communication was received, stating that her Majesty would receive this expression of loyalty as she passed. In the meanwhile, every arrangement had been made to give the Queen a suitable reception.

The town presented a scene of much animation. The streets through which her Majesty was to pass, and the houses of almost all the inhabitants on each side were decorated with arches, flags, and various devices, in honour of the Royal progress.

At the entrance to the town, near the church, on the London and Windsor-road, was erected a handsome arch, ornamented with laurels and evergreens of various kinds, bearing the inscription, "Welcome," composed of pink rosettes. A little further on at the entrance of Peach-street, was another arch, similarly composed, inscribed with the word "Victoria," in white and green colours; and in the centre of Peach-street, was a similar arch, bearing the inscription "Albert," in pink letters. At the extremity of Peach-street, at the entrance of the Market-place, was an exceedingly handsome arch, inscribed "Victoria and Albert;" and at the entrance to Broad-street, being the other extremity of the Market-place, was a beautiful arch, inscribed with the words, "God save the Queen," and surmounted by an elegant crown, composed of artificial flowers, beneath which was placed the garter, bearing the motto "Honi soit qui mal y pense."

At the further end of Broad-street, approaching Shute-end, was another arch, inscribed with the words "Welcome, Victoria," and which was also surmounted by a smaller crown. At the end of the town branching off into

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Bristol Reader."—The Golden Number is so called from its having been formerly written in gold letters in the almanacs, and owes its origin to the astronomer Meton, who lived at Athens B. C. 432. Ancient astronomers divided time into cycles, and it was Meton who founded the cycle of the golden number. A cycle is a period containing an exact number of any other periods—thus, it was formerly thought 235 revolutions of the Moon were exactly equal to 19 revolutions of the Sun, or in other words, the Sun and Moon would be in the same relative position once in 19 years: this is simply explained by a clock, by supposing the small and large hand together at 12 o clock, it will require twelve revolutions of the large and one of the small, or hour hand, before they are again in the same position; thus, the cycle of the minute hand would be exactly twelve hours, and the golden number in the same case would be the exact time as indicated by the clock; from this it will easily be understood that the actual golden number for any year, is the number of years expired of the cycle of 19 years. The golden number of this year (1845) is 3—this is found by adding one to 1845, and dividing by 19, the quotient gives the number of cycles, and the remainder the golden number, or number of years expired of the next cycle.—Easter-day is that which comes next after the day of the Paschal full Moon, or the full Moon which falls upon, or next after, the 21st of March. This rule was fixed by the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, to terminate the disputes which commenced in the second century—the Eastern Church keeping it on the 14th day of the first Jewish month, and the Western Churches on the night preceding the anniversary of the Saviour's resurrection. Tables are given in the Book of Common Prayer, showing the days on which the Paschal full Moon falls for each year during one cycle in 19 years.—The Dominical Letter (dies dominica—Sunday) for any year is the letter on which all the Sundays fall. To every day in the year is attached one of the first seven letters of the alphabet, A B C D E F G; the consequence is, that all days having the same letter fall on the same day of the week. In leap year, the 29th of February has no letter, hence every leap year has two dominical letters, the first for January and February, and the second for the rest of the year. The rule for ascertaining the dominical letter for any year is given in the Prayer Book, and is very simple.—The Epact is the number of days in the Moon's age at the beginning of the year.

THE EXCHANGE BELLS.—In answer to the "British Chanter," we beg to say, that the bells in the tower of the New Royal Exchange are tuned in the key of E flat, with A natural, and D flat, extra, to change the key into B or A flat; twelve of the bells are tuned in the diatonic scale, from E flat, third space in the bass, to B flat, third line in the treble clef.

THE COMPLETE SET OF FIFTEEN BELLS.

* The accidental, or extra notes, to change the key.

"E. W."—We have not room for the Division Lists.
"G. H.," Matlock.—Thanks.
"H. E.," Gloucester.—Try Great Portland-street. We know nothing of the pretended "astrologer."
"L. E. V. R."—It depends upon the courtesy of the Postmaster.
"O. Y."—The interest would, doubtless, be influential.
"Omegra," Fareham.—Try.
"O.," Newport, F. S.—The price of the two Nos. for Jan. 11, is 1s. (with Print gratis) to subscribers.
"A. F. G.," Langport, should subscribe for a quarter, to insure the receipt of the Large Print.
"C. H. W.," Newport; "E. K.," "C. B.," are entitled to the Large Print.
"J. H.," Lindfield.—Landlords of inns are finable only in cases of allowing play for money in their houses. The address of Messrs. Watkins and Hill, is Charing-cross.
"Irish Miller" should apply to some well established millwright.
"Giovanaccio."—Will our correspondent repeat his question?
"J. D. F.," Winton, probably refers to the lofty chimney of some chemical works near Glasgow; we have an impression that there has lately been completed in Ireland a chimney loftier than the preceding.
"R. R.," Bracknell, and Correspondents (Bourbon Fort) at Wokingham, are thanked.
"A Friend to Jack Sepoy."—The sketch and MS. have been unfortunately mislaid; will our correspondent oblige us with a copy of the same?
"Oxiensis."—A portrait of the Bishop of Exeter has already appeared in our journal—see No. XLVI.
"X. Q. C. X."—The drama will not suit.
"E. H.," Harrow, should show the print to some dealer in "Curiosities."
"An Irish Lady."—Possibly, to some dealer at the Soho Bazaar.
"Clare Castle."—Our correspondent's letter shall be attended to. With respect to his suggestion about the military notices in the Gazette, we beg to say that we always give them, as well as all other matters of interest connected both with army and navy.
"A Newcastle Sailor" asks, for the second time, "If the time-ball at Greenwich can be seen with a telescope by a vessel off the Isle of Wight?" The question must be left to his future experience.
"Hammersmith," and all others who require information respecting the "Portable Gas Lamp for Railways," should apply to the agent appointed by the inventors, Mr. J. Piper, of Shoreditch.
"An Original Subscriber" is informed that the crooks on the cornet-a-piston serve to adjust its pitch to that of other instruments, or orchestra, in a manner similar to those of the French horn or trumpet.
"M. M." makes several inquiries respecting our drawings of the Electro Magnetic Telegraph. We answer them in his own order:—1. The five wires comprise the suspended, and the branch and battery wires, besides another one devoted to the service of a small single wire telegraph, in use for private purposes. 2. The letters attached to the handles are Q's, inadvertently reversed in the engraving. 3. The magnet has only one of the coils shown. An exhibition of the second one, would have added nothing to the illustration of the principle on which the business proceeds. 4. The dial is divided into five circles for the letters, and a sixth for the pause. 5. We have examined the references in Fig. 4, and find them correct.
"Enquirer."—The "Son of Sirach" is the writer, or compiler, of one of the Apocryphal Books of the Bible, called "The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach." The following extract from the introduction to it (attributed to Athanasius) contains all that appears to be known on the subject: "This Jesus was the son of Sirach, and grandchild to Jesus of the same name with him; this man, therefore, lived in the latter times, after the people had been led away captive, and called home again, and almost after all the prophets." The Book of Wisdom is an imitation of the Proverbs of Solomon, and is described by Athanasius as containing "wise sayings, dark sentences, and parables, and certain ancient godly stories of men that pleased God."
"A. S. W. L." is thanked; but we have not room for the map. The pamphlet is well known.
"Juvenis."—"Spanish without a Master," Murray's English Grammar, and Goldsmith's History of Rome. The address named will serve.
"J. O.," Welford.—The only income of the Prince of Wales is the revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall. Our journal can be forwarded to any part by post.
"The Knave of Clubs."—We never heard of the alias.
"T. H.," Dublin.—The property belongs to the husband.
"P. G. C.," Brierly Hill, should remit 6s. 6d. to the office, and papers to that amount will be duly forwarded to him.
"Venator."—The self-priming gun has, we believe, been used by many persons.
"B. G.," Glasgow.—We do not remember the work referred to; but Malte-brun's Geography contains a variety of information as to superficial extent.
"A Jerseyman."—The latter is correct.
"R. W."—The sketch must be incorrect; as the cab met the fly waggon, when the accident occurred.
"M. M. O.," Ratcliff.—A residence in a parish, by one of the parties, is necessary before a marriage by bans can be solemnized.
"W. H.," Liverpool.—The charge to subscribers for the No. and Supplement was only 1s.—the Large Print gratis.
"S. H. S."—All Art-Unions, or Lotteries, are illegal.
"A. F. B.," Birmingham.—No. VI. of our journal contains a portrait of Mr. Muntz, M.P.
"A. B.," St. Paul's Church-yard, should apply to Messrs. Ward and Co., Paternoster-row.
"C. S. R.," Huddersfield.—We cannot entertain the proposition.
"A Subscriber from the Commencement."—The portraits in the "Beauties of the Opera" are in character costume, but cannot be purchased apart from the work.
"A Subscriber," Jersey.—The extension line of the South Western Railway, from Vauxhall to Waterloo-bridge, is not yet decided.
"De Grosbois."—Messrs. Ackermann publish a very good Elementary Drawing-book; Galignani's Guide to Paris.
"Cliff Acres," Leamington, should order the papers in question of any newsman.
"Gulielfilius," Stratford.—A man cannot legally marry his niece. We are glad to hear of the satisfaction expressed by the people of Buckinghamshire, at our engravings of last week.
"Senex" should address a letter to the agent of the Jamaica steam-vessels at Southampton.
"An Englishwoman" is thanked for her letter.
"G. H.," and "M. H."—We have more than once explained the origin of the Chiltern Hundreds in our journal.
"A Subscriber," Dover.—The suggestion shall not be lost sight of.
"Cato Censor."—Napoleon did leave the sum of money, as stated. Mr. Deville's address is near Exeter Hall, Strand.
"A. Smith," Cork, is entitled to the Large Print.
"J. W.," Heywood, Lancashire, may receive the copies, if he remits 2s.
"C. Eldred."—The necessity of the sign manual of the Sovereign, in cases of execution, has long been dispensed with.
"Publius," Winchester.—Our established circulation, weekly, is upwards of 60,000. The site of our office is indicated in the plan: the front of the house would have been impracticable.
"J. A. N.," Dublin, is thanked.
"F. D."—No. VIII. of our journal contains a sketch of Mr. Cobden, M.P.
"Modena."—Not at present.
"A Constant Subscriber," Buckingham, is not recommended to rely on the "inventions."
"Eastcheap."—We have already engraved the Statue of William IV. in Vol. II.
"J. S.," Truro.—Will our correspondent favour us with a sketch and description.
"E. D.," Twickenham.—We consider the person named to be liable for the debt.
"J. S.," Royal Leamington.—The price is 1s.
"Prerogative."—The words of her Majesty's reply are correctly reported.
"A Subscriber," Spitalfields, should apply to any music-seller.
"A. B.," Jersey, should write to any medallist, or to a dealer in gems.
"H. C. G.," Southwark.—Not at present.
"Verax," Bath.—The document sent is not a legal acknowledgment; and unless our correspondent has other evidence, we fear he will not recover.
"Bristol."—An invasion of patent can only be decided by an application to the Court of Chancery.
"T. S.," Bermondsey.—No.
"A Foreign Lady."—Roger North, in his "Examen," says the word Tory is the name for the wild Irish banditti, from the Irish, Toree, "give me;" it was first applied as a party term to the friends of the Duke of York, afterwards James II., during the agitation of the Exclusion Bill. "But," he adds, "it was not long before the Tories made full payment by the term Whig." This word, says the same authority, "was very significative, as well as ready, being vernacular in Scotland (from whence it was borrowed) for corrupt and sour whey."

An accident with the printing machines will prevent our usual supply in the country on Saturday morning. The indulgence of many of our subscribers is, therefore, requested.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY, 25, 1845.

THE near approach of the session of Parliament always awakes some degree of speculation as to what business will be done in it; the repeated experience of the very little that is actually effected in the way of improvement, does not at all damp expectation of the possibility of better things for the future, man fortunately being always left to the enjoyment of the "Pleasures of Hope." We are therefore tempted to indulge a little in anticipation, and hazard a guess or two at the subjects that will in all probability occupy the attention of the Legislature.

One of the first things to be settled is the Financial business of the year, and in this respect the Government will be able to meet Parliament with satisfaction and confidence, both in the present state and future prospects of the national revenue. But from this very advantage itself there springs a sort of embarrassment or difficulty. With a deficient income, no interest ventures to press on the Government the necessity of taking off the tax that peculiarly oppresses it. The Minister has then a cogent answer in readiness for all complainants, and can at least ask the parties if they are prepared with a substitute tax that will supply the sum they ask to have remitted—a query that does not admit of a speedy or satisfactory solution. But with the public coffers overflowing, all these interests urge their "favourite aversions" on the attention of the Minister, and loudly ask for relief. This is the case at the present moment. The agricultural interest are demanding the repeal of the Malt-tax; the manufacturers press the policy of abolishing the duty (a very slight one) on the importation of cotton wool. And other agitations there are, like Shylock's ventures, "squandered abroad." Thus at Bath and elsewhere there have been public meetings held for the purpose of procuring the repeal of the Window-tax. Commercial reformers, again, recommend the present juncture as a favourable opportunity for revising our Tariff and improving our commercial system. From all these symptoms it is evident enough that amongst the most important questions to be brought before Parliament will be those relating to taxation, or those of which taxation is the root and origin. First and chief of them stands the Property and Income Tax; it was imposed for three years certain, and the term expires in the month of April next. Some arrangement must be made respecting it during the ensuing session, and two points will have to be decided—first, can the Revenue afford to do without it altogether, and secondly, will the public feeling allow it to be continued without modification? To the first question, as the Property Tax at present realises five millions a year, we cannot hold out any hope of the answer being in the affirmative. Such a sum would be "a monstrous cantle out" of the total, and would infallibly have to be supplied by taxes of another kind. On the other hand, the need is not so urgent now as it was three years ago; the business of the country is better, and its monetary and commercial affairs in a more healthy state, and there is at the same time a very general feeling against that part of the Tax which is derived only from income, as it involves inquiries into trades, professions, and profits, which always have been and ever will be unpopular. In this state of things, the Ministry being hardly in a state to give up all, and the people having a great objection to the continuance of this portion, the probability appears to be that something in the nature of a compromise will be made, if any alteration at all is proposed. But if the people wish for one, they must press it forward themselves; if they remain supine and careless, they will assuredly have it inflicted on them for another term. If those who pay do not object to it, they cannot expect much anxiety to rid them of it to be shown by those who receive. Much, therefore, depends on the public, and whether they will exhibit the necessary activity in the matter remains to be seen.

Nothing can be said against the justice of a tax on property; all the machinery of Law and Government is kept up for its protection, and in proportion to the amount of that protection ought to be the contribution to the expense of giving it. But the uncertain and fluctuating incomes derived from skill in professions, and employments that cannot be conveyed to a successor, and which, at the utmost, only give the holder of them a life interest, ought not to be placed on the same footing as those of a more solid and tangible character. This is what is done by the Income-tax as it at present exists, and against a renewal of this injustice, we hope Parliament will exert itself. We believe the amount raised by the per centage on real property amounts to three millions out of the five; and as the revenue from the imports and consumption of the country is improving, as it exhibits a positive surplus, we think the part of the tax levied from income, being the least productive, and the most oppressive, might be remitted altogether. This would, in fact, remove the burden from labour, and place it altogether on capital, whether held in the form of land or money. A pamphlet has just appeared, called "Considerations on the Income-tax," by G. P. Bushe, Esq., in which the distinction between property and income is distinctly pointed out, and the principles on which the property-tax ought to be levied, laid down. The following is a brief abstract of his plan:—

To modify the present Income-tax, so as to convert it into a Property tax, which shall be levied upon every description of property in the United Kingdom, whether the proprietor of it reside at home or abroad.

To divide the tax-payers into at least two classes, namely, those who have merely a life interest in their property, and those who have it in absolute possession; these classes to pay different rates of tax.

To free entirely from the operation of this tax those persons who derive their incomes merely from their trades, occupations and professions; in fact to free labour as much as possible from this tax, and charge it only upon the interest of tangible capital.

To recognise the Property-tax as constituting one of the permanent sources of revenue.

Without giving our adherence to these proposals, to their full extent, we think they are worth consideration at the present juncture. If the tax on income cannot be remitted altogether—the "property" classes would perhaps oppose the exemption—it is still evident and certain that to lay the same amount of contribution upon one as the other, is an injustice that cannot too soon be remedied, and we remind the public that the approaching session will be the opportunity of doing so.

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

January 5th, 1845.

SIR,—My attention having been attracted by the following passage from a recent work on Scinde, I feel it a duty to offer a few observations in justice to a large body of men, whose official character and reputation has been grossly misrepresented by the author of the "Peninsular History:"—

"Lord Ellenborough found the finances embarrassed, the civil and political services infested with men greedy of gain, gorged with insolence, disdaining work, and intimately connected with the infamous press of India."

Such, Sir, is the language of the historian, whose turn for romance has arrived. Admitting the classical purity of the figures, how much to be regretted that the author's poetical conception of civilians and political servants in India is so different from the reality; that the "Napier" estimate seasoned by strong affection from Scinde, should be so much at variance with the opinions of several distinguished men, unconnected with the service, whose talents were acknowledged in Calcutta during the close of Lord W. Bentinck's administration. It chances that on this point information not confined to the "Author of the Romance." Recent events in other quarters of the globe will have proved satisfactorily that political sagacity can be thoroughly matured in India. But to return to the full-blown tissue of marvels regarding the civilians. The charge against them is, that they are gorged with insolence and disdain work: such was Lord Ellenborough's opinion during the first six months of his residence in India.

At one period of our history in the East, the charge of insolence and overbearing demeanour was said to have characterised that class of the Company's servants; but as I have passed eighteen years in the Indian army, may, perhaps, be permitted to remark, that for several years no bearing of the sort has been observed. I appeal to men, my brethren in arms, who have lived amongst civilians for years, for the truth of my assertion. With regard to their "disdaining work," I am confident that the majority perform their arduous daily duties with extreme attention, and their integrity is unquestionable. I may likewise add, that the Bengal Civil Service, at the present time, is particularly distinguished for great practical acquirements every department of science. But the author of the "Peninsular History" is against them, so is Sir Charles—a good soldier, but no statesman. His the late lamented General Nott been placed in command, the issue of affairs in that province would have been widely different.

In conclusion, I will fearlessly assert "That no military man in the Honourable Company's service was either depressed in spirit or deprived of his just allowances at the period stated by the author." Military men would no doubt be glad of an increase to their salary, but they feel and know that their position in that respect is more favourable than in the service of her Majesty.

Yours obediently, FIAT JUSTITIA.

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES OF THE WEEK.

En avant! Gallop on Gilpin! Ride away, Muse! Write away, Editor! Yes, no doubt you are in a hurry, sweet reader; sweet readers always are: they want everything sweet—tout de suite, in fact—but we cry you mercy for a moment. After all, a newspaper scribe is not exactly like a Thames steamer, or a Mississippi water-witch; you cannot at your own will "back him," nor "stop him," nor give him "a turn astern;" but you can considerately "ease him" a little by giving him breathing time as he goes a-head. Then there may be such things required as "arrangement of subject," "classification of ideas," and the like; and although we admit that the topics of a week are before us, yet even a literary Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot be supposed to carry his budget always ready in his brain! So mend your haste, reader, while we mend our pen; and now that we have cooled you down a little, we will unfold our marketing, and come at once to the Gaieties and Gravities of the World of News.

We suppose we may account it among the Gaieties that her Majesty has visited Strathfieldsaye, and made herself at home at the mansion of the honoured Duke. The bright, hilarious people have still strewn flowers upon her path, and turned out their happy faces and their holiday suits to bless and welcome her, with a respectful rural decorum; and triumphal arches have spanned the roads like magic; and loyalty has everywhere worn a bright aspect, and put on its sunshine and flowers, and spoken in its fanciful emblems, pleasant words of love. Bravo! this is all good and gracious as it should be; and no doubt the Duke, iron as he is, is alive to the pleasure around him—like other human folk; and, although full of honours, yet proud enough of this additional condescension and gratitude of the Sovereign towards her fine old warrior—her glorious Victory-chief. The fact of a Royal Visit to the Duke of Wellington becomes interesting by association, and a little reflection over the shining themes of our vast historical grandeur might invest it with the true beauty of poetry, and make it inspiring to the heart and thought.

Upon this subject we have a pet fancy which we should like to see brought into play. We should like to see—for once, and for once only—on some sunny eighteenth of June, a Royal—(Royal by the presence of our living Sovereign Royalty—) Waterloo banquet, her Majesty in person at the nation's feast, her maids of honour for the occasion selected from among the daughters of the old generals who fought at the grand battle of the peace of the world—the ladies of the Waterloo officers invited to shed proud glad smiles over the immortal trophies of the gorgeous board—and all the love and beauty and enthusiasm of that unique festival recorded in colours imperishable truth and splendour by some master painter—in a national picture for the pride and posterity of England. A ball might crown the feast, so that beating hearts and sparkling eyes might go home merrily from the great house of victory. And the spirit of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS, too, should be there (invisible, but in full dress), illustrating everything to minute perfection, so that through its columns all the world should be present at that jubilee, as it has been (led by the same faithful guide), at every scene of national import in the land!

Now for a bit of characteristic merriment.

The Duke of Wellington "presented his compliments" to some newspaper reporter, and "didn't see what his house at Strathfieldsaye had to do with the public press!" This was capital, and so completely the manner Laconic almost to a glory! Cool almost to an icicle! Gurwood's dispatches as traits of character, will be scarcely complete without this document:—

REPORTER TO DUKE.

Mr. Reporter here presents
His confidential compliments,
And begs permission to go through
The house of the "Hero of Waterloo."
Trusting his Grace will grant no less,
To "A Gentleman of the Public Press.,

Here is the characteristic reply of

THE DUKE TO THE REPORTER.

The Duke presents
His compliments,
And begs to say,
In words a few,
That Stratfieldsaye
Has nought to do,
More or less,
With "Public Press."

And this was instead of the pressing invitation which the gentleman of the press expected!

But great people die as well as live; and (although we cry a much longer life to the Duke) the Earl of St. Germain has passed away from the world; and, as a consequence, Lord Eliot, who takes the title, ceases to be Secretary for Ireland. We did not, before this event know that he was a kinsman of Lord Heytesbury—and that there was a connection of relationship, as well as administration-ship between them. This is an odd fact to have escaped public attention, and we do not think it could have been known in Ireland, or there would have been a pretty charge of compliments upon the park lodges both of Secretary and Viceroy. Who is to be the new Secretary? Reader! hast thou no gossip in thee that thou canst not give us a surmise while we write? To do Eliot justice, now that he is coming away, we believe him to have been liberally disposed towards the people, and to have had the welfare of Ireland at heart, though he was somewhat gauche occasionally in the manner of showing his solicitude.

But now is the time to make a rare choice of a Secretary. Bestir thyself sagaciously, O Peel!

Dan has come from Darrynane,

And is very busy haranguing the nation
In the beautiful hall of Conciliation—
Oh! but the funds that have gathered that way
Have made 'em reduce the Repaler's pay;
Less are the salaries, less are the fees
Of all the hard-workers except the M.P.'s;
There's poor Lord Killmallock, cut slick off we fear,
Is it of no use to pay him to keep the peace here?
And the Hall says it now can't afford him a farden
For filling the office of head Repeal Warden;
And Duffy, and Davis, and boys of the Nation
Are in a condition of sad tribulation
That young Blood of Erin (as yet all undropt)
Should—in Circulation—be suddenly stopt,
By the Hall not affording—as if to confuse all—
To take in quite so many papers as usual!

Tom Steele, meanwhile, has been putting down Ribbandmen and Ribbandism by the yard; but, nevertheless, there has been a great purchase of ribands of riband-women in Dame-street. Dan says he's quite satisfied with the Pope now, and the rescript is all right, and as Cannon-i-kill as the great gun of Athlone! But he is going against the Bequests Bill, and there is still a considerable shindy among the priests.

* * * * * * *

Our own clergy are battling too. This is not as it should be. These Sunday riots at Exeter are disgraceful in the extreme. They mock religion, and the pastor can scarcely be a true one who only scares his flock! These schisms of form rather than of doctrine are obnoxious to the people; and without meddling with church controversy, we may just hint that there is nothing so revolting to pious feeling as religious discord, or the shadow of a mutiny in the citadel of Christ.

* * * * * * *

We do not look sufficiently to the poor. There is a horrid case in the papers of a destitute woman with a whole flock of starving children being committed at Canterbury for the stealing a broom, for which she is to be tried, convicted, punished, and her children thrown into the workhouse for her maternal dishonesty (for she exchanged the broom for bread), the poor rate to pay for the children, and the county for the trial. Oh, for a sound, discretionary power of summary jurisdiction! We cannot help thinking that if everbody who could afford to "call music" from a "Canterbury," and to ride in a Brougham, had pitied this awful case of street-walking destitution, the broom at Canterbury would never have been stolen!

France has been very kind to us this week. Admiral Dupetit Thouars has refused the sword which the Republicans subscribed for him, wherewith to cut the throat of perfidious Albion; and the said Albion is very likely in consequence to remain whole in the carotid artery. The generous old King has been gold-snuff-boxing Mitchell, and diamond-poignarding Macready. Mitchell, who got 3000 francs besides from the King, is, on account of the poignard present, going to have Macready's portrait dagger-a-typed the moment he arrives. It was owing to the way in which he looked daggers in Hamlet that Louis Philippe hit upon the appropriate gift of the poignard.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY'S RETURN FROM STRATHFIELDSAYE.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—This afternoon, at half-past two o'clock, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived at the Castle, from Strathfieldsaye, in a close travelling carriage and four, escorted by a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards (blue). The following members of the Royal household came after her Majesty and the Prince in two other of the Royal carriages and four. The Marchioness of Douro, Lady in Waiting; the Honourable Amelia Murray, Maid of Honour; Lord Charles Wellesley, Equerry in Waiting; Col. Bouverie, Equery to Prince Albert, and Mr. G. E. Anson, his Royal Highness's Private Secretary. Her Majesty, when alighting at the Queen's entrance, was received by the Hon. Lucy Maria Kerr, Viscount Sydney, Captain the Hon. Alexander Nelson Hood, and Captain Meynell, by whom her Majesty was attended to her private apartments. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Fanny Howard, will have the honour of joining the Royal dinner circle this evening.

PROJECTED VISIT OF THE ROYAL FAMILY TO BRIGHTON.—Brighton will shortly be honoured with a visit from a portion of the Royal Family—we believe the Royal children. During the last two or three days, preparations have been going on at the Palace, such as laying down the carpets, lighting fires, &c., for the reception of the Royal Family; and Mr. Henry Saunders, Inspector of Palaces, has arrived there for the purpose of giving the usual instructions.

DEATH OF LORD ASTON.—We regret to notice the death of this venerable nobleman, which occurred at the vicarage, Tardebigg, in Worcestershire, on Tuesday. The Right Hon. and Rev. Walter Hutchinson Lord Aston was an Irish peer, and the last surviving member of his family, male or female, consequently the title is extinct. The living of Tardebigg (of which the Hon. R. H. Clive, M.P., of Hewell Grange, is patron) becomes vacant by his lordship's demise.

ILLNESS OF THE EARL OF MORNINGTON.—We regret to state that the Earl of Mornington is seriously indisposed. The inquiries at his house have been very numerous during the week, and the latest account of his health was somewhat more favourable, but it is feared that he is in a dangerous position.

ILLNESS OF LORD FRED. BEAUCLERK.—We lament to state that the Rev. Lord Fred. Beauclerk, uncle of the Duke of St. Alban's, is lying in a very precarious condition from a paralytic attack, at the family residence, in Lower Grosvenor-street. The use of the right side is entirely gone for the present, and his lordship still labours under the want of the power of speech. Hopes are, however, entertained of his recovery.

DEATH OF THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S.—This venerable nobleman died on Sunday morning last, at his seat, Port Eliot, St. German's, Cornwall, in his 78th year, and is succeeded in the peerage by his eldest son, Lord Eliot, Secretary for Ireland, whose elevation causes a vacancy in the representation of East Cornwall. The noble earl was seized with a spasmodic attack in the early part of the week, a complaint his lordship was subject to, but at first no positive alarm was created. The late earl was, as a politician, a Conservative, and possessed considerable election interest in Cornwall, having previous to the Reform Bill returned four members to the House of Commons; but of late years his lordship has not interfered in the opinions of his contented tenantry, nor indeed at any time did he exercise his political sentiments in a way oppressive to his dependents.

DEATH OF SIR COLIN MACKENZIE.—We have to announce the death of Sir Colin Mackenzie, of Kilcoy, Baronet, who expired at his seat in Rossshire (Belmudothy House), on the 16th inst. The deceased baronet was convener of the county of Ross for many years, and, as such, was highly popular.

DEATH OF REAR ADMIRAL SAMUEL JACKSON, C.B.—We have to notice the demise of the above flag officer, who expired on Thursday week, at Bognor, in Sussex. He had seen a great deal of active service. He was nominated a companion of the order of the Bath in Dec., 1815. The deceased was in his 73d year.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE CLERGY IN THE DIOCESE OF EXETER.

It appears by the Exeter papers that the disgraceful proceedings already noticed by us at Exeter, were repeated on Sunday last.

At St. Sidwell's, at the conclusion of the service, the Rev. F. Courtenay, the curate, after leaving was received by a mob of about 600 to 700 persons, with partial groans, which were in some measure suppressed by the presence of a few policemen, who took down the names of such as gave vent to their feelings, with a view to summoning them to appear before the magistrates. In this manner he was escorted to his house, in Southernhay, wearing his academical gown, and supported on either side by R. S. Cornish, Esq., and the Rev. A. Atherly, the dense mob at intervals giving vent to their dislike in astounding groans. Not the least attempt at personal violence was made. In the afternoon the same scene was repeated on a smaller scale, not more than half the number being present.

ST. STEPHEN'S.—The parishioners met in vestry on Saturday, and requested their minister, the Rev. Mr. Toye, to resign, in consequence of the alterations in the services of the church, which have been introduced by the rector.

ST. PAUL'S.—In this parish some popular attestation of feeling was expected, but none arose, although the surplice was worn in the morning and afternoon.

ALPHINGTON.—The rector of Alphington, a village near Exeter, last week informed his parishioners that he would abandon the surplice, which he had used for many years. The rev. gentleman is a prebendary of the Exeter chapter, and as such had been accustomed to wear the surplice in his own parish. The parishioners met the week before last, and unanimously resolved to request him to forego the use of the surplice. At first he acceded to the request, and said he would wear his gown instead of his surplice, but after reading the late letter of the Bishop of Exeter, the rector retracted all he had said, and told his parishioners that he was so perplexed as to the most peaceable course to adopt as to the surplice, that he must write to the Bishop for further advice.

SALE OF A VALUABLE CHURCH LIVING.—On Tuesday the perpetual advowson, with the next presentation to the living of Trimley, St. Martin, in the county of Suffolk, was disposed of at the Auction Mart. The incumbent is in his 86th year. The auctioneer stated the value of it to be £7000. The first sum offered was £4000, and it was knocked down after a spirited competition for £5950.

THE NEW TEST.—There is no longer any doubt that the Hebdomadal Board of Oxford has determined to abandon the new test, which was to have been proposed to the Convocation along with the motion for the condemnation of Mr. Ward.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

DEATH OF A COMMISSIONER OF BANKRUPTS.—Sir C. F. Williams, Knight, one of the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, died on Saturday last of an affection of the heart. Rumour gives the appointment to Mr. Sergeant Atcherley, who has several times gone the circuit for Judges, or to Mr. Whateley, the Queen's Counsel; but it is also said, that some of the country commissioners have promises of being advanced to London as vacancies might occur.

ST. KATHARINE DOCKS.—On Tuesday a half-yearly general meeting of the proprietors of the St. Katharine Docks was held in the Dock house, Towerhill; Thomas Tooke, Esq., in the chair. It appeared from the accounts of the receipts and expenditure of the company, that the balance brought forward to the credit on the 1st of January last was £112,911 18s. 5d., and that the like balance on the 1st inst. was £99,834 4s. 3d. The balance on the 1st instant, therefore, was less, as compared with the corresponding date of the last year, by £13,077 14s. 2d., and that the diminution in the net earnings, during the past year, had been less than those of the preceding year by £4804 12s. 10d. The directors recommended the declaration of a dividend of 2½ per cent. on the capital stock of the company for the six months ending the 31st of December last, which was agreed to.

ENTERTAINMENT AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.—The Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress gave a very elegant entertainment to the Aldermen and their ladies, and to some of the principal officers of the corporation and their ladies, on Tuesday. There were amongst those present Aldermen Lucas, Farebrother, Kelly, Wilson, Marshall, Sir John Pirie, Humphery, Farncomb, Hooper, Wood, Johnson, Charles Hughes, Hughes, Moon, Hunter, and Sidney (Sheriffs), the Chamberlain, Mr. Masterman, M.P., the City Solicitor, Mr. Secondary James, Mr. Secondary Potter, the Town Clerk, the Comptroller, &c. It was a full dress party, and all the Aldermen came in their scarlet gowns. The company assembled in the state drawing-rooms, and went through the saloon to the long parlour, in which the dinner was laid out. All the massive gold and silver plate of the Mansion-house decorated the sideboard, and the great silver epergne which was presented by the Board of Guardians of the City of London Union to the Lord Mayor as chairman of the board, stood in the middle of the cross table. Tea and coffee were served in the saloon. The company separated at eleven.

ST. CLEMENT DANES.—The excellent rector has addressed his parishioners in support of a third (additional) service on Sunday evenings, at St. Clement Danes Church; for which object a collection will be made in the morning and evening of to-morrow (Sunday). Out of the proceeds the rector proposes to augment the stipend of one of his curates; and this being considered, in connection with the largely increasing evening congregation, doubtless, our fellow parishioners will respond liberally to an appeal for so meritorious a purpose.

THE TESTIMONIAL TO MR. ROWLAND HILL.—The chairman of the City of London Mercantile Committee on Postage, Sir George Larpent, has sent a complimentary letter to Mr. Rowland Hill, inclosing a copy of some resolutions of the committee, and also a cheque for £10,000—part of the money subscribed for a testimonial. Mr. Hill, in his answer, acknowledges the receipt of the cheque, and says—"As the committee intimate their intention, at some future period, of making a public presentation of the fruits of their labours, I would respectfully request permission to defer till such time all attempt to express my obligations to themselves (my fellow-labourers in the cause of Post-office improvement), and the feelings of pride and gratitude with which I accept so splendid a proof of the sympathy and approbation of my countrymen."

VICTORIA PARK, BONNER'S HALL PALACE.—The residence of Bishop Bonner, which was situated in Bishop Bonner's-fields, upon the site of the intended Victoria-park, and which was sold about three weeks since, by order of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, is nearly levelled with the ground. In the course of the demolition of the building a great many coins were found by the workmen, of the reigns of Elizabeth, Henry VIII., Edward VI., &c., many of which were in good preservation. Upon removing the foundation of the side of the palace two human skulls were found. The man who dug them up left them in the ground during his absence at dinner, and on his return some unknown person had taken possession of them. A few days ago a pair of richly embroidered slippers were found with pointed toes, which were sold for 8s. 6d., but which are stated to be of a much greater value. The structure itself is composed of bricks (some of which have been ascertained to be of Roman manufacture), chalk, and stone, and the wood is of the oak and chesnut tree. A bat in a dormant state was also found, but on being exposed to the air recovered animation and flew away.

REPORTED MINISTERIAL CHANGES.—It is generally rumoured in political circles (but we do not vouch for the correctness of the report), that Mr. Sidney Herbert will succeed Lord Eliot as Secretary for Ireland, and Mr. Corry will replace Mr. Herbert as principal Secretary of the Admiralty.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The table of the mortality in the metropolis for the week ending January 18, shows a decrease in the number of deaths as compared with the preceding week, the total, except from violence, in the week ending January 18 being 1001, while in the week ending January 11 it was 1098. By far the larger number of deaths during the past week have been from diseases of the lungs and organs of respiration, the number of deaths attributed to this cause being 325, including no less than 146 cases of consumption. The total number of deaths, including deaths from violence, during the past week, in the metropolitan district, is 1010. The total number of births in the metropolitan district during the same period is 1331. During the week three males died, of the respective ages of ninety, ninety-two, and ninety-four years, and one female died at Kennington at the age of a hundred and five years.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC

It is now proved beyond a doubt that the account of the death of the Emperor of Russia was a fabrication. Letters from St. Petersburgh of the 7th inst., state that on the preceding day (the Christmas of the Greek communion) a solemn service was celebrated in the court chapel of the Winter Palace. The Emperor and Empress were present. During that day, which is one of thanksgiving for the delivery of Russia from the invaders of 1792, the cannons on the ramparts of the Peter and Paul fortress were fired at regular intervals. There was a grand reception at court after mass.

A letter from St. Petersburgh, dated Jan. 9, says "We have received positive information that Dr. Wolff, who has arrived at Teheran, from Bokhara, will return home by way of Russia and St. Petersburgh. We hope to see him here very shortly."

According to an account from Florence, dated the 2nd of January, the Duchess de Berri had arrived the day before. Two representations of operas given by the family of Poniatowski have augmented their reputation of benevolence, and have procured to the poor the sum of 15,000f. Prince Buonaparte Demidoff has signalised himself by his great generosity towards the sufferers in the late floods. The succours for the last-mentioned amount, according to the Florence Gazette, to the sum of 229,613f.

A complete costume of a Knight of the Order of the Garter, highly enriched with embroidery, being a present to his Majesty King Louis Philippe from Queen Victoria, has arrived in Paris.

The Augsburgh Gazette states that the King of Bavaria has given orders to complete as soon as possible the preliminary works for a line of railway from Bamberg to Aschuffenburg vid Wurtzburgh.

The giraffe of the Garden of Plants, Paris, presented in 1827 by Mehemet Ali to Charles X., has just died, and consequently has lived in that climate about 17 years.

The Revue de Paris states that a very serious illness has attacked the Empress of Russia, and has put an end to all the balls and soirées of St. Petersburg.

According to the Prussian Universal Gazette, the revenue of Prussia has increased in seven years upwards of five millions and a half reichsthalers, or from 51,740,000r., in 1835, to 57,402,000r. in 1842.

At the meeting of the Horticultural Society, held on Tuesday, Dr. Lindley exhibited some oranges of fine quality from Colonel Reid, Governor of the Bermudas. On account of the probable destruction of the orange orchards in the Western Islands, the attention of the local government had been earnestly turned to the subject, and it was probable that this fruit would in future form an extensive article of import from this colony. The quality of the fruit is excellent.

Mr. James Waterhouse Smith, who died on the 5th inst., has bequeathed the following sums (in the Three per Cent. Consols) to the undermentioned charities:—To the British and Foreign Bible Society, £2000; to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, £2000; to the Metropolis Church Building Fund, £2000; to the Middlesex Hospital, £2000; to the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church, £1000; to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, £2000; and has directed the whole to be paid, free of duty, within three months after his decease.

We learn from the Comercio, a Lima paper, of the 4th of Sept., that on the preceding evening two smart shocks of an earthquake had been experienced in that city. At the second shock the greater part of the inhabitants quitted their houses, and sought refuge in the squares and open places. Fortunately, however, no damage was occasioned by the earthquake, which appears to have been one of the smartest that has been experienced for many years.

By an ordonnance of the King of Denmark, recently published, the standing army of the Danish States for the present year is to be composed of 20,900 troops of the line, 18,956 as the war reserve, and 58,816 Landevaern (militia), forming a total of 98,672 men.

The Princess Royal of Bavaria is in that happy state so devoutly to be wished by lords who love their ladies. This circumstance is of the more importance, as, in the event of the birth of a Prince, the direct succession of the present dynasty will be maintained.

An extraordinary Federal Diet will, it is said, be convoked for the end of February, for the resolution of the Jesuit question, which keeps Switzerland in such a state of ferment.

POSTSCRIPT.

NEW PROJECTED RAILWAYS.

(From the London Gazette of last evening.)

Railway Department, Board of Trade, Whitehall, Jan. 24.

Notice is hereby given that the Board constituted by the Minute of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, of the 24th of August, 1844, for the transaction of railway business, having had under consideration the following schemes for completing the eastern line of railway communication to Scotland, viz.:—The Northumberland Railway, with Branch from Berwick to Kelso; the Newcastle and Berwick Railway, with Branch from Berwick to Kelso, have determined on reporting to Parliament in favour of the Newcastle and Berwick Railway, with Branch to Kelso; and against the Northumberland Railway, with Branch from Berwick to Kelso; and the Board having had under consideration the following schemes for extending railway communication in the districts of Norfolk and Suffolk, viz.:—The Bury and Ipswich Railway; the Diss, Beccles, and Yarmouth; the Diss and Colchester; the Direct East Dereham and Norwich; the Diss and Colchester—Bedham and Doddon Branches; the Eastern Counties—Colchester and Bury Extension; the Ipswich and Norwich Extension; the Lynn and Ely; the Lynn and East Dereham the London and Norwich Direct; the Norwich and Brandon — Diss and Dereham Branches; the Wells and Thetford, have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the Bury and Ipswich; Ipswich and Norwich Extension; Lynn and Ely; against the Diss and Colchester; Eastern Counties; Colchester and Bury Extension; London and Norwich direct; Norwich and Brandon — Diss Branch; Wells and Thetford; and recommending the postponement, until a future period, of the Direct East Dereham and Norwich; Norwich and Brandon—Dereham Branch; Lynn and East Dereham; Diss, Beccles, and Yarmouth; Diss and Colchester—Redham and Lodden Branches. And the Board having had under consideration the following schemes for extending railway communication to the north and north-west of Ireland, viz.:—The Belfast and Ballymena Railway; the Dublin and Belfast Junction, with Branch to Drogheda and Kells; the Dublin and Drogheda—Howth Branch; the Dundalk and Enniskillen; the Great North Western (Irish); the Northern Railway, inland line (Armagh to Dublin); the Newry and Enniskillen; the Ulster Railway—Extension from Portadown to Armagh, have determined on reporting to Parliament in favour of Belfast and Ballymena; Dublin and Belfast Junction, with Branch to Drogheda and Kells; Dublin and Drogheda—Howth Branch; Ulster Extension—Portadown to Armagh. And of the Dundalk and Enniskillen (with the exception of the Monaghan Branch); Newry and Enniskillen (with the exception of the portion of the line between Newry and Armagh); subject to equitable arrangements for the construction and joint use of the line between Enniskillen and Clones, common to the two schemes. And also for improving the railway communication by the Belfast Junction line to Newry, and for securing due facilities to the Newry traffic. And against the Great North-Western (Irish); Northern Railway, inland line (Armagh to Dublin).

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office yesterday; all the Ministers in town were present. Previous to the Council Sir James Graham, the Earl of Aberdeen, and several of the Ministers had interviews with Sir Robert Peel, at the right hon. bart.'s residence in Whitehall Gardens.

THE EARL OF MORNINGTON.—We are happy to state that the venerable Earl of Mornington is considered so much better that his medical attendants do not consider any surgical operation necessary. The latest answer to inquiries in Grosvenor-square, was, that his lordship was much better.

We regret to learn that Colonel Sibthorp is alarmingly indisposed.

LEGAL CHANGES.—We have reason to believe that the elevation of Mr. Platt to the bench in the room of Mr. Baron Gurney has been decided upon, but the appointment will not take place immediately. Mr. Horace Twiss is, we understand, to be the new Commissioner of Bankrupts; and Mr. Sergeant Acherley, it is said, will succeed Mr. Twiss as Vice Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

THE FURTHER USE OF THE SURPLICE FORBIDDEN BY THE BISHOP OF EXETER.—In consequence of the outrage which was attempted upon the Rev. Mr. Courtenay, last Sunday afternoon, when he was followed by a mob of more than 6000 persons, a requisition, signed by the principal householders of the city of Exeter, was sent to the Mayor on Tuesday last, requesting him to write to the Bishop of Exeter, suggesting the propriety of his interference with the Rev. Mr. Courtenay, and several others of the clergy in the diocese of Exeter who still persist in the use of the surplice. The Mayor accordingly wrote to the Bishop upon the subject, and has received an answer from the right rev. prelate, promising immediately to write to the respective clergymen mentioned, and forbid the future use of the surplice in the pulpit.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY, Jan. 24th.—(From our own Correspondent.)—At a congregation just held, the following degrees were conferred:—Honorary M.A.: The Hon. J. Gifford, Emmanuel College; The Hon. W. Cecil Spring Rice, Trinity College;—B.A.: Henry Newport, Pembroke College; John Taylor, St. John's College.

REPRESENTATION OF EAST CORNWALL.—The elevation of Lord Eliot having caused a vacancy in the representation of East Cornwall, there is already some stir among the electors. Mr. Carew, it is said, will offer himself in the Conservative interest. Mr. Robartes, son of Lady Agar, is mentioned as the Whig candidate. The new writ cannot be issued till the meeting of Parliament.

FRENCH PLAYS.—The season of French plays will be commenced on Monday evening by the engagements of Mons. Lafant, of the Theatre des Variétés, and Mdlle. Nathalie, of the Theatre du Gymnase.

THE ALLEGED FRAUD UPON THE EXCISE BY MESSRS. SMITH.—The Commissioners of Excise have been summoned to attend at Worship-street Police-office for having taken up the pavement near Messrs. Smith's distillery, in search of concealed pipes, without having previously obtained permission from the Commissioners of Pavement. The parties appeared by their solicitors yesterday, but the affair was postponed till the case is decided in the Court of Exchequer.

THE TALACRE COAL AND IRON COMPANY.—The case of John Davis, an insolvent, which involved a question concerning the liability of directors of public companies to the Bankrupt laws, was decided yesterday in the Court of Bankruptcy. The insolvent appeared to obtain his final order, he having on several previous occasions been before the Court, when it appeared that he was a Director of the Talacre Coal and Iron Company, which was stated to be in debt to the amount of £30,000, and in which it was alleged he held a large amount of paid up shares, exclusive of others which he held in the West Cork Mining Company, the St. George Harbour Company, and in several other speculations. After hearing evidence for and against the insolvent, Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque said the evidence proved that the Company was a trading Company; the insolvent was evidently a member of it—and in so far being a trader, his petition must be dismissed.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—TRIUMPH OF THE FRENCH MINISTRY ON THE ADDRESS.

The preparatory debate on the Address in the Chamber of Deputies terminated on Thursday by the adoption of the first paragraph, relating to Morocco. M. de Carne attacked the policy pursued by Ministers in regard to this question, and proposed an amendment to this effect:—

"Our labours ended a few months ago in the midst of complications that clearsighted and firm conduct might have prevented or terminated in a more satisfactory manner."

The amendment was supported by Messrs. Cremieux and Billault, and opposed by M. De Gasparin and the Minister of the Interior, after which, the question was put to the vote, when there appeared—

Against the amendment	225
For it	197
Majority for Ministers	—28

This result did not take place till a late hour on Thursday evening, so that the effect it had in Paris is not yet known.

This majority, although perhaps less than may have been expected by the most strenuous supporters of the Government, is, in our opinion, indicative of the triumph of the Ministers over the Coalition party, because, although the division took place only upon one paragraph, it involved the question of the general policy of the Cabinet. In the previous sitting M. Thiers made a fierce attack upon the Government, which was answered by M. Guizot, and the result shows that the Minister for Foreign Affairs was successful in his defence.

ITALY.—SERIOUS ILLNESS OF THE POPE.—Letters recently from Rome assert that the Pope is in a most alarming state. His Holiness is upwards of 79 years of age.

PRESENTATION OF THE ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY, AT WOKINGHAM.

the Barkham-road, leading towards Strathfieldsaye, was another arch, similarly composed, and bearing the inscription "Wellington."

The Town-hall was elegantly ornamented with evergreens, and was surmounted by the Royal standard, and several union-jacks and smaller flags.

At the foot of the Town-hall, opposite to which her Majesty received the address, were erected benches for the accommodation of the several National, British, charity, and other endowed schools of the parish. These benches were filled by about 600 children, all of whom were neatly clad, and who gave a most hearty welcome to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

The several benefit societies, bearing their respective flags, and adorned with colours, paraded the town with their bands playing various loyal and constitutional airs in honour of her Majesty.

Her Majesty, on her entrance into the town, was received by the members of the Wokingham Royal Agricultural Society on horseback, and the various benefit societies (with the exception of the Odd Fellows, who were stationed in the market-place), the bands playing "God save the Queen."

The Market-place, in particular, was a scene of great gaiety. The Royal carriages stopped for a few moments while the address was presented by the Recorder, Mr. Jeremy, who, in presenting it, said:—

"May it please your Majesty,—We beg to present to your Majesty this loyal and dutiful address of the aldermen, recorder, burgesses, clergy, and inhabitants of this ancient town and borough of Wokingham, within the precincts of the Royal Forest of Windsor, and to convey the expression of our heartfelt pleasure and gratitude for your Majesty's gracious act of condescension, in permitting us to offer it in your august presence. There is no place in your Majesty's dominions where your Majesty and your illustrious Consort can receive a sincerer homage or more cordial welcome. Our chief magistrate tenders to your Majesty this mace, the insignia of our corporate authority, held under the charter granted by your Majesty's most illustrious predecessor of glorious memory, Queen Elizabeth; and now, after the lapse of nearly 300 years, in laying it at the feet of your Majesty, her beloved and illustrious successor, we trust we may say that it has never been tarnished or dishonoured by any abuse of the power it represents."

The address, which was handed, by command, to the Earl of Jersey, was as follows:

"TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

"Most Gracious Sovereign.—We, the aldermen, recorder, burgesses, clergy, and inhabitants of the town of Wokingham, in the counties of Berks and Wilts, incorporated by the charter of your Majesty's Royal predecessor, Queen Elizabeth, avail ourselves of the permission so graciously accorded to approach your Majesty with an address expressive of our sincere and loyal attachment to your Majesty's person and to the throne.

"We thank your Majesty with the deepest feelings of respect for the high honour this day conferred on this town and neighbourhood by your Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and we hail the memorable event of your Majesty's visit to Strathfieldsaye with those emotions of gratification and delight which any token of your Majesty's Royal regard to its illustrious possessor must naturally inspire in the hearts of his fellow-subjects.

"Your Majesty's known solicitude or the welfare of all classes of your Majesty's subjects emboldens us to take this occasion to offer our humble thanks to your Majesty on behalf of the agricultural society established at this place, on which your Majesty and his Royal Highness continue to bestow your Royal patronage and support.

"In conclusion, we beg to tender to your Majesty the expression of our fervent aspirations for every blessing that may conduce to the happiness of your Majesty and your Royla Consort; and that your Majesty may long live to witness the continuance of that prosperity and contentment of which your Majesty's happy reign has hitherto afforded such unexampled proofs.

"Signed on behalf of the meeting,

"THOMAS CREAKER, Alderman."

Her Majesty replied to Mr. Jeremy, "I am very glad to receive it." Her Majesty smiled repeatedly during the ceremonial. The Engraving at page 56 shows this interesting scene.

The Alderman then presented the mace, which her Majesty touched, and then returned to Mr. Creaker, with a gracious bow.

Among the gentry who accompanied the Corporation were Mr. R. Palmer, M.P.; Mr. J. L. Gower, Mr. James Hayward, Mr. Edmund Currie, the Rev. Mr. Cameron, Major Court, the Rev. Horace Roberts, Mr. Henry St. John, and the committee who had the management of the preparations.

Immediately after the Queen passed, all the charity children sang "God save the Queen."

The "capital burgesses" present were Mr. Horne, Mr. J. R. Wheeler, Mr. Heelas, Mr. J. L. Roberts, Mr, Quinterry, and Mr. Towse. Mr. Trickey, the Town Clerk, and the Rev. Mr. Marshall, were also among the authorities there. The Rev. Mr. Morres was prevented attending by official duty elsewhere.

Considering the comparative smallness of the town, the reception given to her Majesty at Wokingham, reflected great credit on the loyalty and liberality of the inhabitants. Almost every house bore decorations; the windows and streets were crowded; and the shouts with which the Queen was received were loud, long, and unanimous. The Market-place was densely crowded.

The windows of the houses were thrown open in the line of the procession, and handkerchiefs, scarfs, &c., waved in all directions as a greeting to the Royal travellers. Devices of all descriptions adorned the fronts of the houses. That of Mr. Gotelee, of the stamp-office, bore the following nscriptions ' beneath the Royal arms —"Welcome, Victoria, the People's Pride;" "Agriculture and Commerce;" "The Liberty of the Press;" "Victoria and Albert, may they ever Merit the Esteem of Every Honest Heart."

Loyalty was everywhere apparent, and if it occasionally displayed itself in characters calculated to raise a smile, or even a broad laugh, it was oy alty nevertheless—

As sun shine broken in a rill,
Though turned astray, is sunshine still."

Immediately after the presentation of the address, her Majesty pursued her route to Strathfieldsaye, followed, as at her entrance into the town, by the hearty cheers of the inhabitants.

Wokingham continued in a state of great though pleasurable excitement for a long time after her Majesty's departure. Bands paraded the town, and every countenance gave ample testimony that the 20th of January was conceived to be a great day for Wokingham. The Royal party proceeded through the town at a slow pace till they passed under the arch inscribed "Wellington," after which they proceeded more rapidly towards Strathfieldsaye.

At Barkham there was a triumphal arch, decorated and hung with flags. Here the people cheered her Majesty vociferously.

At Arborfield there was a triumphal arch, ornamented with flags, opposite the Bull (Mr. Wortley's). Here her Majesty changed horses; and was received by a large concourse of people in the most enthusiastic manner.

At a distance of about four miles further on, at Swallowfield, her Majesty's escort was again changed. A party of the Hants Yeomanry, commanded by Colonel the Right Hon. C. Shaw Lefevre (Speaker of the House of Commons), became the escort of her Majesty on to Strathfieldsaye, which is about four miles distant. (See the Engraving at page 56.)

The road in the immediate neighbourhood of Strathfieldsaye was sprinkled plentifully with spectators, many in vehicles, and still more on foot. There were also many horsemen, some of them tenants of the Duke, and as the different bodies closed in, following the Royal carriages, they presented an imposing appearance.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON MEETING THE QUEEN.

THE ARRIVAL AT STRATHFIELDSAYE.

As the cortège approached Swallowfield, the Duke of Wellington, the Marquis of Douro, Mr. Pierrepoint, Mr. Compton, M.P., and Colonel C. S. Lefvere, advanced a few hundred yards in advance of the yeomanry, and rode up to her Majesty's carriage. The Duke of Wellington took off his hat and bowed to her Majesty, who cordially returned the salutation; after which his grace and the gentlemen with him rode to the front of the Royal cortège, which immediately renewed its progress to Strathfieldsaye. At a quarter to five, the signal gun was fired, which announced her Majesty's arrival on his grace's domain, and immediately afterwards the Royal standard was hoisted on the mansion. At each of the gates in the park, a neat marquee with a flag on the top was erected. At one of these marquees, near the house, 150 charity children, belonging to two schools on the estate, were assembled by the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Wellesley, the rector of Strathfieldsaye, his grace's nephew. The band of the Hants Yeomanry struck up "God save the Queen," immediately on her Majesty's arrival. The Royal cortège drove up to the door a few minutes before five, when the Duke of Wellington alighting from his horse, and throwing his riding wrapper to a servant, opened the carriage door, received her Majesty and her Royal Consort, and immediately ushered them into the mansion. At the same moment, the Royal escort, which had formed in capital style, and a body of his Grace's tenantry, who had voluntarily and unknown to his Grace followed from Swallowfield, gave her Majesty three most enthusiastic cheers, and then separated.

The meeting of Her Majesty and the Duke is engraved at page 57.

The dinner-party on Monday consisted of the following:—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, the Earl of Jersey, Sir R. and Lady Peel, Lord Ashburton, Lady Ashburton, and the Hon. Miss Baring, Sir W. Heathcote, Bart., M.P., Mr. and Mrs. Assheton Smith, Mr. Compton, M.P., the Hon. Mr. Pierrepoint, the Marquis of Douro, the Marchioness of Douro, Lord Charles Wellesley, Lady Charles Wellesley, Miss Murray, Mr. Anson, and Colonel Bouverie, the Right Hon. C. S. Lefevre and lady, Mr. and Mrs. Hunter, Mr. Portal, Mrs. B. Baring, and the Hon. and Rev. G. Wellesley.

In the evening the Royal party was also joined by Mr. and Mrs. Pigott, Captain and Mrs. Brown, Miss Walmisley, and Dr., Mrs., and Miss Keate.

The weather was remarkably fine for the period of the year. In the morning, there was every appearance of a wet and boisterous day. The clouds lowered, the rain fell in frequent showers, and the wind blew in repeated gusts. But her Majesty had scarcely passed Ascot Heath when it began to clear up—the sky was of a brilliant blue, and the sun shone brightly. This rendered the scene at Bracknell and Wokingham additionally interesting. By the time the Royal party approached the termination of their journey evening drew on; yet such was the fineness of the weather, that at Arborfield there was a magnificent sunset—more like the decline of an autumnal day than what could be expected at this unfavourable season. The moon shone brightly. There had not been so fine a day for many weeks past.

Strathfieldsaye is rather an "out-of-the-way" place, situated about six miles and a half to the north-west of the Winchfield station of the South Western Railway, and about the same distance to the north-east of Basingstoke station. The town of Silchester (where there are some very perfect remains of a Roman station) is about three miles and a half from it to the east. Strathfieldsaye is distant about nine or ten miles from the Reading station of the Great Western Railway.

Her Majesty and the Prince were stirring early on Tuesday, and immediately after breakfast, in company with their noble host, enjoyed a promenade upon the lawn in front of the mansion.

At half-past ten, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Bedford, the Earl of Jersey, Sir Robert Peel, and Colonel Bouverie, left the mansion on horseback, and proceeded to the Lower Pattom Wood, one of the noble Duke's game covers, about a mile from the house. On reaching the cover, the party were joined by the Marquis of Douro, the Right Hon. the Speaker, Captain Brown, and Mr. Anson.

The party were absent about three hours, during which time three hundred and three shots were fired, and the following game bagged:—Hares, 46; pheasants, 68; rabbits, 14; woodcocks, 3—total, 131 head. The Prince had three guns; and, of course, killed more than any other of the party. The Duke of Wellington, however, made two or three remarkable shots, and killed several head of game.

At three o'clock, the carriages were ordered for a drive, and the Royal party proceeded to Bramshill, the residence of Sir John Cope, an ancient mansion, about six miles distant from hence.

Her Majesty rode in her own pony phaeton, which was driven by Prince Albert, and preceded by two outriders in scarlet liveries.

The Duke and Duchess of Bedford, the Marquis and Marchioness of Douro, and Mrs. Assheton Smith accompanied the Royal party in two other carriages.

Lord Charles Wellesley and Colonel Bouverie were in attendance on horseback. On reaching the mansion, Sir John Cope was unfortunately absent from home on a shooting excursion. An old housekeeper, however, acted as cicerone in conducting the Royal party through the house, which contains much that is curious, and appeared very much to interest her Majesty.

Sir John Cope returned home just as her Majesty was leaving Bramshill, and Lord Charles Wellesley expressed to the hon. baronet the gratification her Majesty had experienced.

The Royal party reached Strathfieldsaye on their return shortly before five o'clock.

STRATHFIELDSAYE, WEDNESDAY.

Last night, besides the guests who are in the house, the dinner party included three of the officers of the Hants Yeomanry. In the evening there were in addition. Captain and Mrs. Brown, Miss Walmsley, and Mr., Mrs., and Miss Anderton; Sir Henry and Lady Russell, and Mr., Mrs., and Miss Beauchamp.

Her Majesty and the Prince retired at eleven o'clock.

This morning they rose at seven, and breakfasted (alone) at eight, but they did not take their usual walk, owing to the dampness of the weather.

Just opposite one of the fronts of Strathfieldsaye-house, and forming a part of the range of building principally appropriated to the stables, is a spacious tennis court, roofed over. Here her Majesty and the Prince proceeded after breakfast, the Prince amusing himself by trying the sport peculiar to the place.

The Prince then went out shooting, accompanied by Lord Charles Wellesley, the Duke of Bedford, Captain Brown, Colonel Bouverie, and Mr. Anson. The party proceeded first to Copse-wood, and afterwards to the pheasantry, past the back of the church. There were altogether 158 shots fired. The number killed was 71 head, of which 39 were pheasants, 25 hares, and 7 rabbits. The Prince shot 23 pheasants, 12 hares, and 6 rabbits. The party returned to the mansion at one o'clock, and lunched at two. In the afternoon her Majesty, the Prince, and the chief guests, went again to the tennis-court, where a match was played, in presence of her Majesty, by Lord Chas. Wellesley and Mr. Phillips, of the Strathfieldsaye tennis-court at Hampton Court Palace.

Bramshill, the seat of Sir John Cope, which her Majesty visited on Tuesday, is situated about six miles from Strathfieldsaye, and is a favourite place of resort with the Duke of Wellington and his Grace's visitors. It is one of the finest existing specimens of an ancient English mansion, as its proprietor is well known to be of the fine old English gentleman. It is beautifully situated on a slight eminence, commanding an interesting though not extensive prospect. It is constructed chiefly of brick, with stone dressings, and is surrounded with broad and extensive terraces of the same materials. The style is a mixture of the Italian and Elizabethan architecture. The present edifice is but the central portion of the building as originally designed, but has wings on each side of the entrance. This central portion is built wholly of stone, and is profusely decorated.

The house, it appears, was designed for Prince Henry, the son of James I., whose coronet (which particularly attracted the Queen's notice) is at the top of the entrance to the building. The original plan embraced a much larger area, and more important design, of which the present building is only a portion. Still enough remains to render it one of the most interesting objects of the kind in the country. As it at present stands, the centre portion is built of stone, the ornaments of mixed Grecian and Gothic; the whole carried up by successive stages of pilasters, with rich compartments, and surmounted by a pediment. The wings and the rest of the building are of red brick, the windows faced with stone. The porch is an odd mixture of different orders; in fact, the whole building is a singularly well-preserved specimen of the style into which the national taste fell when, in the reign of James I., Italian ornaments were ingrafted upon the old massive cumulative architecture of the previous reign.

The interior is still more interesting. You enter a fine old hall, floored and wainscoted with polished oak, with fretted ceiling and grotesque mouldings, the walls being hung with portraits of the high-born dames and cavaliers, whom Lely and Kneller, no less than Clarendon and later historians or chroniclers, have made immortal. Among them are the portraits of many ancestors of the proprietor, and a more modern painting, representing "A Meet" at Bramshill, in which are grouped portraits of the worthy baronet and his chief friends, in hunting costume, with their favourite huntsmen and hunters. Ascending the ample staircase, the walls of which are hung with paintings, chiefly of a later age, you enter a fine suite of rooms, in which the ancient characters are so well preserved that the visitor, finding himself amongst its relics, is readily transported in imagination back to the 16th century. The walls of the chief drawing-room are hung with tapestry of the age when the needle or the loom ministered to art scarcely less efficiently than the pencil. The subject is from Roman story, and commemorates that period of the Latin war, when the Romans, quailing before their enemies, Decius dedicated himself to the celestial and infernal gods, and threw away his life for the preservation of Rome.

The couches are of ancient form, curiously and elaborately carved, and covered with embroidery, the colours of which remain as vivid as when they were first blended by the fingers of fair damsels, two centuries ago. The next room is the library, similarly furnished, save that the walls are hidden by a fine collection of books, folios and quartos, in tarnished yet still splendid bindings, worthy receptacles of classic as well as old English and foreign literature. Nor should the large and hospitable fire-places of these apartments, with their lofty marble chimney-pieces, remain unnoticed, in which the yule log often burnt so cheerily and spread its warmth and light to the remotest corners. But we pass on to the gallery, hung with ancient paintings and engravings, in which we may trace the progress of art from its infancy to its perfection, and with huge masses, on whose blank expanse we search with as much difficulty as we now do in modern ones amongst the crowded buildings and streets by which they are well-nigh hidden, for the ancient halls and palaces of London. Here, moreover, are quaint effigies of ancient members of the family, high in rank and office under Elizabeth or James. There are also lofty windows with their deep recesses, commanding extensive prospects, and standing in them strange old cabinets with mysterious compartments.

The Duke of Wellington showed his own admiration of the place by so early bringing her Majesty to see it. He was not disappointed in his expectation that it would afford her the utmost pleasure. She took great interest in the many relics of antiquity—more particularly in those of the time of her great predecessor Elizabeth—which the mansion contains. Sir John Cope, the proprietor, was absent at the time of her Majesty's visit, greatly, no doubt, to his annoyance. He had gone out shooting, under the impression that her Majesty would not come till the next day, or that if her visit was earlier, he would receive notice from the Duke.

Sir John passed the Royal party as they returned, on his shooting pony.

"THE DUKE" AT STRATHFIELDSAYE.

We subjoin a cleverly-written sketch of Strathfieldsaye and its broad lands, which appeared in the John Bull, just three years since:—

There are two country houses—if by the term country house an armed fortress may be fitly described—to which, so soon as business, rather than the conventional usages of the world, set him free, the Duke of Wellington is in the habit of retiring, that he may relax both mind and body, and enjoy, as he heartily does, the society of his most intimate friends. One of these is the mansion of Strathfieldsaye, in Hants—the other, Walmer Castle, in Kent; the former belonging to the title, and as such hereditary in the family of Wellesley; the other being the official residence of Arthur, first Duke of Wellington, so long as he shall fill the situation, and discharge the duties of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. To Walmer Castle a certain degree of interest would attach, let its individual occupant be whom he might, because there are many historical associations connected with it. But Strathfieldsaye, though a fine place enough, would scarce attract much of the traveller's notice, were he not informed that it was the seat of the most illustrious man of his age. Let us, therefore, give of the real Ducal residence a hasty sketch, which will be the more easily done that in features either marked or characteristic it happens to be peculiarly wanting.

Strathfieldsaye—originally the seat of the Earls Rivers—is situated upon one of the edges of the county of Berks; being distant from Reading about eight or ten miles, and from London not more than fifty. Your readiest means of access to it is by the South Western or Southampton Railroad, which you may quit at Farnborough Station; and as all sorts of conveyances are to be had there in abundance, a drive of an hour or an hour and a-half, will carry you to the park paling, and by and by to one of the gates. Not much can be said of the fertility of the country in the heart of which Strathfieldsaye is planted. On the London side, at least, there are many miles of waste, over which the heath waves in luxuriant crops, and multitudes of firs—most of them self-grown—are scattered; while the hamlets and detached cottages which, at wide intervals, break in upon the dreary scene, are precisely such as one would expect to see in a district imperfectly settled. Still, there are patches here and there of very pretty scenery too. You may fancy yourself travelling through a forest, from amid the openings in which you obtain glimpses of various well-wooded hills, almost all of them surmounted or adorned along the side by a gentleman's seat; for besides the hospitable hall of Sir John Cope, and the residence of the good-humoured Speaker, there are several country houses gathered within what is considered a visitable distance of Strathfieldsaye; and most of these standing in situations at once elevated and conspicuous, the general effect is in some measure to counteract the impression which the more sterile nature of the land immediately about you may have made.

Everything in and around the family seat of the house of the Duke is unpretending in the extreme. You enter a park of not much more than moderate extent by a common wooden gate, beside which stands a lodge absolutely unadorned; it is neither more nor less than a cottage, of which the walls are made of brick, while the roof is covered over with thatch, not of yesterday's fabrication. A long sweep of avenue is now before you, the view on either side of which exhibits no particular point of attraction such as might compel you to stop short for the purpose of admiring it. The grounds have indeed a few slopes or falls, the most extensive of which ends in a sort of valley, through which runs the river Lodden, passing close in its onward progress to the mansion. The timber, too, is abundant, yet it is nowise conspicuous for its bulk. There are groves, thickets, and plantations, of course; while inside the paling you find the ordinary garnishment of gnarled oaks and antique thorns. But no lover of the picturesque and beautiful would ever think of quoting Strathfieldsaye as justifying him in the preference which, as a general rule, he is bound to give to the seats of the English aristocracy above those of all other aristocracies.

Along this road you drive, and, by and by, in the remote distance, the house of the hero of a hundred battles becomes faintly visible. It lies very low—quite, or almost quite, upon a level with the river; indeed, the stream is separated from the drawing-room windows only by a narrow slip of lawn and shrubbery. A clump of tall trees—if we mistake not—of the birch and ash kind, screens, and in some sort embowers it, on the flank; and the consequence is that, never having obtained a very accurate survey, your view becomes more obscure in proportion as you approach.

The mansion-house lying on the other side of the river, you cross a bridge, at the farther extremity of which the boughs of the beech grove overshadow you. Through that you pass rapidly, when a turn to the left brings you upon the commencement of the drive, which terminates in a broad gravel plat. You are now in front of the house. Look about you, and see what is there. The house itself, built in the reign of Queen Anne, partakes, both in its architecture and general arrangements, of the spirit of the age that produced it. Long, and low, with very tall chimneys, its whitened walls and grey slate roof, lack the dignity of the Elizabethan era, without putting on the air of spruceness mixed with comfort which characterises the generality of more modern edifices. It presents two rows of windows, which stretch, at measured distances, all along its front. The hall-door, graced on either side by pillars, and covered by a flat roof of trifling breadth, occupies the centre of the pile; and there are little wings, which differ only from the main body of the edifice in being by one story lower. But it is not from the somewhat unattractive form of the mansion that you are enabled at a glance to fix the date of its construction. Facing the entrance, and separated from it only by a road, which measures perhaps one hundred or a hundred and twenty feet in breadth, are the stables, which, with the grooms' apartments, the kennel, tennis-court, and one or two out-buildings besides, make up a sort of village, or rather street, of themselves. All this is completely in the French taste of the day, when Marlborough was running a career, the glory of which the Duke has since surpassed. You feel at once that the place ought to be inhabited by the contemporaries of Harley and Dean Swift.

When you have passed the threshold you enter upon a hall—oblong and somewhat low in the roof—which is paved with flat freestone, and warmed by a fire which burns cheerily in an old-fashioned English grate. The hall is well closed in; but the further door being opened, you find yourself in a narrow passage, which runs the entire length of the mansion, and gives the means of ingress to the suite of public rooms which occupy the basement story. These consist of a drawing room, library, dining-room, and the Duke's own room, all opening one into the other, and in their general shapes all perfectly agreeing. They are such as one would expect to see hung round with paintings, being somewhat narrow for their length, and otherwise present the appearance of a continuous gallery. The furniture is as plain as can at all agree with perfect elegance. Not a single work of art adorns the apartments, except, indeed, that the dining room, besides being traversed by pillars, has its walls covered over with very curious engravings. But neither the painter nor the sculptor has been employed to adorn an edifice on which it is easy to perceive that the owner has never cared to bestow too much attention. Everything, therefore, about it is good, and substantial, and comfortable of its kind; but you look in vain for the splendour which greets you, at every step, in Blenheim; you are still in the dwelling of the Rivers, not in the palace of a Wellington.

The library, which is an excellent room, contains a tolerably extensive collection of books. They are chiefly modern, as may be supposed, and not a few consist of copies of works which the authors, the natives of every country in Europe, have felt themselves honoured by being permitted to present to the most illustrious of living men.

To the sleeping apartments the same description applies, by which we have endeavoured to bring into the reader's mind some idea of the living rooms. They are all good—some being in point of size larger, and others less—and they are every where furnished with a becoming regard both to convenience and good taste—but this is all. You enter them from a corridor which runs the whole length of the building, and to which two or three different staircases, none of them ornamental, conduct from the basement story. It may not, perhaps, be out of place to state that the apartment which used to serve as the nursery when the Marquis of Douro and Lord Charles Wellesley were children looks out upon the gravel drive in front of the house, and has its windows down to the floor; two circumstances to which the Duke, when his friends get him upon topics purely domestic, has been known thus to allude:—It seems that, returning home one day from hunting, his Grace saw the two boys thrust themselves so far over the window to greet him that even he felt nervous for the issue. He did not, however, say one word which might have either startled or agitated them, but dismounted, walked in, and sat down in his chair. "Well," was his remark, when the nurse brought the boys down, "I never knew, before to-day, why the nursery was placed there. But I see now that you have chosen the room from which the boys may most conveniently break their necks, if they be so inclined."

The grounds about Strathfieldsaye are neat, and the walk upon the lawn, which interposes between the house and the river, is very pretty. So is the tortuous path which leads through the shrubbery; but here, as well as elsewhere, there is a total absence of all pretension. The same thing may be said of the stables and coach-houses; all of which do their duty well, though they are all barren of ornament. The tennis-court, also, though an excellent one, is as little assuming as need be; and of the gardens no more can be said than that they are well kept, and abundantly productive.

It is, however, characteristic of the high-minded owner of the soil, that within a few minutes' walk of the house stands the Parish Church, a neat and simple edifice, which was repaired, within these fifteen years by the Duke; and fitted up, both within and without, with equal taste and modesty. Neither has his Grace been unmindful of the wants of the incumbent. We rather think that the parsonage-house, which is not more than fifteen years old, was rebuilt in like manner entirely at the Duke's expense; but, however this may be, we know that long before the passing of the Tithe Commutation Bill his Grace provided that in this parish no grievance of tithe should be felt. Owning all the property, he paid out of his own pocket an ample stipend to the incumbent, and thus left his tenants free to reap the advantages of any improvements in agriculture which they might introduce.

At Strathfieldsaye the Duke of Wellington is not able entirely to divest himself of his public character. As Lord-Lieutenant of the county he is open to the innumerable claims upon his time of county business, and he makes a point of being at home to entertain the Judges, as often as they pass on the circuit towards his neighbourhood. It is here, too, more than at Walmer Castle, that he receives the visits which Royalty occasionally pays him. Here he entertained in other times, George IV. Here King William and Queen Adelaide have spent some pleasant days. When such matters do not interfere with his purely domestic arrangements, the habits of the noble duke at Strathfieldsaye are quiet, unostentatious, and philosophic. He breakfasts with his company at ten, retires to his own room afterwards, devotes several hours to his endless correspondence, except on hunting days, and goes out either to ride or to walk, about two. Seven is his dinner hour, and often after tea he forms one at a quiet rubber of whist, where the stakes played for never exceed five-shilling points.

The estate of Strathfieldsaye was purchased for the preserver of his country, out of a sum of money voted to him by Parliament, in 1815. We do not exactly know to what its yearly value may amount; but there is a fact connected with it, which deserves to be put upon record, and we therefore state it. Not one shilling of the rental has the Duke of Wellington ever expended, except upon the improvement of the property. He neither lays by so much a year in the Funds, nor does he consider himself entitled to devote the money derived from it to his own uses. "I am a rich man," is his argument, "which the next Duke of Wellington will not be. I am, therefore, determined that he shall receive his patrimony in the very best order; and if he cannot keep it so, the fault will not be mine." The consequence is, that go where you may, whether far or near, you will no where see a body of tenantry better lodged, better provided with offices, better supplied with all manner of conveniences for the prosecution of their calling, than those which call the Duke of Wellington their landlord. And though the land be not, perhaps, the best that England can produce, it is everywhere in the highest state of cultivation of which it is susceptible. As a matter of course, the Duke's tenants are exceedingly well pleased with their lot; indeed, a more popular man than he, among all classes of his neighbours, it would be hard to find.

Strathfieldsaye used to be famous for the quantities of game in its preserves. Latterly, the game has been somewhat neglected, and the consequence is, that the shooting is not now what we remember it. But you may still get a capital day's amusement, if you do not mind walking for it; and no true sportsman grudges a little strain upon his limbs. There are, besides, hounds in the neighbourhood, to which his Grace subscribes, and of which he used to be a determined follower. He still rides out with them occasionally, and is never seen without winning from high and low marks of the most affectionate reverence.

Another description of this very interesting locality appears in that very pleasantly-written volume, "The Environs of Reading," which, as it contains several points not mentioned in the first-named sketch, we shall quote:—

At a short distance from the Tweeddale Tile Works, is a neat detached villa residence, with farm yard attached, occupied by Mr. Abel Easton, steward to his Grace the Duke of Wellington. By crossing the little green in front of the house, we find ourselves in a woody lane, and after passing onwards a short distance reach one of the lodges to the Duke's park, at the commencement of the noble avenue of elms. This is the principal approach to the mansion, and one more magnificent in every point of view was never formed by the hand of man. (See the large Engraving, at page 57.) A talented writer has remarked—"It is difficult to imagine anything which more completely realises the poetic fancy that the pillars and arches of a Gothic cathedral were borrowed from the interlacing of the branches of trees, planted at stated intervals, than this avenue, in which nature has so completely succeeded in outwitting her handmaiden, Art, that not a single trunk—hardly even a bough or a twig—appears to mar the grand regularity of the design as a piece of perspective. No cathedral aisle was ever more perfect; and the effect under every variety of aspect—the magical light and shadow of the cold white moonshine—the cool green light of a cloudy day—and the glancing sunbeams which pierce through the leafy umbrage in the bright summer noon, are such as no words can convey. Separately considered, each tree is a model of stately growth—and they are just at perfection; probably about one hundred and thirty years old. There is scarcely perhaps in the kingdom such another avenue." We are now in front of the house, and a beautiful prospect it affords, standing in the midst of a finely-wooded park, with the picturesque Loddon slowly winding its gentle waters through the very heart of it.

There is nothing particularly striking in the external appearance of the mansion—nothing that indicates the fame of its occupier. Its internal arrangements, however, are of a different character, and show that everything has been done that could contribute to the convenience and comfort of its inmates.

After passing through the entrance-hall, which contains several good pictures—two of them, at either end, amongst the grandest conceptions of Fuseli—we may wander through the handsome dining, drawing, and bedrooms, &c. of the ground-floor—the only part of the house which is generally shown to strangers. There is one thing which the least observing will not fail to remark as highly characteristic of the noble owner—it is the extreme neatness, order, and unostentatious attention to comfort that reign throughout the whole. Another peculiarity, attributable, it is said, to the taste of the late Lord Rivers, is remarked in several of the apartments: the walls are decorated—we might say papered—with engravings, most of them specimens of British talent. There are also several splendid pictures, particularly a series of portraits of the Spanish monarchs, very finely executed—and a noble portrait of the late Duke of York, by Sir Thomas Lawrence.

To the south of the house is the conservatory, which contains many fine exotics, and forms a delightful promenade in unfavourable weather. The perfume of the orange trees, which grow here in profusion, adds not a little to the many other charms of the place. Adjoining the back of the conservatory are the private apartments of the noble owner. They are of the simplest description, and communicate with the neighbouring church by a private footpath.

In the gardens, which lie at the back of the mansion, are the finest pineries and forcing-houses anywhere to be seen, the whole being heated by hot-water pipes. Here are grown all the garden produce and horticultural delicacies required by his grace's establishments.

Near the south corner of the gardens is shown the paddock, which none can view without feelings of interest. It was long the resting-place of the celebrated charger Copenhagen, that bore the duke through the whole of the eventful day when the destinies of the world were decided on the field of Waterloo. Besides containing a noble cluster of elms in the centre, it is sheltered on every side; indeed, nothing appears to have been neglected to make the generous animal comfortable. At the corner of the paddock, adjoining the gardens, is a small summer-house with a little wicket, to which he was accustomed every day to direct his steps in order to receive his allowance of bread from the hands of the late duchess. It was a beautiful feeling that induced this noble lady thus to cherish the gallant steed that had borne her lord through so many perils. A small circular railing encloses the spot in which he was interred with military honours—old age having at last prostrated his victim after he had escaped the shot and shells of a hundred fights.

Adjoining the paddock is a tennis court, formerly a riding school, but appropriated to its present use by the duke, who is an ardent admirer of this healthy pastime.

A stable adjoining the tennis court contains some fine specimens of the Brahmin kine, which were presented to his grace by the late Earl Powis.

The pleasure grounds lie northward of the house, and are certainly extremely beautiful. They are tastefully laid out, and abound with specimens of the rarer evergreens. Among others are several cedars of Lebanon, upwards of one hundred and eight feet high, a fine variety of the red or pencil cedar, several superb tulip trees (said to be the finest in England), an immense hemlock spruce, &c.

The rectory of Strathfieldsaye is in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, and in the patronage of the Duke of Wellington. The present rector is the Hon. and Rev. G. V. Wellesley, D.D.

A family of the name of Saye originally possessed the estates of Strathfieldsaye. By an heiress of that family, they were conveyed, in marriage, to Sir Nicholas Dabridgecort, one of the first Knights of the Garter, who was Sheriff of Hants in the reign of Richard II. In this family it remained until the reign of Charles I., when it was purchased by Sir William Pitt, Comptroller of the Household. He made it his residence, and at his death, in 1636, was buried in the parish church. On the demise of the late Lord Rivers, fourth in descent from the above-mentioned Sir William (the peerage was created in 1776), Strathfieldsaye was purchased by government and presented as a tribute of national gratitude to its present illustrious possessor.

There is a pretty rustic iron bridge over the Loddon, not far from the church; after crossing it we enter the fine carriage drive that leads to another entrance-lodge, situated in the little village of Turgis. Near the lodge stands the Wellington Arms, an excellent inn, kept by Mr. Thomas Carter, who served as groom to the Duke from the commencement of the Peninsular campaigns to the close of the war. The extensive and well-ordered stables attached to the house are made available whenever there is a party more numerous than usual at the mansion.

The annexed tribute to his Grace's merits as a landowner, is from a lecture delivered at Southampton, by Professor Buckland, in July last:—

On Thursday last, the Prussian Minister had called the attention of the assembled agriculturists of England to the example of good farming that is set them by the most illustrious of living warriors, the Duke of Wellington, who had turned his glorious sword into a not less glorious ploughshare; and near Strathfieldsaye may now be seen rich fields of barley and turnips on naturally heavy clay lands, which, two or three years ago, were reeking with moisture, and incapable of that rotation of green and grain crops, which all good farming requires. The Duke of Wellington was, year after year, improving his clay lands, first by thorough-draining, which is the indispensable precursor of all other improvements; and, after drainage, spreading large quantities of chalk over the surface of the clay. Not less than one thousand waggon loads of chalk had, during the last year, been brought from the neighbourhood of Basingstoke to that of Strathfieldsaye.

THE THEATRES.

ADELPHI.

On Monday evening a very pleasant farce, adapted by Mr. J. M. Morton from a French piece "Peroline, ou une Visite de Noces," was brought out under the English title, "The Corporal's Wedding, or, a Kiss from the Bride." Major Griskin (Mr. Selby), and Sir Felix Marmalade (Mr. Hudson), two roués, have laid a bet of one hundred guineas as to which of the two shall get the first kiss from Nancy Cobb (Miss Woolgar), the bride of Corporal Cobb (Mr. Munyard). The pretty flower-girl—for such has been Nancy's avocation—contrives to outwit the two rakes, and not only gains the amount of the wager by her ingenuity, but delivers the "first kiss" to its lawful proprietor, her husband. In an under plot, Lady Arethusa Griskin (Mrs. Frank Mathews), figures to the great delight of the audience, and the extreme terror of her unfortunate husband, the Major. This is an outline of the plot of the piece, which was, we heard, intended originally for the Haymarket, but has lost nothing by its change to the Adelphi; for it kept the audience in high good humour throughout, never giving them time to reflect upon its more improbable situations. The incidents reminded us somewhat of a piece called "Intrigue," played some years back at our theatres.

It was excellently played by all parties concerned in its representation. Miss Woolgar's archness and unflagging spirits had their usual effect upon the audience, and Mrs. F. Mathews's performance of the vixenish wife was perfect—it was verjuice personified. We do not remember to have noticed Mr. Munyard before; he is a clever low comedian, reminding us of Oxberry in his acting; and Messrs. Hudson and Selby were both unexceptionable in the characters of Sir Felix and his friend. The farce was entirely successful, and at the fall of the curtain Miss Woolgar and Mr. Munyard appeared, upon being called for to receive the congratulations of the audience. It was announced for repetition by Mr. Selby, without a dissentient voice.

Mr. Buckstone's new three-act drama is to be called "The Green Bushes; or, a Hundred Years ago." and will be produced on Monday. Greenroom report speaks highly of it, as we are informed; but this is an opinion upon which we place very little faith, actors being accustomed to look more to their individual parts than to the piece as a whole. If it is in the style of the old Adelphi dramas of the "Wreck Ashore" school, we trust it will succeed, as we somewhat weary of the endless translations. Since the house opened in October we have had, exclusive of "Mother and Son," which ran only a night or two, the following adaptations:—"Don Cæsar de Bazan," from the piece of the same name; "The Fox and Goose," from "Le Panier Fleuri;" "The Mysterious Stranger," from "Le Diable à Paris;" "Sidonia de Molina," from "Le Duc d'Olonne;" and "The Corporal's Wedding," from "Peroline." A thorough English piece will be quite refreshing.

The theatres continue to be doing well, and novelties are underlined in the different bills, which bespeak the activity of the managements in these times of concurrence. The programme of their entertainments has, for the last fortnight or three weeks, remained the same, with the exception of the farce above spoken of, and the drama produced at the Princess' last week. The Pantomimes are on the wave, the Adelphi having given the first notice of dissappearance, this evening: and the extravaganzas are going well at the Haymarket, Princess', and Lyceum. In the burlesque of the latter house, we must confess our great favourite is Valentine's captive giant. He is the great part in the play: in our opinion he excels in importance all the others. We look upon him metaphysically, rather than popularly: and as we amuse ourselves in tracing the workings of his mind, he has an additional claim upon our interest. There is a humbled pride, a silent melancholy, upon his countenance, that shows how keenly he feels his position. He has been gaily decked, to swell the triumph of the conqueror, in bright red and blue scraps of calico, pinned round his head, but they only increase his sadness. One eye is directed above — the other regards the earth, showing that his feelings partake equally of aspiration and despondency. And after the Princess has even paid him the compliment of calling him "a handsome man," he shows how crushed and broken are his spirits, by bowing dejectedly, and returning, with unaltered expression of countenance, to his place. The rabble laugh at him: but his mien tells, too truly, that he feels all hope is fled. He is a study for every thinking mind, and distracts the attention entirely from the mere verbal ingenuity of the piece. Like the facetious puppet Punch, although we know he is but artificially constructed, yet we cannot divest ourselves altogether of some wild belief in his existence, beyond that of mere papier maché and wicker work.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

DEATH OF MR. C. W. BAKER, THE ACTOR.—This well-known performer died on Tuesday morning at the Pavilion Coffee House, near the Olympic Theatre. Mr. Baker was born in 1792, and followed his profession from an early period. He had been in a declining state for some months, and rather dependent upon personal friends than relations.

THE OPERA AT MALTA.—The Malta papers speak in very eulogistic terms of a young English lady, Miss Emma Bingley, who has appeared several times at the theatre there in the "Somnambula." Miss Bingley's voice is said to be exceedingly melodious, rich, and of great compass. This lady made her début on Monday, the 23rd of December. She was exceedingly well received throughout the performance, and at its close the audience called for her, and, on her appearance before the curtain, saluted her with three rounds of applause.

At the close of the English performances at the Tuileries, Louis Philippe presented Mr. Mitchell, the director, with a gold snuff-box, set with jewels, and also made a present to Mr. Macready of a beautiful Eastern dagger, richly mounted with jewels. He also gave a gold bracelet to Miss Helen Faucit and Mdlle. Plessy.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE CHESTER CUP BETTING.

It will not be denied that the ring—the P. R., ropes, stakes, sponges, and other et cetera, once upon a time was an item of the national sports of our country—whether for good or evil it is not our promise to canvass, and it must be conceded that the betting-ring—with its stakes also (to say nothing about its sponges) is at the present time a very popular pastime: whether we have lost or gained by the change is another affair. Like every other science, as men become more and more learned in the art and mystery of wagering—they thirsted for a taste of its subtleties, and anon, the arena of the handicap ever offered for their cultivation. Who the sages of that school of Plutus (or Mercury) may be, is a profound secret; all that our public is permitted to know being the result of their cabala published occasionally in the Sibylline leaves of the sheet Racing Calendar. A few days ago, the first of these mysteries for the season made its appearance—and with the reader's permission—and the assistance of Diana—upon it we will proceed to make our comments.

In the present year of Olympian grace, the Chester Trades' Cup attains its majority—the first race for the prize so entitled having been run in 1824, and won by the late Sir Thomas Stanley's Doge of Venice. On that occasion, the nominations amounted to sixteen—on the present they are one hundred and twenty-three—which certainly is an improvement numerically. Twenty-one seasons back the Chester Trades' Cup—like the burghers, its godfathers—was a respectable, honest, decent utensil, conducive to good fellowship and good cheer; of latter years, we write with sorrow and shame, as much cannot be said of it. We will let by-gones be by-gones, however, in the hope that our clemency may lead to gratitude, and honester courses. For this sporting handicap there were, at the commencement of the market, two first favourites — namely, Semiseria and Cataract, each at 25 to 1. The former is a five-year old mare — a winner of seven races of account — her weight 7st. 6lbs.; the latter, a five-year old horse —once the pride of Newmarket—his weight 6st. 10lbs. Now these handicaps — the first of them, especially — are very indifferent. Not that we are going to advise that either should be backed, for with such a course, and such a field, as most probably will start, it is almost 25 to 1 against a horse winning that reaches the castle post the last time round—in the rear—unless he could fly. There is not room for six horses to run abreast comfortably from that point to the distance. Winesour, who opened as premier, is now, or was a day or two ago, backed earnestly at 26 to 1. He is 5 years old, and carries 8st. 6lbs.: it's too much for him in the company he will meet. Zanoni is quoted at 30 to 1; he is 5 years old, and carries 6st. 12lbs. Last year he ran first for the Derby, but had the post been a 100 yards farther, he would have been beaten: now this was a bad performance, though it was, no doubt, a terrific race, for Orlando was never good enough to give a year to anything in a race-horse's form. The Era, five years old, 8st. 11lbs., looks well for the takers of 40 to 1—but he can't win with the weight and the distance. Extempore, at the same price, is more to our liking. She is five years old, and has to carry only 7st. 8lbs.,: she comes of a rare stock, and if right will be a dangerous customer. The Pride of Kildare has been backed at 45 to 1—a four year old mare, with, certainly, but 6st. 10lbs. to carry. But we don't think her a good investment.

Next to her in the odds we have Sorella, at 50 to 1—at which she is undoubtedly cheap. She was quite the best filly of her year out last season, and one almost certain to train on. She has staid the distance; and, although they have put 7st 12lb on her, if right on the day, it will take a clipper to beat her. Of Valerian—backed (?) (they say) at the same odds—this was the horse once a favourite for the last Leger; but, as the touts say, "nobody never seed him;" so we can't introduce him to the reader. Portrait, at 50 to 1, is another likely venture. He is a seven-year old son of old Stumps, a capital sticker, has won twenty races, has but 6st 10lb to carry, and is in right good hands. Unless as stale as a post-horse, he ought to be somewhere at the finish, But, we repeat it—the handicap is a bad one—several of the three-year olds are in at preposterous weights; we do not particularise them, as it would be considered perhaps invidious. This crumb of counsel, however, we venture to give to the gentlemen of enterprise and spirit who must do something on this event—back all the three-year olds, and on the day one will be at the present price of the lot.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The business transacted this afternoon on the Chester Cup strengthens our impression that it will be a very heavy betting race, and not much, we apprehend, to the improvement of the settling on the Tuesday after Epsom. The "lions" this afternoon were Winesour, Semiseria, Hemp, Extempore, Cataract, and Dog Billy; several others were backed, but not for "sums." The handicap, with the exception of the three-year olds, which are put half a stone low, is generally allowed to be a good one, and likely to ensure a most brilliant acceptance. The Derby betting, although confined to a moiety of the standing favourite, was important, inasmuch as it had the effect of driving Kedger back to 16 to 1, and of eliciting a strong feeling in favour of Annandale, Newsmonger, and the Connaught Ranger. In other respects it possessed little public interest.

THURSDAY.—The Chester Cup betting, besides ranging over nearly the whole of the extensive field included our notice of Monday's business, introduced some new aspirants, and on the whole was heavy and important. The horses most liberally backed were Semiseria, Cataract, (for four or five hundred pounds each), Obscurity, Celeste, and Agriculture; Winesour was scarcely mentioned, and on the others, the outlay was moderate. The Derby betting was flat, but enough business was transacted to prove that those who were with the stream in the late Alarm and Cobweb panic, will have some trouble to get out.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"J. S."—His problem is correct. We hope to find room for it soon.

To "R. R." our apology is due.

"Octogenarian."—His letter does not alter our opinion of M. St. Amant's play.

"Ed. E. Whittaker."—Reverse the words black and white as noticed below—you will then find it correct.

"R. O'C. N."—Solution incorrect; if at 2nd move Q take Kt, black's King can take Q.

"Wintoniensis."—The best answer we can give is to quote the 21st law of the London Chess Club:—"Every Pawn which has reached the eighth or last square of the chess board, must be immediately exchanged for a Queen or any other piece the player may think fit, even though all the pieces remain on the board. It follows, therefore, that he may have two or more Queens, three or more Rooks, Bishops, or Knights."

"E. C. Pembroke."—A. B. ought certainly take the pawn.

"Zodiac."—The solution in our next.

"Beta."—Read and inwardly digest that excellent little work, "Chess for Beginners," by W. Lewis. Do this, Beta, and you will soon beat him.

"J. O."—Yes!

"J. W. P."—The game alluded to has not reached us.

A typographical error in our Problems Nos. 56 and 57, has occasioned us no little vexation: we regret the mistake, and hasten to make the amends in our power, by offering our best apologies. In the problems above mentioned the diagrams are printed White at top, and Black at bottom, whereas it should have been the reverse. To avoid such an error in future, we purpose printing only at bottom of Diagram, White, the colour generally moving first.

Owing to this mistake, we have been requested to defer the Solution of Problem, No. 57, until next week.

HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST.—On Sunday morning last a sermon was preached on behalf of this truly excellent institution at the parish church of Battersea, by the Rev. J. Jackson, M.A., the evening lecturer of Battersea church, &c. A most eloquent appeal was responded to by a collection of upwards of forty pounds.

REPEAL OF THE WINDOW DUTY. — On Thursday evening a numerous meeting of the inhabitants of St. James's, Westminster, was held at Willis's Rooms, Brewer-street, Golden square, for the purpose of adopting measures for obtaining a repeal of the window-duty in the next session of Parliament. Mr. Keith, churchwarden, in the chair, supported by the principal parish officers, and other respectable inhabitants. The Chairman observed that a repeal of the above tax was most desirable. He trusted that the agitation would extend to all the other metropolitan parishes, and that renewed exertions would be made to obtain the repeal of so iniquitous an impost. He added that, agreeably to the provisions of the new Building Act, the parish officers reported as to the fitness of the several houses in the parish for dwellings. They had found upwards of six hundred not in a fit state; but he believed four hundred more were in a similar condition. A more appropriate time than the present for demanding the repeal of such an act, he was sure every one present would admit, could not have occurred. The chairman concluded, after which Mr. Maule, of Saville row, came forward and addressed the meeting at some length in favour of the proposed repeal, concluding by submitting a very strong resolution in accordance, which was seconded by Mr. Owen, of Jermyn-street, who, in the course of his address, referred to the great meeting for the repeal of the window-tax, held in Bath. The resolution was carried unanimously, after which some others were proposed and also carried.

WEST KENT AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION SOCIETY. — On Thursday the annual meeting of this Society was held at the Star Hotel, Maidstone. Colonel Austen, of Kippington, took the Chair, supported by Sir Edmund Filmer, Bart., M. P., and a large body of agriculturists and tenant-farmers. The report was read and agreed to. The annual dinner took place at five o'clock in the evening, at the Star Hotel, Colonel Austin in the Chair. Among the company were, Sir Edmund Filmer, Bart., M.P., the Honourable Colonel Stratford, of Appleford-place, the Mayor of Maidstone, the Town Clerk of Maidstone (Mr. Monckton), T. G. Monypenny, Esq., late M.P. for Rye, Alderman Lucas, of London, Fairfax Best, Esq., of Wierton, J. Hollingworth, Esq., Boxley, T. B. Elvey, Esq., of Bow Hill, T. Day, Esq., A. Randall, Esq., and T. Franklin, Esq., of Maidstone, and numerous large farmers. The speeches were all on agricultural subjects.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The supply of English wheat on sale this morning, was seasonably extensive, but of very middling quality. The finest parcels of both red and white commanded a steady demand, at full prices: but all other kinds were a dull sale. In foreign wheat scarcely any transactions took place, yet the quotations were supported. The supply of barley being large, that article was dull, at barely Monday's figures. The same may be said of malt. Although we had a good show of oats, that article was firm, at full currencies. Beans, peas, and flour, unaltered.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 5680; barley, 9590; oats, 2370. Irish: wheat, ——; barley, ——; oats, 10,160. Foreign: wheat, ——; barley, ——; oats, ——, quarters. Flour, 5610 sacks; malt, 6340 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 39s to 47s; ditto, white, 41s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 32s to 34s; grinding barley, 25s to 27s; distilling, 29s to 03s; malting ditto, 29s to 32s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 60s to 61s; brown ditto, 55s to 58s; Kingston and Ware, 62s to 63s; Chevalier, 64s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 23s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 21s to 22s; ditto, white, 21s to 23s; tick beans, new, 36s to 37s; ditto, old, 40s to 42s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 36s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 42s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lb. Foreign.—Fine wheat, 48s to 54s; Dantzig, red, 44s to 50s; white, 50s to 54s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s to 24s; oats, brew, 17s to 18s; ditto feed, 15s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s per quarter. Flour, American, 21s to —; Baltic, 18s to —s, per barrel.

Seed Market.—For all descriptions of seeds, the supply of which is seasonably good, we have to report a dull inquiry, yet no depression can be noticed in the quotations.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto, foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d½ to 6d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 7d; barley, 34s 7d; oats, 21s 8d; rye, 31s 4d; beans, 35s 7d; peas, 35s 8d.

Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 45s 6d; barley, 34s 4d; oats, 21s 7d; rye, 32s 0d; beans, 36s 0d; peas, 35s 9d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 4s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 6s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—The public sales of tea held this week have passed off remarkably well, and at which full prices have been readily paid. Privately only a moderate business has been transacted, yet the quotations are steadily supported. The imports continue small.

Sugar.—Fine qualities of raw sugar have mostly supported previous rates, but all other kinds have suffered a decline of from 6d to 1s per cwt. The supply of refined goods being on the increase, the rates are drooping. Brown lumps have sold at 71s 6d to 72s; and standard ditto, 72s 6d to 73s per cwt.

Coffee.—Some large public sales of coffee have taken place since our last, and at which prices have been with difficulty supported. Ceylons have sold at 52s for very good ordinary.

Cocoa.—West Indias is fine at 41s to 42s for good ordinary dark grey Trinidad, and 44s to 47s for middling and good.

Rice.—We have only a moderate business doing in this article, at late rates. Low and middling white Bengal has sold at 10s 6d to 11s 6d; and good middling 11s to 11s 6d per cwt.

Fruit.—For Smyrna raisins the demand is active at 45s to 46s; white Valencias command 50s. per cwt. Patras currants have sold at 50s to 52s, and Zante 49s per cwt.

Indigo —The quarterly sales have been in progress during this week. The total quantity advertised was 7474 chests. The biddings have been brisk for shipping qualities, at an advance of 2d to 4d per lb; but regular Madras has sold at a discount of 2d to 3d.

Oils.—We have no alteration to notice in this market, which rules somewhat steadily.

Provisions.—The holders of foreign butter having submitted to a further decline, a fair business has been transacted in that article. Fine Friesland is selling at 100s to 108s; fine Holland, 94s to 100s; Keil, 101 to 112s; and inferior, 82s to 90s per cwt. Irish butter is very dull, at a decline of from 2d to 4d per cwt. Bacon is likewise heavy, and may be purchased at 1s per cwt less money. The same may be said of lard and hams. All other kinds of provisions are extremely dull.

Tallow.—Russian is still dull of sale, and again cheaper. Prime P.Y.C. are taken in small parcels, at 39s 3d to 40s per cwt. For delivery, new tallow is offered at 39s 3d to 39s 6d. Town tallow is selling at 41s to 41s 6d, net cash.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 15s; useful ditto, £4 16s to £5 4s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 12s to £1 14s; wheat straw, £1 14s to £1 16s, per load.

Wool.—In consequence of the approaching public sales, there is very little doing in wool by private contract, yet prices are supported.

Coals (Friday).—Chester Main, 19s; Hasting's Hartley, 19s; Buddle's West Hartley, 19s 6d; Acorn Close, 20s; Wylan, 18s 9d; Belmont, 21s 3d; New March, 19s 6d per ton.

Hops (Friday).—We have very little variation to notice in the prices of, or the demand for, any kind of hops. Many of the holders, however, will not sell at present rates, which rule as under:—Sussex Pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £7 8s to £8 4s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £8 0s to £9 10s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 12s; Mid Kent bags, £7 15s to £8 15s; East Kent ditto, £11 0s to £12 0s.

Smithfield (Friday).—In our market of to-day the supply of beasts was, on the whole, but moderate, yet, owing to the thin attendance of buyers, the beef trade was in a very sluggish state, at barely Monday's prices. We had on sale 30 beasts and 60 sheep from Holland, and 100 Scots from Aberdeen. The numbers of sheep were small. Prime old Downs sold freely, at full currencies, but all other kinds were a dull inquiry. The veal trade was not quite so active as last week, yet nearly the whole of the calves were disposed of at full quotations. Pigs were in full average supply, and steady demand, at late rates. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £19 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime large oxen, 3s 6d to 3s 10d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 0d to 4s 2d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 10d to 3s 2d; second quality ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; prime small ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; large hogs, 3s 6d to 4s 2d; neat small porkers, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; suckling calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each Beasts, 612; cows, 148; sheep, 3740; calves, 107; pigs, 297.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had a steady demand here to-day, and prices were generally supported. Per 8lbs. by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; ditto small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 3s 0d to 4s 0d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 0s; middling ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal 3s 6d to 4s 8d; small pork, 4s 2d to 4s 6d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The general tendency of the English Market during the week has been towards a decline, the purchases of the Government Broker being insufficient to prevent a daily fluctuation of about ¼ per cent. The closing price of Consols on Monday was 100¼ to ⅜, and it receded on Tuesday to 100¼, sellers, closing on Wednesday at 100⅛ for Money; since which no improvement has taken place. Bank Stock has advanced a shade, and new Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. quote the improved price of 104¼. There is a growing disposition to invest in this stock instead of Consols, from a fear of the interest on the latter being reduced. The present dividend on New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. is secure for ten years, and then it diminishes to Three per Cent. Should a reduction, however small, be made in the interest of Consols, the value of the New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. would be materially increased; not only from the superior rate of interest, but the guarantee against reduction. These circumstances have tended to make it the favourite stock with those parties who usually invest a portion of their dividends, as soon as received. India Stock is a shade flatter, closing at 286; Bank Stock is 213½; Consols for Money are 100⅛; New Three and-a-Quarter per Cents. are 104¼; Three per Cent. Reduced, 100⅜ ⅜; Exchequer Bills, 57 to 59.

The Foreign Market has been very animated during the week from the change in the value of Spanish. Some large purchases on Monday tended to improve the market, and the reason assigned was the great probability of Senor Mon's plan of revenue turning out profitably for the foreign creditors. The dividends on the Three per Cents. are said to be secured, but no authentic statement has appeared with regard to the overdue coupons on the Active Bonds. The closing price on Monday for the Actives was 28½. The Three per Cents., 40¼. The latter on Tuesday again advanced to 41, but on Wednesday some extensive realising took place, and a reaction was the consequence, the price receding to 39⅝ to 40½. It must be remarked, in connection with this unusual rise, that the Three per Cents. exist to only a very small amount; any large purchase is therefore difficult to deliver in Stock, and the price becomes, consequently, enhanced. Mexican remains at 34⅜ to ⅞, and in the other Foreign Securities no alteration of importance has occurred. The last quotations are, Spanish Actives, 28⅜; Three per Cents., 40; Brazilian, 90; Portuguese, 60½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents., 63½; Four per Cent. Certificates, 98¾.

The Share Market at the commencement of the week was animated to an extent that had never been previously witnessed, and nearly all the new and projected lines advanced. Speculation to an unheard of amount reigned both on Monday and Tuesday, but somewhat declined as the week advanced. Dovers have advanced since our last nearly 5 per cent., and closed at 48½; Rugbys have also been done at 2 premium, and close at that price. The Richmond and West-end Junction advanced on the Board of Trade announcing their intention to recommend the measure, but have been flat since, the last price being 3½ to ⅜; Chester and Holyhead have not maintained their advance, and close heavily at 6½ to ⅜; Churnet Valley have advanced to 7; Caledonian, to 5½; Trent Valley, to 10⅜; Cambridge and Lincoln are 4½; Direct Northern, 2⅜; London and York, 5; Eastern Counties, 18⅜; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 11⅛; Great Western, 174½; Ditto, Half Shares, 101; Lancaster and Carlisle, 24; London and Birmingham (Stock), 233; South Western (New), 13⅜; Croydon, 16½; Midlands, 93; North British 11½; Norwich and Brandon, 14⅜; South Devon, 15; York and North Midland, 110; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 64⅜; Sheffield and Manchester, 101½; Sheffield and Lincoln, 1½; Glasgow and Dumfries, 1½; Paris and Lyons, 3½; Paris and Rouen, 44⅜; Rouen and Havre, 25; Boulogne and Amiens, 4⅜; Great Northern of France, 5⅜; Orleans and Bordeaux, 8.

SATURDAY MORNING.—There was nothing of importance in the English or Foreign Markets yesterday. Consols closed at 100⅛, and Spanish Three per Cents 40. The Share Market was very animated, Birmingham and Gloucester, and London and York, both being slightly in advance: the former closed at 110, the latter at 5.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

The Primate of England has just addressed a letter to the clergy of his province, giving his opinion on various questions that have for some time past occasioned serious differences in the Church. Some such decision has long been expected, and the Archbishop feels it necessary to account for his delay by stating that a settlement of these points "is rendered difficult by the ambiguity of the Church rubrics in some instances, and in all by the doubts that may arise as to the weight which should be allowed to general usage, when it varies from the written law." Uncertainty also as to the powers committed to the Primate, in the preface to the Book of Common Prayer, has prevented him from expressing an authoritative opinion; but this reserve and silence, which sit better on the humble, aged, and quiet pastor of a little flock than on the head of a great establishment cast into great confusion, have at last been broken; his hope that the "controversies would die away of themselves" has been a vain one, and he is compelled to interfere. The letter is marked by the same qualities that so long delayed its appearance: it lacks decision and strength; it does not determine; it has a "much may be said on both sides" character; it breathes a kind and earnest desire for peace and concord and "mutual forbearance." Alas! all history shows that in theological controversy they are never found. The utmost he recommends is a suspension of the disputes till some decision, at some indefinite period, shall have been obtained by law. He says:—

"What I would most earnestly recommend for the present, is the discontinuance of any proceedings, in either direction, on the controverted questions. In churches where alterations have been introduced with general acquiescence, let things remain as they are; in those which retain the less accurate usage, let no risk of division be incurred by any attempt at change, till some final arrangement can be made with the sanction of the proper authorities. In the case of churches where agitation prevails, and nothing has been definitely settled, it is not possible to lay down any general rule which may be applicable to all circumstances."

The substance of this is, that those who have innovated have not done wrong, and those who have adhered to old usages, have done right; where hot disputes prevail, "any general rule" is at present impossible. Thus, both parties may appeal to the Primate's letter, and say, we are right. It is plainly evident, that towards the settlement of the question, it will do nothing.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON. THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY

William Howley, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, is the son of a clergyman, the Rev. Mr. W. Howley, and was born in 1765; he is, therefore, of the advanced age of eighty, and having always been of retired habits, it may well be imagined that he feels disinclined to engage in the storms and contentions of these later days. He was a Fellow of New College, Oxford; he was consecrated Bishop of London in 1813, from which see he was translated to the Primacy in 1828. Since that period he has interfered but little in public affairs, and those of the Church have not till within the last few years called on him for more than the ordinary exertions of his pastoral charge. The office he holds is a most exalted one; he takes precedence of all the spiritual and temporal peers of the realm, and in the State as well as the Church, is, by the Constitution, invested with many important functions. He is a Lord of Trade and Plantations, and holds in his hands the patronage of 149 livings; the revenues of the see are estimated at £17,000 per annum. The archiepiscopal palace is at Lambeth, termed by Pope, "The envy of each band and gown," but the Primate, we believe more constantly resides at his seat, Addington Park, Surrey.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON.

The Bishop of London has also had to interfere in these controversies, and, strange to say, though far different in character from the Primate, the charge in which he some time since found it necessary to give his opinion on these rubrical disputes, settled nothing; it went minutely into details, discussed the merits of gown and surplice, and bowings to the east and west, and with infinite ingenuity compromised every disputed question by recommending some middle course that satisfies neither party; it did not approve of all the innovations, neither did it wholly condemn them. The surplice might be worn during the sermon in the morning, the gown in the afternoon; the candles might be placed on the Communion Table, but they must not be lighted; and so with other points. Since that period he has again had to interfere in the agitation of the question in the churches of Tottenham and there it is not settled, only suspended for a year.

Charles James Blomfield is the son of C. Blomfield, Esq.; he graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was a Fellow. He has been something of a courtier, as well as a churchman, having filled the post of Clerk of the Closet to George IV. In old times, the duty of the clergyman holding this office was to stand beside the King's chair during the performance of divine service, to be ready to resolve any question his Majesty might put to him on a theological doubt or difficulty. It may be doubted whether in this respect the office, during the reign of the Bishop's Royal master, did not approach a sinecure. He was consecrated Bishop of Chester in 1824, and was translated to the see of London in 1828, when it was vacated for Canterbury by Dr. Howley. The Right Rev. Prelate is a sound scholar, and is known in the world of letters by an edition of the Greek tragedian, Æschylus, which he edited; he is besides, a man of elegant and accomplished manners.

His life has been a busy one, for he mixes much in political questions. He was one of the supporters of the New Poor law, and had a principal hand in establishing the Ecclesiastical Commission, for which he was attacked by the Rev. Sydney Smith, along with the whole of the Whig Ministry, with his well-known wit and spirit. He is Provincial Dean of Canterbury, and Dean of the Chapels Royal, and holds a large amount of patronage; he has the gift of ninety livings, exclusive, we believe, of the influence he has acquired over many of the new churches built in London and its neighbourhood. The revenues of the see are stated at £11,700 a-year. His lordship has a large family. His residences are London House, St. James's-square, and Fulham Palace, Middlesex.

CONFLAGRATION OF THE OLD GREYFRIARS' CHURCH, EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On Sunday morning last, the good folk of Edinburgh were preparing to go to church when the news rapidly ran through the city that the Old Greyfriars Kirk was in flames. By half-past ten o'clock, thousands of well-dressed persons were on the spot, and beheld one of the grandest, but at the same time, sorrowful sights it had been their lot to witness for years. The sacred building—one of the largest in Edinburgh, containing two churches, separated by a partition*—vomited forth vast sheets of fire from the interior, the whole of which was one unbroken blaze. Shooting fiercely up from the flooring, the flames ignited the old dry wooden pews and galleries, and forcing their way through the roof, darted high into the air. Immense volumes of dense black smoke slowly issuing from the burning structure, hung like a pall over the Grass-market, the Cowgate, and the High-street, betokening that masses of ignitive materials were preparing to keep up the blaze. There happened to be a circular stair between the two churches, and that acted as a blow-pipe to the destructive element, and was partly the occasion of the extraordinary quantity of smoke, Against such a body of flame it was evident that the best fire-engines could be of little avail. Several were, however, on the spot betimes, and after some delay in procuring water, were put into operation. The efforts of the fire brigade were chiefly directed towards saving that portion of the structure, which, having been more recently fitted up, was called the "New Church;" even that seemed a hopeless business, for the wall which separated it from the Old Church reached no higher than the ceiling, the loft between that and the slated roof being a continuous open space, and through which there was a thorough draught from an open window at each end. Hence, at one time, despite the vigorous exertions of the firemen, the whole of the top of this vast building was one sheet of flame, to which the rafters of the roof and joists of the ceiling supplied fuel. The view at this time was really grand, especially from the front entrance to the church-yard, in Candlemaker-row, whence the rapid, but brilliant work of devastation was laid open to view by the bursting forth of the great window at the eastern end of the edifice.

All this while the "engines" continued their hopeless work, and some of the firemen exposed themselves to risks which shook the nerves of the spectators almost to the point of terror. Five or six men stationed themselves on the top of the side wall above the great window, after the roof had fallen in, and discharged volumes of water into the burning abyss below, running backward and forward on the giddy verge, while burning joists and rafters were falling thickly around them. "Two of these great beams," says the Edinburgh Courant, "forming together one of the supports of the sloping roof, fell in close by one of the men, and meeting in the confined space between the two side walls, the extreme end of one of them projected outwards, and was within an inch of precipitating him to the ground. It fortunately passed without touching him. Another of the firemen dashed through the flames into the church, and issued out again with some plates used at the church doors for collections, the glowing metal actually melting in his hands. He offered to go back for the remainder, but was assured by our excellent Superintendent of Public Works that they were hardly worth the saving." Meantime the Lord Provost (who made an early appearance on the scene with several of the town-council) ordered the men to descend from the top of the wall, as their exertions, though extremely courageous, were of little avail against such a body of flame. Indeed, it soon became evident that the handful of men who compose the Edinburgh fire brigade, were ar too few n number to be of efficient service, and the chief magistrate sent an express to the Castle, soliciting the aid of the military. Three companies of the 87th Royal Irish Fusileers were instantly turned out; one company to keep the ground around the church, and the other two on "fatigue" duty to assist the firemen in working the engines. They continued till about four o'clock in the afternoon, and were of the most essential service throughout the whole course of the fire; and so scrupulous were they, that, we understand, an offer of refreshments made to the men through their officers, was declined by them; though it must have been felt by all that the exertions of the soldiers, continued through so many hours, would have amply justified its acceptance. By this time the fire had gradually subsided, as much from want of fuel as from any other cause; but it was found that the perseverance of the firemen in endeavouring to save the New Church had not been useless, for although nothing of the Old Kirk stands but the bare outside walls, some portion of the former still remains.

The fire originated like that of the old houses of Parliament and many other public buildings, through the over-heating and bad construction of flues. It was usual, it seems, to make a large fire every Saturday night in the Old Church at eight o'clock in a stove, from which heat is communicated by means of pipes to the rest of the building. The main pipe ran under the floor and far too near to the wooden beams, which support it. These, old and dried by the weekly heatings of several years, at length caught fire, and when the beadle, at nine o'clock last Sunday morning, opened the church to prepare it for service, he "thought he smelt fire," and went for a bucket to put it out. The door he had opened, however, had in his absence acted as a bellows, and when he returned with the carefully procured pail-full of water, the whole of the floor was in a blaze. He then bethought him of the fire-engines, and sent for them.

* This is by no means uncommon in reference to large old churches and cathedrals. Economy of space, as well of everything else, is the order of the day in Scotland. The High Church (St. Giles's) of Edinburgh for instance, is divided into three separate churches, in all of which divine service is performed at the same time on the Sabbath; neither are the partitions so thick as to prevent the voice of an energetic preacher or the sounds of the singing being heard by each of the congregations.

Though not one of the oldest, the Greyfriars was one of the most celebrated structures in Edinburgh. Its graveyard contains the remains of those martyrs to religous opinion who are justly esteemed amongst the heroes of modern times. It was here, too, that the "Solemn League and Covenant," for which they bled and died, was signed by the King's Commissaries and the Presbyterians. From those graves and in this building it is more than likely that Sir Walter Scott obtained those inspirations which he afterwards so vividly embodied in his works; as he, with his father and the rest of the family, constantly attended at this Kirk, it being not far from the house in which he was born. Amongst the interesting relics sacrificed in the flames is a table which belonged to John Knox.

The above view of the edifice as it stood entire, presents its west end. The other shows the eastern gable with the great window through which the flames were seen enveloping the whole of the interior.

"THE LIGHT FOR ALL NATIONS," ON THE GOODWIN SANDS.

Thou Earthly Star! by mercy lit to save
And guide the Mariner from a wat'ry grave,
Thou bright discov'ry in th' astrology
That rules the fitful dangers of the sea,
How many a heart will throb in future years
With gratitude towards thee—many tears
That else were wept in sorrow will o'erflow
In rapture of delight, to feel and know
That distant, wide as may the wand'rer roam
There's still a beacon-lamp which guides him home!
Oh! thus domestic, calm felicity,
However rustic or retir'd it be
Will send its cottage candle from afar
And to the way-ward pilgrim be a star! W.

Mr. Bush is proceeding prosperously with this extremely difficult work, the correct details of which will be acceptable to the reader.

THE "LIGHT FOR ALL NATIONS," ON THE GOODWIN SANDS.

The height of the iron column to sustain the Light-house, as shown in the print, is now 41 feet above low-water mark; and will be raised 12 feet in addition, after Mr. Bush has accomplished his task of boring, to ascertain the strata of the Goodwin. The column is firmly fixed in the caisson, and sustained in its perpendicular position by iron plumb-blocks, as well as by stays which are attached to the side of the caisson, and have a spread of 3 feet.

The action of the sea has no effect whatever, either on the shaft or the caisson, which is as firm as the mainland, and will, when filled with concrete and cement, become solid rock. The Lighthouse will be approached by an iron spiral stair-case, round the outside of the shaft, and defended by an iron railing. The lanthorn will, by permission of the Trinity Board, be illuminated by eight of the Patent Vesta Lamps, and present a pale blue colour, which will distinguish it from all other lights in the vicinity of the Goodwin. A telegraph will be fixed over the summit of the lanthorn, as shown in the drawing; it will be 60 feet above high-water mark.

The successful issue of the work thus far, has been already commemorated in a truly national manner; for, on the 9th inst., the enterprising engineer, Mr. Bush, and a party, celebrated the raising of the beacon, by partaking of roast beef and plum-pudding, on a platform laid on its summit.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

SERK, THE COUPEE ROCK.

Several events in this portion of the British dominions have, of late, tended to awaken public curiosity as to its history and present condition, which are, comparatively, little known or understood.

Some twelve years since, the late Mr. Inglis, the matter-of-fact tourist, left England with the intention of residing a year or two in the Channel Islands He was so pleased with the localities, that he protracted his stay to the last-mentioned period; and the result of his sojourn was a very interesting account of the Islands, and their social economy. He commences his work with this sensible observation: "It cannot, I think, be doubted that less is known in England of the Channel Islands, than of any other colony or de pendency of the British Crown, of equal size and importance. The Channel Islands have a population exceeding 65,000; and Jersey alone has a shipping reaching 21,000 tons. And, yet, I will venture to assert that more is actually known, and more accurate information is to be gathered from authentic sources respecting the smallest of the colonies which lie in the Atlantic or Indian oceans, than respecting Jersey or Guernsey. And this is more extraordinary, when we consider that there are certain points of interest attached to the Channel Islands, peculiarly their own; and which essentially distinguish them from the other colonies and dependencies of Great Britain. Among these may be enumerated their connexion with the Norman Conquest, and long dependence upon the British Crown; their separate and independent constitution,—and the peculiar laws by which they are governed; their singular privileges, their native civilized inhabitants; their vicinity to the coast of France; and the general use of the French language." Since the date of Mr. Inglis's visit, there have been several occasions upon which the Channel Islands have been brought before the public by such crises or turns of events as have just taken place in Jersey and Guernsey. The present may, therefore, be a fitting opportunity for introducing to our readers their actual condition.

First, of their history. They must have been known to the Romans; but the only mention of them in any ancient writer, is in the "Itinerary of Antoninus." In the sixth century, Christianity was introduced into these islands; before which Druidism was their religion, as is attested by several existing chronicles, and other supposed relics of that system. The Channel Islands were included in the Duchie of Normandie, and are the only relics of that duchy which remain to the English Crown. In the time of Edward I., the islanders stoutly repelled an attack from the French; but, in the reign of Edward III., Guernsey was, according to Falle, in his "History of Jersey," conquered by the French, and recovered after they had held it three years; but the authority of this account is doubtful. It was again, during the reign of the same Prince, attacked by the French, but without success. In the reign of Edward VI., the French attacked by surprise a squadron of ships lying off Guernsey, but were repulsed. In the civil war of Charles and his Parliament, the Channel Islands embraced the King's party, and were not subdued until after the death of Charles.

Protestantism was introduced into the islands in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., and made considerable progress. When it was restored under Elizabeth, the Genevese discipline was gradually introduced, and at length formally established by two general synods of the clergy of all the islands. That these proceedings should have received no check from the Queen, as imperious in ecclesiastical as in civil matters, is a curious feature in the history of the times. Presbyterianism retained its predominance in Guernsey until the Restoration of Charles II., and the passing of the Act of Uniformity. Many were then induced to fall in with the liturgic service; but so late as A.D. 1755, the Dean was obliged to apply to the civil magistrates to enforce the reading of the Litany. So lately as 1838, the surplice was not used; and, though the baptism was generally administered in the church, yet there was not a font in the whole island of Guernsey.

about 6 leagues from France, and 23 from England: it is about 12 miles in length, from east to west, and from 5 to 7 miles in breadth, containing about 63 square miles. The shore contains numerous bays, charmingly diversified with wood and cultivated fields, and thickly dotted with villages and cottages; and the tourist, in approaching from England, cannot fail to be struck with the grey and imposing fortress of Elizabeth Castle, built on a huge sea-girt rock, while in front is seen the town of St. Helier, commanded by its lofty stronghold, and backed by a fine range of wooded and cultivated heights.

St. Helier lies on the eastern, and St. Aubin on the western, side of St. Aubin's Bay. The former reminds one of a Swiss town: externally, it is much on a level with English country-towns of the same size; but it has a very fine square, resembling a French place. The most attractive object, however, is Fort Regent, commenced in 1806, and built at a cost of £800,000; which, however, Mr. Inglis thinks to be placed on the wrong side of the bay for the defence of the town

In the street population, there is an extraordinary contrast exhibited between business and idleness: the English residents have nothing to do, and the islanders are busy in supplying their wants. The enormous flap-eared pyramidal cap, worn by the Norman women, is frequently seen; and there is, indeed, a French air, and an admixture of French dress among the females of the inferior ranks.

St. Aubin, though a small town, is a considerable ornament to the island: it is distant from St. Helier about three miles by sea, and four by land. "Nothing can be sweeter," says Mr. Inglis, "than the situation of St. Aubin; partly skirting the shore, and partly lying on the rocky, and well wooded heights, that, from the backs of the houses, drop perpendicularly into the sea; and backed and surrounded on three sides by a very fertile and yet a picturesque country." The town consists principally of one street, and though not possessing all the bustle of St. Helier, it shares some portion of the foreign trade. Indeed, it was once the chief place of trade in the island; but, in process of time, St. Helier usurped the principal portion of the commerce. A fort, mounting fourteen guns, has been erected on a rock, which, though dry at low water, becomes an islet as the tide rises. From the fort projects a strong pier, within which there is, at new and full moon, a depth of thirty feet of water; but it is merely a tide harbour.

The third town in Jersey is Gorey, very attractive to tourists, from its immediate vicinity to Mount Orgueil Castle, the pride of Jersey; its situation, upon the summit of a rocky headland, between St. Katherine's and Grouville bays, is very imposing; its ivy mantled walls are very picturesque; and the prospect from its heights is truly magnificent. Its origin and builder are unknown; but, it was a place of consequence in the reign of King John. Two celebrated persons have been its inmates: Charles II., who remained here several months; and the well-known Prynne, who was a prisoner in it for nearly three years; during which, he wrote a poem descriptive of the castle. Our artist has chosen this fine ruin for his sketch. The importance of Gorey depends on its oyster fishery, in which, upwards of 250 boats are employed; the produce realizing to the island £20,000 or £30,000 per annum.

The other places in the island are mere hamlets, grouped round the churches of the respective parishes, or scattered along the coast. There are several ancient manor-houses, and some of the churches are of considerable antiquity. The gardens are very numerous; and so mild is the climate that myrtle and hydrangias grow luxuriantly in the open air; the climate being considerably warmer than that of any part of England. Mr. Inglis's work affords a very minute account of the islanders, the state of society, rate of living, &c., in Jersey; for the details of which, however, we have not space.

During the first American war, Jersey was thrice attacked. The first time (May, 1779) was by an armament with a land force of 5000 or 6000 men, under the Prince of Nassau; but the attempts to land were repulsed. In the second attack, the French fleet was destroyed by Sir James Wallace. The third attack was in December, 1780, when the Baron de Rullecourt landed with 700 men, took possession of St. Helier, and made the Lieutenant-Governor, Major Corbet, prisoner, and induced him to sign a capitulation. The British troops and island militia, under Major Pierson, next in command, refused to recognise the capitulation; and, attacking the French, killed Rullecourt, with the greater part of his men; and Major Pierson fell early in the attack.

GUERNSEY,

the second of the Channel Islands, lies nearer Jersey than to England. In form it approaches a right-angled triangle; the sides facing the south, east, and north-west, and being respectively six and a half, six, and nine miles long. The coast is rocky, and has very rapid currents around it. The island is not so well wooded as Jersey; but the soil is fertile, the cultivation of flowers extensive, and the breeding of cattle, especially of cows, is an object of great attention. The shores are well stocked with a great variety of fish. The only division of the island is into parishes: the only town is St. Peter's Port, situated on the slope of a hill, about the middle of the eastern coast of the island, and extending for nearly a mile along the shore. One of the most striking buildings is Elizabeth College, a handsome and extensive edifice, of monastic character. Our artist has chosen the roadstead, defended by Castle Cornet, which is a striking object in approaching the island. It is built on a rock, at somewhat less than half a mile from the shore. Mr. Inglis describes it as less picturesque than Elizabeth Castle, Jersey; because it is not, like the latter, flanked by other rocks than that upon which it is built; and the folly of whitewashing part of it has greatly injured its naturally venerable appearance. It is difficult to distinguish between Elizabeth Castle, and the rock upon which it is built; but the renovators of Castle Cornet have taken care to make the line distinct enough.

Our third Engraving is sketched from or Sercque, the next island in size to Alderney, and from six and a half to seven miles east of Guernsey. Its greatest dimension is about three miles from north to south; its greatest breadth is about one mile and a half; but it is so contracted near the centre of the island that it may be regarded as consisting of two parts, one of them called Little Serk, connected together by a high and narrow ridge or isthmus, called the Coupée. This point is shown in our engraving.

We add a few notes on the constitution of the local Government of the Channel Islands, which recent events have so frequently brought into question.

Guernsey, like Jersey, has a political constitution of its own. The legislative body is the States of Deliberation, which are composed of the Bailiff of the Royal Court, who is Speaker; the Procureur, or Attorney of the Royal Court; the Rectors of parishes; the Constables of the parishes, one from each, who are mere delegates, voting according to the instructions given them by their constituents; and the Jurats or Judges of the Royal Court. The number of members is, Bailiff, 1; Procureur, 1; Rectors, 8; Constables, 10; Jurats, 12: total, 32.

The Bailiff and Procureur are nominated by the Crown; the Rectors are presented by the Governor; the Constables and the Jurats are elected by the islanders. The money required for the public expense, is voted by the States; though that body cannot levy any new tax or subsidy (except on great emergencies) without the Royal permission. The revenue of the island is derived from the general taxes, harbour dues, publicans' and spirit retailers' licences, and other sources. The general taxes are levied for parochial, as well as general, purposes, and are assessed upon capital of almost every kind, including capital in the British or Foreign Funds, provided it belongs to an individual domiciled in Guernsey. Pensions, salaries, professional income, half-pay, &c., are not taxed.

The chief court of justice in the island is the Royal Court, and consists of the Bailiff and 12 Jurats. There is an appeal in certain cases, to the King in council. Judicial proceedings are conducted in the language of the island. Norman customs and ancient precedents form the basis of the civil jurisprudence, which is a complex mixture of Norman and English law. The power of the Royal Court is very extensive and undefined. The island constitutes a deanery in the diocese of Winchester; the incumbents receive only the small tithes, and the livings are very poor; the great tithes are the property of the Crown, and are appropriated to the Governor.

The dialect of Guernsey, commonly considered a patois of French, is, in fact, the pure Norman of many centuries ago. Indeed, the inhabitants of some of the parishes in the Channel Islands, who have constantly intermarried, are purer Normans than those of the Continent. The knowledge of English is general among the upper classes.

It may be interesting to add that on the 22nd of December, 1843, at the several Channel Islands—Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, Serk, Herme, and Jethore, a slight shock of earthquake occurred simultaneously: first was heard a noise resembling distant thunder—then sounds as of a railroad carriage rumbling over an irregular metallic surface; accompanied by a distinct undulatory motion; the whole lasting from ten to fifteen seconds. Hundreds of persons agree as to having experienced a distinct shock, their impressions varying according to the positions occupied by the observers. Those inhabiting the solid granite structures of the lower town conceived that heavy masses of furniture were overturned and moved in the apartments above or below them: they were not, however, so conscious of vibratory motion as those in the less substantial houses of the upper part of the town, or as those in the open air. In many houses this vibratory motion was so violent as to cause much alarm, and was accompanied by crashing sounds, as though roofs and chimneys were falling; in some instances, chimney-pots were thrown down; suspended lamps were observed to wave; bells rang spontaneously; the vane of the town church waved, and one of its bells struck twice.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SHOCKING OCCURRENCE AT A SAW-MILL.—On Monday Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's-inn-road, on the body of Frederick Case, aged 26, a sawyer, in the employ of Mr. Garrett, at the St. Pancras saw mills, Old St. Pancras-road. Edward Weston said, on the morning of Thursday, the 9th instant, he and deceased were at work together at Mr. Garrett's mills with one of the circular saws, when one of the wedges placed in the wood for the guidance of the saw fell out, the saw being in full work at the time. The deceased descended to the bottom of the pit to pick up the wedge, and on his return the saw caught his head and he fell in stantly into the pit. Witness ran and stopped the mill; and James Butler, another sawyer, assisted in the removal of deceased from the pit, when it was discovered that his skull had been severed by the saw, and he was immediately conveyed in a cab to the hospital. Mr. Thomas Hill, resident surgeon at the hospital, deposed that on the deceased's admission he found his skull separated to the extent of eight inches in length. The brain and its integuments were also completely severed; but notwithstanding this dreadful injury, the deceased was perfectly sensible for the first three days, but from that time he gradually sank, and died on Friday. Verdict—"Accidental death."

THE MURDER AT SALT HILL.—The prisoner John Tawell is confined in one of the cells in which there are two or three other prisoners, and no alteration or relaxation of the prison regulations has been made. His solicitor, Mr. Bevan, has had a lengthened interview with him, with a view, it is understood, to some arrangement being effected as to his property, the bulk of which is in Sydney, and at this moment is not available, so that, although the prisoner is a wealthy man, he is at this time very short of funds. Mrs. Tawell, the prisoner's wife, has twice visited her husband in gaol, having procured an order from one of the magistrates for that purpose. It appears that the prisoner was in the habit of purchasing a quantity of drugs at Mr. Thomas's, in Bishopsgate-street, and other shops. These medicines, it has been ascertained, he dispensed to the afflicted poor at Berkhampstead. He never purchased any hydrocianic acid of Mr. Thomas until the 1st inst. The accused has exhibited much restlessness since his commitment, and his health has apparently undergone an unfavourable change.

AN ELDERLY LADY BURNED TO DEATH.—On Monday night Mrs. Johnson, aged 76, wife of a retired calico printer, residing at Wandsworth, was burnt to death by the accidental ignition of her clothes. She was found dead in the passage of her house; her clothes were almost wholly consumed, and all her hair was burnt off.

A MAN COMMITTED CHARGED WITH A MURDER EIGHT YEARS AGO.—On Tuesday Charles Lamb, a prisoner in the House of Correction, underwent an examination before Mr. Mills, an Uxbridge magistrate, in the board room of the prison, on a charge of having murdered John Brill, a youth of 16, in a wood at Ruislip, near Uxbridge, on the 16th of February, 1837. We have already mentioned some particulars connected with the case. The first witness on Tuesday was George Sibley (who, with the accused, is at present undergoing a six months' imprisonment in the House of Correction, Coldbath-fields, for poaching). He deposed that the prisoner had said to him, as they were walking from Rickmansworth to Harefield, about a twelvemonth ago, after having had some conversation about getting into trouble, and how much easier it was to get into trouble than to get out of it, "I'd sooner be taken for the murder than go to prison for this" (namely, poaching); and on his asking what murder, Lamb said—"I was in Churchill's wood, cutting a bundle of wood, when a boy, named John Brill, came up to me, and I took and knocked him down;" and he added, "I stood for a moment, and took up his cap and hung it up on a bough, and laid his cuff and billhook by the side of him, so as if he had tumbled out of a tree." Lamb then said to him, "Nobody else knows on't but you, and if you tell anybody I'll kill you." Lamb also told him that the boy was walking round the wood watching. The witness said he had heard of the murder some years ago, and knew Lamb had been up for it. Had never had any quarrel with Lamb since he had known him. Had told what Lamb said because since he had been in Coldbath-fields he had had such queer dreams. He felt he could not be happy unless he told it, and he thought something would happen to him if he did not. No person had made him any promise on the subject. The witness, on being required, here looked Lamb steadfastly in the face, and declared what he had said to be the truth, and nothing but the truth. The prisoner strenuously denied it, saying that Sibley only said so, thinking he should get out of prison by that means. A variety of evidence was gone into, proving that the body of the boy Brill was actually found in the position stated by Sibley to have been described to him by the prisoner, and that the prisoner was seen going into the wood with a bill in his hand on the morning of the day in which the boy was missing, and afterwards returning out of it with a bundle of wood and underwood freshly cut on his shoulder; that some underwood had been recently cut about twenty yards from the spot where the body was found, together with the opinion of the surgeon who made the post-mortem examination, that death was caused by a violent blow on the left temple, and could not have been caused by a fall on the ground (which was then soft), considering the character of the appearances presented by the head and temples. The prisoner, on being called on for his defence, protested his innocence, and said that Sibley had been living in the neighbourhood at the time the boy was missing, and knew the particulars, as all other persons did. The prisoner, also, on being told that he stood committed for the murder, declared that he was innocent, and said that he had no fear or dread about it.

SUDDEN DEATH OF COLONEL KENNETT, K.C.B.—On Tuesday night an inquest was held at the Friend-in-Hand Tavern, Brompton, before Mr. Wakley, M.P., on view of the body of Colonel Charles Robert Kennett, aged 61, who was found dead in his bed on Sunday morning, at his residence, No. 31, Hans-square, Sloane-street. Mr. William Morrah, surgeon, of Sloane-street, Chelsea, deposed that he was intimately acquainted with the late gallant Colonel, who held a command under the Duke of Wellington during the whole of the Peninsular campaign. Witness had attended him professionally since the 10th of last December. His complaint was disease of the heart. On Sunday morning last, during divine service, witness was called from church to attend at the residence of the deceased. Witness went immediately, and found the gallant officer in bed, quite dead. He must have been so some hours.—By the Coroner: I am of opinion that the death of the deceased was from natural causes. When I first entered his room there was a phial and tumbler on his dressing table, the latter of which had contained the medicine I had prescribed for him. The verdict was "Died by the visitation of God."

AN INFANT SENT IN A RAILWAY PARCEL.—An adjourned inquest was held at Winchester on Monday, on the body of an infant that had been sent by railway in a basket, addressed to some person not to be found. The basket was at length opened at the railway station, and inside was the body of an infant in a decomposed state. The inquest had been adjourned for the purpose of making inquiries, but as no further information had been produced, the jury returned an open verdict, "That the deceased child had been sent down from London by the South Western Railway to Winchester, but by whom so sent, or by what means it came by its death, there was no evidence to show."

MURDER OF A CHILD.—On Wednesday Mr. W. Carter held an inquest at the Cottage of Content, Lock's-fields, Walworth, on the body of a newly born female child, found in the area of one of the new buildings in Penton-street, Kennington-lane, on Sunday. Mr. W. H. Day, surgeon, of 40, Salisbury-place, Lock's-fields, said deceased was of recent birth. He found several injuries about the head, apparently inflicted by some blunt instrument, from the effect of which deceased had died. There was no doubt whatever but that the child had been alive. Verdict—"That the deceased was born alive, and that she was wilfully murdered by some person or persons unknown"

ROBBERY AT COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.—Last Saturday evening, Mr. Joshua Brodrick, a gentleman recently from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and residing at No. 23, Haydon-square, Minories, was robbed, while sitting in the pit of Covent-garden Theatre, of bank notes to the value of £825. The notes were enclosed in a paper packet, and were deposited in an inside breast pocket of his inner coat. They consisted chiefly of Bank of England notes. About thirty of them were for £10 each, and the rest £5 each. How the robbery was effected, or at what period of the evening, is quite a mystery.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE NORTH UNION RAILWAY.—On Thursday night week a fatal accident happened to a man named William Round, on the North Union Railway, near the luggage station, Wigan. On the night in question, his brother being called in some direction, it fell to the lot of Wm. Round to attend a luggage train, for the purpose of removing some tarpauling sheets from the waggons, before the train proceeded from the station. He was engaged in doing this when the train started, and had left his lamp on the side of the line; he is supposed to have either jumped off the carriages, or have been so much thrown off his balance in getting upon them, that when he came to the ground he staggered backwards, and fell over the side of the bridge, his head coming in contact with some stones, and his body rolling into the river Douglas, where it was found early next morning. An inquest was held on Saturday evening, when a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned. The jury also strongly recommended that a suitable guard or protection should be immediately placed upon the bridge; which recommendation is about to be complied with.

EXPLOSION AND FIRE.—On Thursday morning an explosion took place in the oil and colour stores of Mr. Bayliss, colourman, No. 149, Whitechapel-road. Two lads in the employ of Mr. Bayliss were engaged in drawing off a quantity of naphtha from a churn-shaped vessel. Whilst they were so employed the light they held communicated with the inflammable fluid. In an instant the body of naphtha took fire, and the house was one mass of blaze. Copious supplies of water being furnished to the engines at work, the ruins were cooled by half-past 10 o'clock, but every particle of property is destroyed, and the house, which is completely burned through, and in a very tottering state, must be taken down. One of the lads was severely burned about the hands and face. The house and contents are insured. The adjoining premises, occupied by Mr. G. Westropp, baker, and Mr. Sewin, corn-chandler, are partially injured by fire and water.

The Vigie of Morbihan states that on the evening of the 15th, a shock of an earthquake was felt at St. Malo. A noise like the roll of a carriage was heard for six or eight seconds.

THE CASE OF SHOOTING NEAR ROCHESTER.—The magistrates were engaged for some time on Monday in taking the depositions of the several witnesses in the case of the boy White, who was shot on Christmas-day, in a field at Chalk, and for which offence George Blake, aged 12, and Charles Rand, aged 14, have been held in custody. From the evidence of Dr. Brown, who attends the boy White, it appears that there were 23 wounds in the head, besides others in the neck, arm, and side. He still considered his patient in a very doubtful state. From the evidence of the witnesses, it appears that there was a quarrel between the parties respecting rabbit-shooting; that White kicked Blake in the groin, on which the latter said, with an oath, "I'll shoot you." Rand first took the gun and pointed it at White, but immediately said, "I shan't shoot him; you shoot him." Blake then took the gun, and pointed it at White, who ran away, when Blake instantly fired, hitting him as above described. The prisoners wept bitterly during the examination, and were fully committed to take their trial at the next assizes at Maidstone.

WATCHES by WEBSTER and SON, Chronometer Makers to the Lords of the Admiralty.—W. and Son's establishment for the manufacture of watches and clocks is the oldest in London, having continued in Cornhill 134 years. An extensive stock for selection, finished with the utmost care, at the lowest prices consistent with security for the finest manufacture and the maintenance of that reputation for superior workmanship which has distinguished their house for so many years. Compensated duplex and lever watches, to counteract the variations of temperature, upon the principle of their chronometers, to which Government awarded the prizes three years in succession; small elegant lever and horizontal watches in gold cases, engraved or engine-turned for ladies or gentlemen; small flat silver detached lever and horizontal watches, for youths, at very moderate prices; marine and pocket chronometers, new and second-hand; ornamental and every description of clocks; regulators upon the most approved principles. Also their newly-invented patent instrument the ORTHOCHRONOGRAPH, for ascertaining correct time at any part of the world. Superior workmen are employed upon the premises in the repairing department for English and foreign work. The utmost value allowed for old watches in exchange.—74, Cornhill.

PARR'S LIFE PILLS.—The extraordinary success of this medicine is the wonder of the age; it has been tried by hundreds of thousands as an aperient, and has in every instance done good; it has never in the slightest degree impaired the most delicate constitution. Tens of thousands have testified that perseverance in the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS will completely cure any disease, and are living witnesses of the benefit received from this invaluable medicine.—Sheets of testimonials and the "Life and Times of Old Parr," may be had, gratis, of every respectable Medicine Vendor throughout the Kingdom.

Beware of spurious imitations of the above medicine. None are genuine unless the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS" are in WHITE LETTERS ON A RED GROUND, engraved on the Government Stamp, pasted round each box; also the fac-simile of the signature of the Proprietors, "T. ROBERTS and Co." London, on the directions.
Sold in boxes at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and family packets at 11s., by Edwards, 67, St. Paul's; Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard, London; Mottershead and Co., Manchester; and J. and R. Raimes and Co., Edinburgh; Mitchell, Glasgow; and by all respectable Druggists and Patent Medicine Retailers throughout the Kingdom.—Directions are given with each box.

CLOSE OF HOLIDAYS.—Now that the season of annual festivity is about to terminate, and the respective boarding-schools be re-instated by the busy throng of youthful aspirants, the personal comfort and attractions of whom become naturally an object with friends and relatives of great solicitude, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for accelerating the growth, and for preserving and beautifying the Hair; ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for preserving the Skin and Complexion, and removing Cutaneous Eruptions; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, for beautifying the Teeth, and preserving the Gums, are universally considered indispensable in the requisite accompaniments of the decorative repository. The august patronage conceded by all the Sovereigns of Europe to these creative renovating specifics, and confirmation, by experience, of their infallible efficacy, have characterized them with perfection, and given them a celebrity unparalleled.

CAUTION.—Beware of SPURIOUS IMITATIONS under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty). See that the word "ROWLAND'S" is on the Wrapper of each article. For the protection of the public from fraud and imposition, the Hon. Commissioners of Stamps have directed the Proprietors' Signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus—"A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden;" which is affixed on the KALYDOR and ODONTO. Sold by the Proprietors, and by Chemists and Perfumers.— All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

POPE GREGORY XVI.

GREGORY XVI.

Gregory XVI., the present Pope, was born on the 18th September, 1765, at Belluno, in the territory of Venice. His family name is Maro Capellari, from which, according to the custom that derives the arms of the reigning Pontiff from the surname of his family, on his armorial shield is displayed a Hat. He was educated from his youth up, for the church, and having completed his studies, he entered the Benedictine order. In 1795, he came to Rome, with the reputation of the great theological learning, which, four years afterwards, he exhibited in a work entitled "Il trionfo della santa sede e della Chiesa contro gli assolti dei novatori." He was made Procurator-General, and subsequently Vicar-General of his order, and was invested with the purple by Leo XII., on the 13th of March, 1825; he was at the same time appointed to the post of a prefect of the Congregatio de Propaganda fide. During his Cardinalship, he was employed in many important matters connected with the affairs of the Church. He was charged by Leo with the management of the concordat with the Netherlands, as a man of great knowledge and experience in canonical questions, and, afterwards, under Leo's successor, Pius VIII., he had the management of the controversy with the Court of Prussia on the vexed question of mixed marriages.

To him, it is said, are to be attributed the celebrated letter of Pope Pius, and the accompanying instructions to the Bishop of Cologne—instructions which were destined in the sequel to cause himself so much difficulty after his accession to the chair. Cardinal Capellari stood high in public opinion at Rome. He was admired for his learning, respected for his piety, and beloved for his simplicity of manners, his mildness, and integrity. After the death of Pius VIII., the conclave sat for fifty days, and among the ardent aspirants to the vacant seat, his name was at first scarcely heard, and when mentioned, it was coupled with but slender probabilities of his election. It was therefore almost unexpectedly that the decision of the conclave, on the 2nd February, 1831, declared Cardinal Capellari to have been elected Pope. His election gave more satisfaction to the people of Rome, than that of any similar election for a considerable period. The rule of his two predecessors, Leo and Pius, had on various grounds, it is stated, caused much popular discontent; the present choice was hailed as a welcome one. The new Pope assumed the name of Gregory XVI., after his patron saint, and was crowned on the 6th of February, four days after his election. The state of Italy at that time, and the relations of the Church with foreign powers were critical, and as Dante sings, there was need—

> "Now of one who were a fit colleague
> To keep the bark of Peter in deep sea

Gregory had devoted more of his attention to the spiritual affairs of the church than to temporal and worldly business; and feeling, probably, this to be necessary also to a ruler, he supplied it by selecting the most experienced, acute, and diplomatic member of the College—Cardinal Bernetti, as his secretary. At this time there were disturbances and threatened revolts in Bologna, Ferrara, and Ancona; and even in Rome itself there was much cause for uneasiness. The measures taken to check these manifestations plainly showed that the Cardinals Albani and Bernetti were the actual rulers, and their severity lost to Gregory much of his popularity. The late outbreaks, and the rigour, amounting to bloodthirstiness, with which they have been punished, prove that the temporal Government of the Roman States is in the hands of men not endowed with that kindness of feeling that has been attributed to Gregory himself. As the ruler of the Roman Church he has been far more successful; he watches carefully both over its discipline and doctrine; unlike his conduct in worldly matters, he has here been neither weak nor wavering. But the unbending spirit he displays has been sorely tried in the contests in which the political condition of the Church in the States of Europe has involved him. Gregory, though now fourscore, is said to be strong and active; he suffers from a disease of the nose, which makes him irritable. The rescript he has sent to the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland, and the rumours which have been current of the disposition of the present Ministry to establish diplomatic relations with the Papal Court (which is forbidden by penal statute), have given him at present an interest to the reader of English politics.

CONTINENTAL RAILWAYS.

The works on the Boulogne and Amiens line, between the latter town and Abbeville, have been commenced. The company which had been formed for constructing a railroad between Rouen and Caen, has come to an understanding with the Rouen Railroad Company, which has agreed to carry out the undertaking. When the line is executed, the intercourse between Paris and the capital of Lower Normandy will be most direct and satisfactory.

The Strasburg and Basle Company are at present getting surveys made of the ground between Sarrebruck and Sarrebourg.

The Courrier de Lyons announces that the Minister of Public Works has definitively adopted the line of the valley of the Ouze as the route which the Paris and Lyons line is to take.

The works of the Tours and Nantes line are to commence immediately in the department of the Loire-Inferieure.

A meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of Cherbourg was held a few days ago, for the purpose of considering what line would prove most advisable for a railroad communication between Cherbourg and Paris.

The directors of the Marseilles and Avignon Railroad Company have sent in to the Minister of Public Works a tender for the execution and working of the line from Avignon to Lyons.

DIEPPE AND PARIS.—Three different surveys have been made by this company, viz.—the mountain, the tunnel, and the valley lines. The longest is 43 miles; the shortest 36.

MONTPELIER AND NISMES.—This line was opened on the 9th inst.

BERLIN.—The Berlin line, direct to Konigsberg will cost 36,000,000 thalers, or £5,000,000 sterling.

The Austrian Government has resolved to extend the Great Northern line to Bochnia.

It is said that the Prussian Government has resolved to impose a tax on the gross receipts of the various lines, and to look upon time bargains in foreign shares as upon dealings in Spanish bonds, i.e., as illegal.

TITHE COMMUTATION TABLES.—The annual supplement to "Willich's Tithe Commutation Tables" has just been published, from which we glean the following important facts:—The average prices for last year were 51s. 3d. per imperial quarter for wheat, 33s. 8d. for barley, and 20s. 7d. for oats; while the average prices for seven years to Christmas last, amount to 60s. 8d. per imperial quarter for wheat, 32s. 10d. for barley, and 22s. for oats. Each £100 of rent-charge in 1845 will amount to £103 17s. 11¼d., or 5s. 6d. per cent. less than the amount of last year.

THE OFFICE OF QUEEN'S PROCTOR.—This lucrative post, vacant by the decease of Mr. Ilted Nichol, is at length filled up. Mr. Dyke, of the firm of Jenner, Dyke, and Jenner, Proctors, and son of Sir Perceval Hart Dyke, is to be the new Queen's Proctor. The gentleman deceased, whose post is thus supplied, was a nephew of Sir John Nichol. The annual average of the present fees of office, on a moderate computation, is £2000; formerly they were much larger.

A TRIANGULAR DUEL IN REALITY.—The following is an extract from a private letter, dated Nice, Jan. 8:—"There has been rather a damp thrown over society at large here recently. At a club supper, after a ball, a dispute arose between a Russian, a Frenchman, and an Italian; the Russian challenged the Frenchman, and the Italian the Russian; the latter two immediately went out—their feelings towards each other almost amounted to madness, as they fixed to have but one pistol loaded, and the muzzles to each other's breasts; but the second (for they had only one, as the others would not, they said, wait to witness a murder) loaded the pistol so that it would not go off. They then returned to town to the Italian's rooms for other pistols; while there, in walked the Governor with the police, arrested both, and put them in confinement, also the Frenchman. This happened two days before Christmas-day, and they are not yet liberated. It must, it is feared, end in bloodshed, as the Frenchman struck the Russian; and although everything has been done by the English residents to bring about a reconciliation, it is impossible. As for the first affair, that may be said to be finished, as the Italian is in the service, and will be sent on duty to a fort, where he will be kept as a prisoner. This affair has caused quite a commotion here, all three being well known."

CRITICAL SITUATION OF H. M. S. PELICAN, WITH THE CHINESE RANSOM ON BOARD.

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP PELICAN STRANDED.

The engraving represents an extraordinary scene—one of her Majesty's ships, laden with a quarter of a million of money—yet in distress!

It appears that the Pelican, 16, Commander Justice, arrived on the evening of the 13th inst., at Spithead, from Singapore, with specie to the amount of about £250,000 on board. She sprung a leak soon after starting from Singapore, and transhipped two-thirds of her valuable freight on board the Harlequin, which arrived safe on Sunday. The Pelican came through the Needles, and in coming up from the westward with a light wind, she went too close in shore, it being low water, and tailed on the Kicker-point, between Fort Monckton and Stoke's-bay; she immediately commenced firing minute guns, as signals of distress, and sent up several rockets, but which, however, were not answered for upwards of an hour, when, we believe, the Victory answered the signal, and despatched the Comet steamer to her assistance. The grounding of the Pelican occurred about a quarter past eight o'clock, and assistance from the harbour did not arrive until near eleven! The circumstance of signal guns firing on a fine calm night, at such an hour, excited the utmost consternation in the town of Portsmouth, and the ramparts were quickly thronged with spectators anxious to ascertain the cause of their unseasonable disturbance.

The first who put off to the asssistance of the stranded vessel was Lieut. Grandy, of the coast-guard station, Blockhouse, who, with his boat's crew, quickly got alongside the distressed vessel, and soon after the Comet steam-vessel, Lieutenant-Commander Pretyman, with a dockyard lighter in tow, arrived at the spot; but their services were not required, as the flowing of the tide had carried the Pelican off. Indeed, so far was the Comet from being of any assistance that we are informed she ran into the Pelican and carried away her jibboom. The Pelican eventually made the anchorage at Spithead, and saluted the Admiral next morning.

The Pelican has been upwards of 30 years in the service, and is fit for nothing further than to be broken up. The Portsmouth correspondent of the Times justly observes, with reference to the above occurrence:—"The want of assistance was most keenly felt at a time when this vessel appeared in some danger, and serves to prove the necessity (which we pointed out months since), of having a powerful steam-vessel ready at any minute at each of our ports, to sally forth to the assistance of a ship in distress, or to repel the incursions of an enemy. Here was a crazy brig with a valuable freight on board beating her bottom out upon a dangerous beach, and firing guns and rockets for assistance two hours before any came, and this within a mile of the flag of the Commander-in-Chief of the first naval port in the world! Surely this is proof enough of the necessity for guarding against the recurrence of such serious and lamentable losses of life and property as have been attendant upon even a few moments' (not to say hours') delay in rendering assistance."

THE DICTATOR OF MEXICO.

LIKE causes always producing like effects, it causes no surprise to the reader of past history to find the records of present events frequently furnishing "parallels" to occurrences which have taken place in the old times "which were before us." Thus, in all ages and all countries there has been a remarkable general resemblance in the circumstances accompanying the fall of a Ruler, whom a whole people has obeyed and feared, or the overthrow of a Dictator, whom they have not only obeyed and feared, but secretly hated also. Every instance that can be drawn from history of such a career with such an end, presents some features in common; there is the power and influence, with all its concomitants of flattery and obedience; authority undisputed, working on a mass of servility that crouches to the dust, both of them demoralising, and neither of them a spectacle that can be regarded with pride or satisfaction by those who think the dignity of human nature may be something more than a dream. And when the time and chance that happen unto all bring the stroke that prostrates the idol, and makes the worshipped of yesterday the mockery of to-day, then is seen the re-action of feeling that may be long delayed, but is rarely wholly escaped. Servility revenges its long humiliation by its insolence, and the service so readily offered is changed to bitter enmity, not seldom degenerating into a bloody vengeance. Some possessors of supreme power have been so fortunate as to die in the full possession of it, but, even then, the secret hatred of an oppressor will break forth against his dust. The body of Louis XIV., called emphatically the "Grand Monarque," was on its way to the tomb pelted with mud and dirt, and followed to its last home by the execrations and insults of his people. The death-bed of William the Conqueror was a scene of shameful pillage; and the body of his son Rufus, when slain in the New Forest, was forsaken by all but a Saxon peasant, one of the very race the Norman Monarchs most pillaged and oppressed. Everywhere we find the same principle at work; men will inwardly hate those who wrong them, though for a time they may be compelled

> To hold out a flag or sign of love,
> Which is indeed but sign.

A seeming approval of a ruler or his policy has often been forced on men by the instinct of self-preservation. But the day of retribution comes at last, and is often a fearful one.

The latest instance of the fall of a Dictator is furnished in the person of General Santa Anna, the late President of the Republic of Mexico. He is forty-six or forty-seven years of age, and rose to power first by heading a revolt against Iturbide, the last Emperor, which was successful, and then rebelling against the authority of the Congress, in which he was successful also. A favourable account of him represents him as a man of elegant address, distinguished manners, and great natural eloquence, possessing also the power of almost irresistibly winning the hearts of those he desires to gain. Another description rather reverses the medal. It says he is a comparatively illiterate military adventurer, who, more by cunning than by talent or intellect, has made himself the Dictator of a Republic; dissipated, moreover, in his habits, being known as a gambler, a cockfighter, and a debauchee. It will be seen that the points of both accounts are reconcileable with each other. Military chiefs are often anything but erudite scholars; Napoleon himself could never write the French language correctly, having a very soldier-like deficiency in the niceties of grammar and spelling; and we can readily believe that the Mexican General is but slightly imbued with a knowledge of the classics. But he is "eloquent" in his own tongue—and a fine language Spanish is—while his talent of winning others to his views, shows that he has the knowledge books cannot teach—the knowledge of men. Unlearned he may be, but ignorant he is not; for his morals we need not go far beyond our daily experience to learn that the most polished manners may cover the utmost profligacy of heart and conduct. Cunning, we question not he is, and bloodthirsty and cruel also, for that is too well proved by the annals of the war between Mexico and Texas; it is the deep stain in all of the Spanish race, and as visible under the Government of Narvaez, at Madrid, as in that of Santa Anna in Mexico, or Rosas at Buenos Ayres.

Whatever the man may be, he has gained supreme power over men, has held it for a time and has now fallen. Let us see whether the circumstances attending his overthrow do not bear that general resemblance we have pointed out in all such events, proving that where the passions and feelings of mankind are moved, the thing which has been, is that which shall be, and that there is no new thing under the sun.

On the 31st of December, a decree was published in the city of Mexico, by order of Santa Anna, dissolving the Chambers. It produced great excitement, which reached its height when it was followed by a second decree ordering all the printing offices to be closed, with the exception of that of the Government journal. The people rose in arms; the military, the only hope of Santa Anna and his creature Canalizo, deserted them, and declared for the Congress; Canalizo gave himself up, stipulating only for his life, the people promising only that he should have a trial. Santa Anna was not in the city, being at Queretaro with the army, which was deserting from him rapidly. Of all this, here is the sequel:—

> The populace then proceeded to the town-house, and took the portrait of Santa Anna from the Ayuntamiento, and dragged it through the streets, making 10,000 pieces of it, that each one might have a piece as a trophy. They then overthrew the famous statue of him which had been erected in the middle of the public square, and after having decapitated it, dragged the trunk in triumph through the streets. This done, they proceeded to the Pantheon of San Fernando, where Santa Anna's leg was interred with so much ceremony. The monument containing it was destroyed in the twinkling of an eye, and the embalmed leg was dragged forth and kicked through the streets.

With the King in "Hamlet," Santa Anna may say, "it had been so with us had we been there." The paragraph reads so like the description given by Juvenal of the behaviour of the Roman people on the fall of Sejanus, that we are tempted to add old Ben Jonson's version of the passage, premising only that the statues of Sejanus were of metal, and the Roman plebs were frugal in their wrath and turned the bronze to account for domestic uses.

> As if his statues now were sensitive
> Of their wild fury—first they tear them down,
> Then, fastening ropes, drag them along the streets,
> Crying in scorn, this, this was that rich head
> Was crown'd with garlands and with odours; this
> That was in Rome so reverenced, and now!
> The furnace and the bellows shall to work;
> The great Sejanus cracks, and piece by piece,
> Drops in the founder's pit!"*

This breaking of statues is a favourite mode of expressing popular indignation; on the sign is wreaked the hatred felt for the thing signified. Religion has perhaps produced more Iconoclast fury than politics; a pious Pope once ordered all the Heathen public statues in Rome to be destroyed, because their forms of classic grace drew the eyes of the people from the rude and awkward works of Christian artists. Our fanatics of the Commonwealth deemed all images profane and idolatrous, and used axe and hammer unsparingly. The statue of Charles I., at Charing-cross, was taken down after his execution, it is said, and ordered by the House of Commons to be broken to pieces; a clever cutler bought it, and made a small fortune by selling knives and forks to the Puritans as trophies, the handles of which he said were cast from the regal metal. But the rogue speculating on the mutations of opinion, had buried the statue, and at the Restoration made another good bargain by selling it again to the Royalists, to be erected once more on the spot where it now stands! Thus are statues indices of public feeling; they rise and fall with the popularity or dislike of those they represent. Authority abused makes authority despised, and anger of the heart soon exhibits itself by the violence of act; then comes all that is so familiar to us in history, as the accompaniments of revolt and insurrection. Whenever the ruler falls by some deed done in the intoxication of power, there are the same popular passions and feelings manifested, almost in the same way, so much so that the description of a tumult in the Rome of antiquity may apply to one that happened in the Mexico of to-day—all other circumstances being so widely different!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

I write to you under the impression of all I see and hear, and although the strain of my communications may seem to you to savour of frivolity, and to be somewhat lacking in topics of more serious interest, I can but catch the tone of society here—which at this moment rejects all but what bears amusement on its face. In the whirlwind of pleasure, the most important events, the struggles of a Ministry, the discussions of men of literature, almost equally violent, pass unheeded, the actors themselves losing quickly the remembrance of them in the all-absorbing tide of amusements.

"Short and sweet;" such is the motto of the bon vivant as referring to life, and such might be also that of this year's carnival. Never was so much dancing, singing, and talking, crowded into so small a space of time. Music, the mazurka, the polka, and diplomatic causerie, have by turns engrossed the attention of the noble salons every evening. Endless would be a list of the balls alone given by all our most distinguished élégantes. Those of the Baroness de Dampierre, where the young and brilliant Duchess de Chereuse does the honours with such perfect grace, and of the Vicomtesse de Vaufreland, who receives the élite of the Faubourg St. Germain, deserve special notice even amongst so great a number. A splendid fête given by the Duchess d'Ulzes will be long remembered in the annals of the beau monde here. Filled by the most distinguished members of the highest society, its brilliancy and pleasure were enhanced by the fairy-like effect of a beautiful conservatory which opens from the drawing-room. It is filled with magnolias, and the subdued light of coloured lamps dispersed here and there produces a magical effect. Some of the most frequented of our salons are, however, even now closed, in consequence of some domestic affliction. Mr. Thorn, whose brilliant preparations for private theatricals excited so much interest and expectation, and in which Miss Alice Thorn was to have made her début with so much éclât as prima donna, has had the misfortune to lose his second son—death suddenly stopped all their gaieties; and all is now silence and sorrow at this splendid hotel. The élite of this elegant society, however, find a rendezvous at the house of Mr. Macnamara, an opulent Irish visitor. Those political circles which are usually so frigid and ennuyeuse have received a stimulus; they are now the echoes of that tribune where M. Guizot triumphs. Bon mots are in fast circulation in the salons of the Count M—, and the King's eldest son now gives des soupers à la regence. But the interest of the political rendezvous, the financial splendour, and the brilliancy of the ball, were found combined in the magnificent rout lately given by Baron Rothschild, which was graced by the presence of many noble and titled personages. It is whispered that the opulent host himself entertains the wish of exchanging his title for one more exalted, and that he finds much euphony in the name of Count Rothschild.

The private theatricals at the British Embassy have at length been given with great splendour. A beautiful theatre had been erected for the occasion in the ball room; the performances consisted of two pieces, "The School for Scandal" and "Charles the Second," in which all the actors belonged to the élite of English society in Paris, which you will see by the following list copied from the play bill.

SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

CHARLES THE SECOND.

Charles the Second, Mr. Henry Greville; Earl of Rochester, Lord Leveson; Captain Copp, Mr. Lawrence Peel; Edward, Mr. Heneage. Servant, Mr. Cecil Peel; Lady Clara, Comtesse de Bonneval; Mary Copp, Miss Mactavish. A prologue written for the occasion, by Lady Dufferies, preceded the performance, and was given in perfection by Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Greville. One bon mot excited a roar of laughter; it was the request that an entente cordiale should be maintained between the audience and performers. All the actors in the last piece were English, including the Countess de Bonneval, who is married to a Frenchman. Both pieces were played with perfect ensemble; and it is said that Macready, who had superintended the rehearsals, was quite surprised at the talent displayed by the noble actors and actresses. But what was most remarkable and also most rare on such occasions, was the beauty of the fair actresses. Lady Dufferies and Lady Seymour, the Queen of Beauty, have always been the ruling stars of the circles in which they have moved, and hardly less remarkable for their piquant wit and brilliant talents than for their personal loveliness. The Countess de Bonneval ranks amongst the prettiest women in Paris. She was charming in the character of Lady Clara. Lady Essex again gathered, in the Comédie de Société, those laurels which as Miss Stevens were showered upon her. Miss Mactavish is a charming actress, and showed a verve in her performance the more striking as she has but lately left the convent of Newhall, where she was educated. This young lady is a niece of Lady Wellesley. The performance of Lord Leveson, the son of Lord Granville, the former ambassador here, was highly appreciated; but it is feared the gaieties at the English Embassy and the continuance of these dramatic representations may again be stopped by a melancholy event. The eldest brother of Lord Cowley, now ninety years of age, has been attacked by severe illness, which, we regret to hear, threatens his life.

The Comédie de Société has, at this moment, more success than the performances at our great theatre. The "Stabat Mater" of Rossini has been given at the Grand Opéra, by a singular anomaly, for the benefit of a dancer—Mdlle. Leroux!—but with little success. The little Vienese dancers I mentioned last week, are found more attractive than any other species of performance, and bring in nightly a sum now considered immense for this great national theatre—10,000 francs. At the Court, the Academie de Musique will shortly perform "La Muette de Portici," the first time that an opera has been played at the Tuileries since 1830.

Apropos: amongst the recent arrivals here, is M. Olozaga, the ex-Minister of Spain, whose doings whilst ruling that Cabinet created such disturbance.

JUVENAL. Sat X.

So repeated have been the changes of Government in that distracted country, that Paris is alternately the refuge of the chiefs of the oppposing factions, our Spanish visitors thus changing nearly every month.

You have heard of the "sword of honour" prepared for Admiral Dupetit Thouars, and you know that he has declined accepting it, out of deference to the Government. He has now advised the funds collected for that purpose to be employed in the relief of wounded sailors, or the wives and children of those killed at Tahiti. His dutiful conduct has not, as yet, however, softened the Government towards him, and he still appears to remain in a very equivocal position.

FRANCE.

The news from Paris this week is again important. There has been another Ministerial crisis, the Chamber of Deputies having taken a very singular course. In another part of our paper we give a report of the discussions which have taken place on the address, and it is, therefore, only necessary here to state the result. On the third paragraph an amendment was proposed condemnatory of the course pursued in regard to Tahiti. This amendment was rejected, but by a majority of eight only, and the opposition were in such extacies that they considered the dissolution of the Ministry certain. It is stated the Chamber cheered loudly the result of the ballot on the third paragraph. The Opposition deputies added, however, loud cries of "The Ministry are dead!" "There is no longer a Ministry!" "And there being no Ministry," said M. Thiers, "I advise all my friends to decline further discussion on the Address!"

This advice was partially adopted, and, consequently, when the question was put upon the entire address, the Ministerial majority was no less than 183. This strange result has of course led to great excitement in Paris, but in spite of the assertions of the Opposition press, M. Guizot is said to be determined to bring the question of confidence in the Ministry before the Chamber in a tangible form by proposing the Secret Service Money Bill immediately. The report at Paris was that the King concurred in this resolution. Le Globe, a Ministerial paper, says, "We learn that, after the sitting of the Deputies on Monday, the King, surrounded by his family, declared his perfect concurrence in the policy of his Cabinet, and fully approved of the resolution of his Ministers to continue in the management of public affairs, at the head of a compact and convinced majority which nothing can disunite."

According to one paper, M. Salvandy had accepted the office of Minister of Public Instruction.

It was reported in Paris on Monday, that Lord Brougham was to be the person named on the part of the English Government, as a commissioner to inquire into the subject of the right of search, and to discover, if possible, a substitute! The French Ministry are very anxious for his lordship's appointment!

The Paris papers devote their attention almost exclusively to the Ministerial question. The Débats says it will not seek to deny that the Ministry received a check, which will, no doubt, embolden the Opposition to fresh attempts, but it denies that the result will weaken the moral force of the Ministry. Our readers may like to see the description of the event given by an enemy of the Ministry, and we therefore give the following from the National:—

"The atmosphere on Monday last appeared to announce an unlucky day. A cold wind drove with it torrents of rain, and a thick fog covered the city. At the Chamber of Deputies all was movement and agitation. Scarcely had the President taken his seat, than an immense crowd rushed into the hall. After some words from M. Garnier Pages and M. Billault, M. Dumon, the Minister for Public Works, ascended the tribune, and demanded that 'the Chamber should declare its opinion, not indirectly or equivocally, but publicly, and in an explicit manner.' To which appeal his friends responded with loud applause. The Chamber was about to vote, when the President announced that twenty Ministerialists had demanded the secret ballot! At this announcement contemptuous laughter was heard from the Opposition benches. The names of the members were called, the anxiety became extreme, the deputies rose, and the balls fell into the ballot-box. The white advanced with the courage derived from their masks; the black dashed forward boldly, showing the colour of their balls. At length the ballots were counted, and the President declared the result. On this we thought the walls of the Chamber would have burst, the Opposition, in a body, raised such a shout. M. Vivien having been called on to develope an amendment of which he had given notice, replied, 'In the existing state of affairs, I withdraw my amendment.' The greater part of the Opposition members abstained from voting. If about eight deputies had not lent their aid to the feeble majority, the final ballot on the Address would have been null for want of a sufficient number of voters. Such is the history of the sitting. The majority seen by the board on Saturday clearly consisted but of three, or rather there was no majority for Ministers, because the members of the board should be deducted from it; and the decided energetic majority demanded by M. Guizot consisted on Monday but of eight, of which six were Ministers."

The Charivari has a sly hit upon the Ministry in these terms:—

"During the last two years the contraband articles most rigidly sought after by the French Custom-house officers on the Belgian frontier have been pirated editions of French books. The Belgians," says the Charivari, "have also their Ministerial crisis, but they push to the dissolution of the Cabinet with more of haste and energy than we. Why? think you. In order that they may not be accused of spuriously copying from the French."

The Constitutionnel gives the following analysis of the Members of the Chamber of Deputies on the occasion of the vote of Monday. The votes amounted to 418; Members present who abstained from voting, 9; absentees, 27; places not represented, by reason of deaths, resignations, or annulments of returns, 5; making together, 459, the total number of the Chamber.

M. Toussaint Benet, the celebrated ship-builder and steam-engine manufacturer, died at La Ciotat, near Marseilles, on the 24th of January, in the 82nd year of his age.

The Revue de Paris states that the Arab Chiefs, just before their departure, made the following presents. They gave to the Duchess de Nemours, the Princess de Joinville, and the Duchess d'Aumale, each a splendid sultana's dress; to the Count de Paris an Oriental military costume, and to the lady of Marshal Soult a rich cashmere cloak, embroidered with gold. Valuable presents were made in return by these distinguished persons.

On Saturday night the Duke and Duchess de Nemours gave the second of their intended three balls this season, at the Pavilion Marsan. It fully equalled the first in brilliancy. The King, Queen, and all the Princes and Princesses attended. The dancing did not cease till four in the morning.

SPAIN.

The news from Spain this week possesses a painful interest. Zurbano, who it was hoped and believed had escaped, has been taken and summarily shot without trial. It appears that the rumours which prevailed of his escape into Portugal were spread by his friends, with a view to lull the vigilance of the Government, and enable him to seize a favourable moment of reaching the French frontier. Supposing this moment arrived, in company of his brother in-law, Cayo Muro, Zurbano left his hiding-place, at a country-house in the immediate neighbourhood of Logrono, and was immediately seized by the guards stationed on the road to arrest him.

The Governor of Logrono, warned by the fate of his predecessor, General Oribe, would allow of no delay, but immediately placed his prisoner in capella, from which, at the end of 24 hours, he was led out to the place of execution. He met his fate with the same indifference with which he would have inflicted it on his enemies. It was asserted that Cayo Muro was arrested and shot at the same time as Zurbano's eldest son, Don Benito. This was a mistake. It was another brother-in-law, named Martinez, who suffered on that occasion.

Subjoined are some particulars of this lamentable affair, and a sketch of the unfortunate general:—

"The arrest was effected on the 19th, by an old partisan, under the name of El Rayo, at a house in the environs of Logrono, where Zurbano had kept himself concealed with his brother-in-law, Cayetano Muro, an officer of cavalry. The latter was shot dead, as he was jumping out of a window to make his escape, by one of El Rayo's soldiers. Zurbano was taken immediately to Logrono, where the Commandant-General desired him to prepare for death, and he was shot at eleven o'clock on the morning of the 21st. Zurbano was the youngest son of a farmer of Barea, near Logrono. His father wished to make a priest of him, and he studied for it; but as his conduct did not correspond with his father's views, he was put to work on the farm. He married very young, and hired an extensive farm, but becoming weary of that sort of life, he turned smuggler. He did not succeed in his new occupation, and got into embarrassments, which affected the health of his wife, and she died. He then married Hermenegilda Martinez (his widow), who was the daughter of an innkeeper, and continued the contraband trade, but with so little success that he finished by associating himself with a band of thieves, of whom he became the chief. A prosecution was commenced against him, and he was condemned to death by default. He wandered a long time in the mountains, and his wife was arrested as his accomplice, but she made her escape from the house in which she was imprisoned. The civil war having broken out, Zurbano one night entered Logrono, and went secretly to a monk, to whom he communicated his intention of joining the Carlists; and, as an earnest of his zeal, revealed a plan for blowing up the powder-magazine of Logrono, in order that the Carlists might take possession of the town during the confusion. The monk introduced him to several friends and Zumalacarregui, and the affair was decided upon; but when everything was ready for execution, Zurbano went to the civil governor, and offered to reveal what was going on, with the names of the parties engaged in the plot, on the condition of his receiving his own pardon for past offences. This was granted, and Zurbano, having formed a small band, commenced against the Carlists those bold excursions which raised him, in the end, to the highest grades of the army, and ended by the catastrophe which has involved the whole of his family. As to the monk, he and another person were executed, and several of the inhabitants of Logrono were sent to the presidios for the part they had taken in the plot got up by Zurbano."

The news of the execution of Zurbano created great excitement at Madrid. The Madrid Gazette contains a Royal decree, remitting the sentence passed upon General Prim. An extraordinary courier had been despatched from Madrid, to communicate the Queen's pardon to General Prim, who is confined at the castle of St. Sebastian, at Cadiz. Madrid has been assigned to the General as his place of residence.

General Villalonga has sent an official report, dated Burgos, Jan. 20, to the Minister of War at Madrid, in which he states the course adopted in regard to Zurbano. It will be seen by the following extract from this document, that the individual who caused the 189 Carlists to be shot at Maestrago characterises the shedding of blood as "agreeable news." General Villalonga, after stating that the Commander General of Cavalry had sent him information of the capture of Zurbano, says—

"The said commander-general, in transmitting me the above communication, adds that as soon as the traitor Zurbano is presented to him, he will be shot in conformity with the laws, and I, for the greater certainty, have intimated to him by an extraordinary express to carry it into effect.

"In participating this agreeable news to your excellency, in order that you may have the goodness to carry it to her Majesty, I cannot do less than call your superior attention by a special recommendation in favour of the Brigadier Commander-General of the above-mentioned province, who has also seconded all my dispositions, and with whom I am highly satisfied since he took the command of the same, as also with the commander of Cavalry, Don Juan Mateo, who has just performed so important a service, and with the other chiefs and officers who have co-operated with him."

The Spanish Government resorted to a pitiful piece of duplicity upon the occasion. On receiving General Villalonga's despatch, a council was held, and after some deliberation a courier was sent off to Burgos, to countermand the execution of Zurbano. The courier was despatched from Madrid on the 22d, the Government well knowing at the time that the unfortunate Zurbano had been executed on the 21st. Narvaez and his associates claim this as an act of clemency.

PORTUGAL.

We find by our letters from Lisbon to the 22nd January, that the estimates were presented to the Chamber of Deputies on the 19th. The revenue for the fiscal year 1845-6 is set down at 10,756 contos, the expenditure at 10,717 contos; excess of revenue over expenditure, 39 contos. The financial representation is flourishing; how far the real state of affairs bears it out is doubtful.

A measure of very questionable advantage to the foreign creditor, called "a Reform of the Junto of Public Credit," has been adopted. The revenue which the Junto had the administration and receipt of at the fountain-head, is taken away on the plea of insufficiency and its fluctuating nature, and substituted by promised monthly payments from the Treasury.

Another measure has been adopted affecting some British subjects, and amongst others the Duke of Wellington and Marquis Beresford—a reduction of grants and pensions to the "Classes Inactivas," and those of them especially entitled to payment by peculiar considerations.

The bill for the Abolition of the Conservatorial Courts passed through the Chamber of Deputies unanimously.

TURKEY.

Advices from Constantinople, to the 8th ult., state our position at this moment with the Porte as most critical. Sir S. Canning has made the settlement of the demands which he urged in the late conference a kind of ultimatum, and though more than a fortnight has since then elapsed, there is no approach towards their final adjustment. These demands may be classed under two heads—firstly, debts amounting to about £150,000 owing by the late Bey of Tripoli to British subjects; and, secondly, the proper fulfilment of the commercial treaty planned and effected by Lord Ponsonby.

UNITED STATES.

The ship Sea, Captain Edwards, has arrived at Liverpool with New York papers to the 11th Jan. They contain messages from several of the American States, viz., New York, Maryland, Kentucky, and Massachusetts. These messages relate to local matters, and do not interest the English reader. The message from Pennsylvania, however, contains some information which must be satisfactory to the holders of the bonds of that State. Governor Porter enters at great length into the financial condition of Pennsylvania. He states, the whole amount of tax assessed for the past four years at 3,013,724 dols., of which only 1,825,050 dols. has been received, leaving 1,188,674 dols. still outstanding on the 1st of Dec. Of this sum, together with the 800,000 dols. outstanding for 1844, the Governor thinks 1,260,000 dols. will be received; and that,

"If the provisions of the act of 1844 be fairly carried into effect, in the valuation of property, and the collection and prompt payment of the tax be enforced, the annual revenue hereafter to be derived from that source, will amount to at least 1,500,000 dols. This sum, with the other resources of the commonwealth, will be entirely adequate to furnish the necessary amount to discharge the interest upon the public debt, and thus ensure the fidelity of the State to her engagements."

Governor Porter then says—

"It must be gratifying to every Pennsylvanian to reflect that the credit of this great state, which has been for upwards of two years subject to reproach, will thus be restored to the unsullied purity of character which, until this unavoidable reverse of fortune, she had steadfastly maintained. The claims of all her honest creditors will be punctually discharged, and the gross imputations which have been heaped upon her name wiped out, and the abiding confidence which we have ever felt in the disposition and ability of the state to comply with all her engagements will be fully realized."

The commercial intelligence from America shows no special movement. The cotton market was somewhat brisker.

We have since received New York papers to the 12th ult., being one day later, by the London packet ship Northumberland. There was no later intelligence from the southward, so that there is nothing new on Mexican affairs. There had been a temporary panic in the stock market of New York, which had produced a general reaction in prices, Pennsylvania Five per Cents. having declined 1½ per cent., and other state bonds in proportion.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A Vienna letter of the 18th ult., says:—"Duke Ferdinand of Saxe Coburg, father of the King of Portugal, is so seriously ill that fears are entertained for his life. Couriers have been dispatched with this intelligence to Paris and Lisbon for his sons. His youngest son, Prince Leopold, is the only member of the duke's family left to watch over his sick bed."

A private letter from Athens, dated the 5th ult., states that his Excelleney Sir Edmund Lyons had been seriously indisposed in that city. From the skilful and unremitting attention of his Excellency's medical attendant, however, he was considered out of danger.

The Moniteur Parisien mentions a report that the celebrated Arab Colonel Yousseuf is about to marry one of the nieces of the widow of Lieut. General Guilleminot.

The stewardship of Greenwich-park, vacant by the death of her late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda of Gloucester, has been conferred upon the Earl of Aberdeen. There is no salary attached to the appointment.

Letters from Lyons, of the 21st ult., state that during several days the communications with Italy by the Mont Cenis road had been entirely blocked up by the fall of an immense avalanche, on the southern declivity, near a place culled Mularet. The passage had been completely obstructed during four days, and the mails obliged to stop at Suez. The road was not yet pervious for carriages, and the correspondence was conveyed across the mountain by the cantonniers.

Accounts from Alexandria of the 6th ult., mention that the plan of establishing a railroad between Cairo and Suez had been nearly abandoned. An engineer, M. Mangel, had proposed to the Pasha to open, at an expense of not more than 150,000 talaris, a canal between Cairo and Suez, by means of which goods landed at Suez would be conveyed in boats from that harbour to Alexandria. Three sluice-gates would be required for the purpose, one at Suez, the other at Wadi, below Cairo, and the third at Alexandria.

Java papers, of Sept. 28, state that in the residency of the Pranger Regencies, part of a mountain in the Karang district gave way suddenly, and buried several houses with the inhabitants under the masses of earth and stone. Considerable portions of the Kwassen and Bandjar districts of the Kahepatjang residency were flooded over about the same period, and 600 houses totally destroyed by fire near Djocjokarta.

According to an account from Algeria, in the Algèria, Abd el Kader has succeeded in getting together a force of about 1800 men; but it was supposed that he contemplated an attempt to dethrone the Emperor of Morocco rather than an attack upon the French possessions in Algeria.

The New York Sun gives news from the Sandwich Islands to the 10th of August, and states confidently, that the French have excluded English vessels from Tahiti.

A letter from Berlin of the 16th ult. says, "The Prussian Ambassador at Constantinople has just received instructions to exercise a protection in favour of the Christians under the domination of Turkey. The cruelties of Abdullah Pacha have created great irritation here. Before the Syrian question our government partook of the views then entertained by England and France; but now France and Austria concur in demanding the nomination of a member of the Schahab family as Prince of the Lebanon."

Most of the persons who had been found guilty of political conspiracy in Austrian Galicia, in 1840, have just been pardoned by the Emperor of Austria. The punishment of those who were condemned to death has been commuted to imprisonment.

A letter of Jan. 10, from Arsendal (Norway), speaks of a violent storm, which snddenly arose about ten o'clock on the Saturday before, accompanied by a heavy fall of snow. The tempest ceased about twelve, and the air became warm as summer. About three in the morning four shocks of an earthquake were felt, and the last was accompanied by a detonation. About seven in the morning the cold which existed before returned. This is the seventh time that shocks of an earthquake have been felt within eighteen months in that part of the country.

A letter from Ancona, in the Allgemeine Zeitung, states, that the obstacles which had arisen to the negotiations between the Spanish nation and the Pope, have been entirely removed, and that it is expected the young Queen Isabella will be immediately recognised by his Holiness.

The last American papers mention that no fewer than eight railroads, to run through different parts of New Hampshire, are in contemplation.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

STATUE TO PRINCE ALBERT AT THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.—On Saturday last a meeting was held at the London Tavern, of the merchants, bankers, and others interested in the commerce of the City of London, to promote the erection of a marble statue of Prince Albert, in such suitable spot in the Royal Exchange as might be agreed upon. The chair was taken by Thomas Baring, Esq., M.P., and he was supported by George Lyall, Esq., M.P., Frederick Hodgson, Esq., M.P., J. Masterman, Esq., M.P., George Richard Robinson, Esq., Daniel Mildred, Esq., William Tite, Esq., &c. A committee was appointed to carry out the proposition, of which Mr. Baring was appointed chairman, Mr. T. Chapman deputy-chairman, Mr. Masterman treasurer, and Mr. C. Graham honorary secretary.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held on Monday afternoon at the Foreign-office. All the Ministers were present. The council sat two hours.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION AND SIR J. GRAHAM.—On Tuesday evening a meeting of the general practitioners of the City of London was held at Radley's Hotel, Bridge-street, Blackfriars, for the purpose of adopting measures in relation to Sir J. Graham's Bill. Mr. Smith, of Trinity-square, presided. The Bill, he added, instead of being calculated to better the condition of the medical practitioners throughout the country, was one which, if passed, would deprive the public of competent persons to give medical advice. He was confident that the Government would never persist in passing so iniquitous a measure. The meeting was afterwards addressed by Mr. Roberts, of Finsbury-circus, who proposed a resolution strongly condemnatory of the Bill. Mr. Reade seconded it, and it was unanimously carried.

NEW INSTITUTION.—We are glad to learn that in the large and populous district of Holloway, an institution is about to be formed, to be called the Holloway Literary and Scientific Institution, through the active exertions of Messrs. Lenord, Greenwood, Prentice, and other gentlemen who have consented to act as trustees and directors. Colonel Wood, the member for the county, has consented to act as president.

THE CORPORATION OF LONDON AND LOUIS PHILIPPE.—M. Alloux, the artist who is employed by the King of the French to depict the presentation of the Corporation of London to his Majesty, commenced his work in the library at Guildhall on Monday morning. The size of the painting is about 20ft. by 15ft., and the likenesses of forty members of the Corporation, who formed the deputation, are to be placed upon the canvass. Mr. Sheriff Hunter, Sir Peter Laurie, Sir Chapman Marshall, Mr. Alderman Moon, and some other of the members, have already attended upon the artist, who is considered a man of great skill, and who was brought from Rome to accomplish this task.

DEMOLITION OF THE STATUE AT KING'S-CROSS.—The statue of George IV., at King's-cross, erected some years since from the design and under the superintendence of a gentleman named Geary, is now being razed to the ground. This unfortunate statue has always been a subject of ridicule.

MORTALITY OF LONDON.—The total number of deaths in the metropolis during the week ending last Saturday was 1,002. The weekly average for the last five winters has been 1,039 of the winters, and 963 of the whole years. The number of births in the week was 1,340

COMMISSIONER OF BANKRUPTCY.—Mr. Sheppard, Queen's Counsel, was on Tuesday morning sworn into the office of a Commissioner in Bankruptcy, vacant by the death of Sir C. F. Williams.

POLICE.

EXTRAORDINARY CHARGE OF LIBELLING A MERCANTILE FIRM.

At the MANSION HOUSE on Tuesday Mr. Robert Forbes, jun., ship and insurance broker or agent, of Broad-street, was summoned before the Lord Mayor to answer the charge of having published false, malicious, and defamatory libels of and concerning the firm of Messrs. Rickards, Little, Rate, and Little, East India merchants, and particularly of and concerning Mr. L. M. Rate, one of the partners. Several gentlemen of eminence in the commercial world were present during the examination, which, on account of the atrocious nature of the libels, as well as the high respectability of the prosecutors, excited unusual interest. Mr. Clarkson attended for the prosecution, and Mr. Montague Chambers appeared for the defendant.

Mr. Clarkson said it was his duty to complain against the young gentleman who appeared as defendant for having written and published libels of the most flagitious description against his clients, and particularly against Mr. Lachlan Mackintosh Rate. The defendant, who occasionally did business for the firm as a ship-broker, belonged to the Colonial Club, of which Mr. Rate was a member, and in consequence of some transactions which had taken place at that club, and elsewhere, it was presumed that there existed in the mind of the defendant a very strong feeling against Mr. Rate. Mr. Rate had the good fortune to pay his addresses to the daughter of a gentleman of very high character and station, and the libeller of the firm, not considering it sufficient to do all that malice could suggest to ruin them, as commercial men, attacked the sanctuary of their private life, by anonymously addressing the parents of thelady, and cautioning them against allowing their child to enter into an union with a person who not only belonged to an insolvent firm, but had actually committed an offence, a conviction upon which would subject him to the penalty of transportation. The Learned Counsel then read, and commented upon the letters. The first letter was dated Mincing lane, 6th May, 1844, and was addressad to Messrs. Carr, Tagore, and Co., of Calcutta, with whom the prosecutors were in the habit of transacting extensive business, and it purported to come from Messrs. Trueman and Cook, per Procurator A. S. Cust. It was as follows:—

"MESSRS. CARR, TAGORE, AND CO.

"Gentlemen,—We beg to inform you, that we are instructed by our old friends Messrs. Rickards, Little, and Co., to advise you that they have this day been compelled to suspend their payments. Messrs. Rickards and Co. were not at all aware this morning that they would be obliged to adopt this step, which arose in consequence of our firm having declined to advance them the necessary means to enable them to take up their acceptances falling due to-morrow, which accommodation they stated they looked to us for. How they could have expected it we are at a loss to imagine. Mr. William Little is the only partner at this late hour in the City, and he has taken this step upon himself sooner than allow any bills to be returned, which, perhaps, is the most honourable mode of proceeding, and he has requested us to beg of you to use your discretion about accepting their numerous drafts on you. We think in the course of to-morrow proper measures will be adopted to see into the state of their finances.

"We are, your humble servants,
(For Trueman and Cook) "A. S. CUST.

"Five minutes to six.—Messrs. Tagore and Co., Calcutta, per Marseilles."

In the letter just read there was not one word of truth. It contained what the writer of it knew to be a tissue of the most diabolical falsehoods. Messrs. Trueman and Co. never authorised the writing of such a letter, knew nothing on earth about it, and never had any person in their employment of the name of Cust, by whom it purported to be written; so that this was not a mere letter without a name, but a forgery at common law, containing a false and wicked and malicious libel, for the purpose of destroying the credit of gentlemen of the most honourable character, and of the highest commercial respectability. The second letter to which the learned Counsel drew the attention of his lordship was addressed to the father of the young lady to whom Mr. Rate was paying his addresses. It was in pencil, and it ran thus:—

"There is an old saying, 'A friend in need is a friend indeed.' Do not allow your daughter to be sacrificed. I understand a Mr. Rate is paying his addresses. First you should hear the disgusting way in which he speaks of his beloved, as he terms her. Then who is Squire Rate? Nothing more than an assuming upstart—not without a smattering of ability, I will allow. He has nothing, and as for trusting him or his house, I would not for a single pound. I know all about him, and only say, take care of your daughter. Her good qualities are as numerous as his bad. Set aside these defects on his part, and allow him to be perfection; but, before you sport an opinion, put your nose to his mouth, you will discover how horrible he smells. This is not pleasant. Take my advice, Sir. I am not jealous, for I am a determined bachelor. He is exerting all his influence to ingratiate himself with the family, and it looks well to see him in his carriage, and perhaps this will do for a time, but the time may come when he will not have the wherewithal to keep this up, and where will be your dear aughter? Mind what I say.

"Aberdeen, October 19."

Addressed (private) to ———.

That communication was followed by another, also without a name, to the mother of the young lady, accusing Mr. Rate of a transportable offence, and crammed with the most disgusting matter. All these detestable attempts proved (the learned counsel stated) unavailing. Mr. Rate remained in the family in exactly in the same condition as previously; but the active malignity of the writer was to know no repose. Mr. Barker, the advertising agent, received a note purporting to be written by the father of the young lady, and requesting that the Times, Post, and Chronicle should be supplied with an account of the solemnization of the marriage of William Rate and his daughter. Upon the evidence of the first two letters the learned counsel charged the defendant with having published a most foul, wicked, and detestable libel, and upon the evidence of the third letter he charged the defendant, under the statute, with having accused Mr. Rate of a nefarious offence, the punishment of which would be transportation; but it still remained to him to prove, by a prosecution at the Central Criminal Court, what could have been the motive by which the defendant was influenced in proceeding as had been described.

Mr. Lachlan Mackintosh Rate was then sworn. He was, he said, one of the members of the firm of Rickards, Little, and Co., East India merchants, of No. 15, Bishopsgate-street. Mr. Little, one of the partners, was a director of the Bank of England. In May last they corresponded with the house of Carr, Tagore, and Co., of Calcutta. Witness had been acquainted with the defendant, who was a shipbroker, and, consequently, had done business with the house of Rickards, Little, and Co. The defendant had chartered vessels for the firm, but had ceased to do business for them before May. Witness and defendant had been members of the Colonial Club. The firm had business connections with the house of Trueman and Co., of Mincing-lane. The firm to which he belonged was in no pecuniary difficulties. They had given no authority to any person or persons to write to Calcutta. Witness had acquired a knowledge of the defendant's handwriting, and he believed the letter produced, addressed to Messrs. Carr, Tagore, and Co., Calcutta, to have been written by him. At first the house at Calcutta had remitted to the firm a copy of the letter, and afterwards they sent over the original. He was in the course of paying his addresses to a young lady. He believed the letter in pencil, addressed to the young lady's father, and read by Mr. Clarkson, to be in the handwriting of the defendant; and he also believed that the letter addressed to the young lady's mother, and the letter purporting to be written by her father, requesting insertion of a marriage in three newspapers, were in the defendant's handwriting. In the letters which stated that he was the father of two illegitimate children, and mentioned other circumstances against him, there was not one word of truth from beginning to end.

Cross-examined by Mr. Chambers: The defendant had obtained freight for the firm, and chartered ships for them. The firm got possession of the original letter received by Messrs. Carr, Tagore, and Co., about a month ago. Witness was not then acquainted with the fact that communications had been received by the father and mother of the young lady. He had not seen the defendant since he had received the original letter until the present time, to the best of his knowledge. The defendant had written in his presence several times.

Mr. William Little, also a partner in the firm of Rickards, Little, and Co., deposed that he had acquired a knowledge of the defendant's handwriting, and he believed all the letters produced to be in that person's handwriting.

Cross-examined by Mr. Chambers: The defendant called on witness on Monday to inquire what the summons to him meant. Defendant also called on him about a fortnight ago to ask if there was any business to transact. Witness did not intimate anything to him with respect to the lettter received from Calcutta.

Mr. James Cook, of the firm of Trueman and Cook, colonial brokers, of Mincing-lane, deposed that they had dealings with the prosecutors. They had no person of the name of Cust in their employment, neither had any person of that name been authorised by them to write by procuration. They knew Messrs. Carr, Tagore, and Co., of Calcutta. The letter addressed to that house was not written, or sanctioned, or known by the firm to which he belonged. Witness's firm had considerable transactions with the prosecutors, who were a most highly independent house. They were of the very first class of merchants, and witness's firm would not, in a business transaction with them, feel the least hesitation in taking their mere promissory note for £50,000, or, in fact, for any sum, however large. Their credit was undoubted.

Mr. Chambers then addressed the Lord Mayor at considerable length for the defence. Upon the part of his client he denied all knowledge of the many atrocious libels which had been so well described by his learned friend, and declared that the defendant and his friends were most anxious to do everything in their power to prove that he was wholly guiltless. With respect to the private libels, his client also solemnly asserted that he was wholly guiltless, and that he and his friends would render all the aid they could to bring the real offender, whoever he might be, to justice. He was determined to use every exertion with that object on his own account, as well as on account of the gentlemen who brought the charge, for he knew that his own character was deeply involved. The learned counsel was proceeding to address the Lord Mayor upon the subject of the felonious intention with which it had been said the third letter had been written, when

Mr. Clarkson intimated that he was just instructed not to press that point.

The Lord Mayor: It is my duty to call upon the defendant to find bail, himself in the sum of £200, and two sureties in the sum of £100 each, to appear to answer any charge that may be brought against him in the Central Criminal Court.

The most respectable bail was immediately offered, and the defendant set at liberty.

On Wednesday Mr. Lachlan Mackintosh Rate and his witnesses attended for the purpose of completing their depositions in support of the charge preferred against Mr. R. Forbes, jun. The proceedings were limited to the reading over and signing the depositions, and binding the witnesses in the usual recognizances to appear and prosecute at the next sessions of the Central Criminal Court. The defendant, Mr. Forbes, jun., was in the justice-room, but took no part in the proceedings.

THE ANNOYANCE TO THE BELGIAN AMBASSADOR.—On Tuesday John Julius Koch, the young man who was recently charged before Mr. Rawlinson, at Marylebone, with having for a considerable time kept up a system of annoyance towards the Belgian Ambassador and his family, for which no reason whatever could be given, was brought up from the New Prison, Clerkenwell; the particulars of what previously transpired have appeared in our paper, and it will be remembered, that the accused was remanded for a week, in order that an opportunity might be afforded for ascertaining whether he was in his right senses or not. It appeared, that the surgeon of the New Prison had certified that the prisoner was in a sound state of mind. He had, however, during his incarceration written an apologetic note to the ambassador; and upon the father of the prisoner consenting to enter into recognizances in the sum of £50 for his son keeping the peace during one year towards his Excellency the Ambassador and the whole of his family, the prisoner was liberated.

A MAN CHARGED WITH MURDERING HIS MOTHER AND ATTEMPTING SUICIDE.—At the above office on Monday, John Campbell, alias Wright, was charged on suspicion of murdering his mother, a poor old woman of sixty years of age, at a low house in Fore-street, Lambeth, and afterwards attempting self-destruction, by throwing himself into the river Thames. Police constable L 89 stated, that between twelve and one o'clock on Sunday morning the prisoner was given into custody, on a charge of creating a disturbance at the door of Mr. Morgan, the Ship public-house, but Mr. Morgan did not press the charge, and the prisoner was liberated. About two o'clock the constable received information that the prisoner's mother was found dead in the passage of the house where she rented a room.—Thomas Massey, L 39: The house in which the prisoner and his mother lived is in my beat. Shortly before two o'clock, a person, close to where the deceased lived, told me that there was something lying in the passage, in consequence of which I went to the passage, and then I saw the deceased was lying on the ground quite dead. There was some liquid on the ground, which smelt as if she had been drinking rum. Her tongue was protruding, and her mouth was wide open. She was quite cold, and there was no pulsation. Mr. Jeffery, surgeon, arrived in about twenty minutes; he attempted to bleed her, and could get nothing but some congealed black thick blood. I assisted to carry the body to the dead-house, at Lambeth Church. W. Hull, L 88, has known the prisoner for five years. He is the son of the deceased, whom he has been in the habit of cruelly ill-using. Another policeman stated that about two o'clock he saw the prisoner making for the river, near Lambeth-stairs, when he stated that he had destroyed his mother, and he should find a place of rest for himself. The prisoner endeavoured to get away from the police, and ran towards the river, but was overtaken, and charged on suspicion of causing the death of his mother. The prisoner denied having stated that he said that he had destroyed the old woman, and said that he had no quarrel with his mother on Saturday night.

COUNTRY NEWS.

EAST CORNWALL ELECTION.—Quite unexpectedly, Sir William Trelawny, the Lord-Lieutenant of the county, and the former representative of East Cornwall, on the Radical interest, in opposition to Lord Eliot and Mr. Rashleigh, has issued an address, again offering himself for the vacant seat.

REPRESENTATION OF WARWICK.—There is a rumour of a vacancy in the borough, by the appointment of Sir Charles Douglas to a situation under Government.

OPENING OF THE NOTTINGHAM MECHANICS' INSTITUTION.—There was a festival in Nottingham on Tuesday, on the occasion of the opening of the Mechanics' Institution in that town, at which gentlemen of all parties assembled. The building is a large and handsome edifice, in the Grecian style of architecture; it is 124 feet long, and 61 feet wide, and is arranged most commodiously for the purposes for which it is intended. In order to render the opening as striking as possible, it was agreed to celebrate it by a tea party, and invitations were dispatched to many influential gentlemen of the county to honour the occasion with their presence. At five o'clock upwards of 600 sat down to tea. The large hall of the building was crowded with well-dressed artisans, mechanics, and their friends and relations. At the conclusion of tea, John Smith Wright, Esq., banker, of Kempston Hall, the president of the Institution, took the chair. On his right were Thomas North, Esq., mayor of the town; Thomas Gisborne, Esq., M.P.; William Hodgson Barrow, Esq.; the Rev. Benjamin Carpenter; and Thomas Wakefield, Esq., late mayor of Nottingham; and on the left were Charles Paget, Esq., the high sheriff of the county; Henry Gally Knight, Esq., M.P.; John Evelyn Denison, Esq., M.P.; Colonel Lancelot Rolleston, M.P., &c. Sentiments in the form of resolutions were moved and seconded by the speakers, who addressed the meeting at considerable length, predicating great advantages to the population by the establishment of an Institution so well calculated to improve the mind and extend their knowledge. The festival passed off with great eclât.

SUICIDE AT MAIDSTONE.—Mr. Bailey, the relieving officer of the Hollingbourne Union, committed suicide a few days ago, by poison. He was a little behind in his accounts, and had complained of not being sufficiently paid as relieving officer of the Hollingbourne Union. He also complained that at present his salary was not so good as it was formerly, and that his expenses beat him. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

DESTRUCTION OF FIVE HOUSES AT DERBY.—During the gale on Saturday last part of a chimney on the premises of Messrs. Holmes, coachmaker, at Derby, fell down with a terrific crash on one side of the roofs of five houses, literally cutting them in two, and demolishing them to the very foundations and destroying every piece of furniture they contained. Never was wreck more complete. It was most providential that the accident did not occur during the night when the inmates were in bed; for, had such been the case, the loss of life would have been frightful. As it was, no one experienced any personal injury, except a workman, who received some slight injuries from the falling bricks.

A Chesterfield correspondent says:—"During the high wind on Sunday morning three or four pinnacles were blown from the tower of St. Thomas's Church, Brampton Moor, here, and burst through the roof, destroying the gallery, and doing considerable injury to the church."

INCENDIARISM IN WARWICKSHIRE.—On Wednesday week a wheat rick belonging to Mr. William Blick, and a wheat rick belonging to Mr. John Billingham, at Dunchurch, near Rugby, were fired almost simultaneously between eight and nine o'clock in the evening. It is impossible to conjecture what can have caused these malicious acts, as both gentlemen are highly respected for their humanity to their poorer neighbours.

DEATH FROM PRUSSIC ACID.—A lamentable occurrence took place at Stratton, near Cirencester, on Thursday evening, whereby Mr. Daniel Stuart Holmes, a medical practitioner, and one of the surgeons to the union, came to an untimely end from accidentally taking an overdose of prussic acid. The jury at the inquest gave a verdict to that effect.

OFFENCES IN SUSSEX.—Scarcely a night passes without a robbery of some description taking place in Sussex. On Sunday morning last, at three o'clock, Charles Cowley, the private watchman, appointed by the inhabitants of Portsdale, near Brighton, was fired at out of a plantation belonging to Eardly Hall, Esq., the banker, who heard the report, and immediately arose, fearing the watchman had fallen by the hands of the midnight assassin. It appears Cowley's life has been threatened in consequence of his activity in apprehending and conviction of part of a gang for burglary and fowl-stealing; happily the shot did not take effect, but the darkness of the night enabled the assassin to escape.—On Friday evening week, the Rectory at Cuckfield, near Brighton, was burglariously entered, and the thieves succeeded in obtaining a considerable booty in plate, money, jewels, watches, linen, and eatables, which, from the quantity, must have been removed by a horse and cart. It appears, on the examination of the police that in every instance the same instrument, viz., a powerful centre-bit, has been used, which leaves no doubt of these robberies having been committed by the same gang.—The Parsonage houses at Portslade, Cuckfield, Falmer, Balcomb, Southwick, and many other parishes, have been broken into within a few weeks; and the state of the agricultural poor in this county is miserable in the extreme.

ATTEMPT AT MURDER AND SUICIDE AT BIRMINGHAM.—Yesterday (Friday) week an attempt was made by Mr. Bunny, a master carpenter at Birmingham, to kill his wife, and afterwards to destroy himself, under the following melancholy circumstances:—The unfortunate couple were only married on the previous Tuesday. After the ceremony they went to the Rainbow, and in the course of the following day he was observed to be particularly gloomy; but this was attributed to excessive drinking, in which he had indulged a few days previously. On Thursday he complained of his head. Nothing, however, up to this time, amounting to insanity, appeared in his manner, and he and Mrs. Bunny retired to bed after twelve o'clock Nothing occurred till about half-past five o'clock in the morning, when the servants in the place and the persons living in the adjoining houses were alarmed by the most awful shrieks and cries of murder issuing from Mr. Bunny's bed-room. The servant-man immediately rushed up stairs, and hearing Mrs. Bunny screaming for help, he tried, but in vain, to force open the door. He then ran into the street and made an alarm, and presently Mrs. Bunny was seen at the bed-room window, calling for assistance. A ladder was immediately procured and placed against the window, and Mr. Bunny instantly made his appearance, and descended by the ladder into the street, half-dressed, with his throat cut, and his person literally covered with blood. His appearance and conduct left no doubt of the state of his mind. His neighbours proceeded up stairs to the bed-room, which was so securely fastened inside that it was not until after several efforts that they succeeded in forcing an entrance. When, however, they did get in, a scene of the most horrifying description presented itself. Mrs. Bunny was leaning against a side wall, in her night dress, which was saturated from top to bottom in blood, flowing from a number of wounds in various parts of her body. The poor woman's throat was dangerously cut; there was a great gash on her left cheek, and a deep wound on her left side, and four other wounds on her arms, back, and legs. In the course of the day Mrs. Bunny was so far recovered as to be able to state some particulars of the unfortunate occurrence. It appears that about five o'clock in the morning her husband got out of bed hastily, and locked the door. In his doing so she was awakened, and presently heard him say, "My dear, we have lived together, we have loved together, and we shall die together." He had no sooner, however, uttered these words, than he seized hold of her in the bed, cut her on the throat, and began to stab her with a large clasp pocket-knife in various parts of the body. She jumped out of bed, screaming for help, and the impression on her mind is that the unfortunate man became terrified, and attempted to cut his own throat. It would seem, however, that to the bluntness of the knife the salvation of both their lives is attributed. Bunny, it is expected, will recover. The poor man had been insane previous to his marriage, and a return of the malady evidently was the cause of the rash acts.

EXECUTIONS.—IPSWICH.—On Saturday last William Howell, convicted of the murder of a police-constable named M'Fadden, was executed at Ipswich. His two companions in crime, Walter Howell, his brother, and Israel Shipley, had been previously respited. The prisoner throughout his confinement protested his innocence, and on the previous Thursday he slapped one of the turnkeys on the shoulder, and remarked, "I know I deserve to die for the many offences I have committed, but I declare to God I never steeped my hands in human blood." Soon after he observed, "There is a man in this prison who could save my life if he liked." This was in reference to a smuggler lately apprehended. On another occasion he observed, "That man ought to pray to his God to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, when I am on the scaffold." Immediately before the drop fell, he said with great emphasis to the mob, "My dear friends, I die innocent of the crime laid to me. That is all I wish to say to you." The drop then fell, and the wretched man was launched into eternity without making scarcely a perceptible struggle. It was calculated that there were above 12,000 spectators present, a majority of whom were females and boys.

FATAL EXPLOSION ON THE MANCHESTER AND LEEDS RAILWAY.—On Tuesday morning a very serious accident occurred on the Manchester and Leeds Railway, by which three unfortunate men lost their lives, and four others were seriously wounded. At an early hour in the morning the engineer and fireman attached to the Irk engine, proceeded to the engine-shed, about a mile from the station, at Hunt's Bank, and commenced getting it in readiness to take the quarter to seven A.M. train to Leeds. The fireman put on his fires about half-past four A.M., and in about an hour the steam was up, or nearly so. The engineer then went under the engine to examine the working parts, and the fireman to oil them. They had not been there long before the accident occurred. Exactly as the clock struck six a tremendous explosion was heard by several men on the premises, and immediately an alarm was given. Mr. Craven, the resident inspector of the works, found that the explosion had killed three of his workmen, and injured four others, and done much damage to the building. He thus describes the whole affair:—The engine to which this accident has happened was to have taken out the quarter before seven train to Leeds, and was in course of preparation for that purpose. The engineer and fireman were under it at the time of the accident, examining the works. The roof of the firebox seems to have given way, and the steam, rushing against the ground, blew the engine through the roof of the shed, nearly 60 feet high, carrying with it more than twenty yards of the roof, and distributing the fragments in all directions, for upwards of one hundred yards distance. At the moment of the explosion the tender seems to have become detached from the engine, and was turned over on its side, but was not materially injured. The engine was on the middle line of rails, in the shed where the men were at work, with the fire-box towards Manchester; but when it alighted it was completely turned round, and on the outside rails, at a distance of twenty yards from the place it was first standing. In its way it passed over another engine, carrying with it the chimney, whistle and domes. The poor fellows who were at work under the engine were dreadfully mutilated, both being severely crushed and burned to a cinder—their heads and brains being completely crushed to a jelly. The inspector was also much disfigured, and killed on the spot. The names of the sufferers are George Mills, engineer; William Allcock, fireman; and William Stone, inspector. James Neilson, John Wainwright, John Hall, and another, are seriously injured. The engine was built by Mr. William Fairbairn, of Manchester, and was first set to work in January, 1840, since which time it has travelled a distance of 76,860 miles. It cost £1430, and was considered a first-rate engine. The damage done to the engine will not exceed £250. The unfortunate men have left wives and families to deplore their loss.

THE LATE MURDER AT SALT-HILL.—Mrs. Tawell, the wife of the wretched man now in Aylesbury gaol, accused of the murder of Sarah (Hart) Laurence, has been peculiarly unfortunate in both her marriages. Her first husband (Mr. Cutforth) was a most respectable man, engaged largely in the silk trade, in which he had accumulated considerable property, and they lived in circumstances not merely of comfort, but of affluence. By the failure of his banker, and several heavy losses in trade about the same time, he was deprived of his all; and the effect upon his health and spirits was such as to undermine his constitution, and eventually to bring him to the grave. He left one daughter. To maintain herself and child, Mrs. Cutforth brought into exercise her cultivated talents, and opened a school for young ladies in Clerkenwell. Success attended her laudable efforts. The body of Friends, of which she was an esteemed member, aided her in an attempt to extend her sphere of exertion. At the time she became acquainted with Mr. Tawell, she was at the head of a considerable establishment, and had the daughters of several highly respectable Quaker families in her charge. The idea of a marriage with him was opposed by her most judicious friends. It, however, took place. They removed to Berkhampstead, near the church. A large house, which Mr. Tawell furnished with considerable taste, was their residence at the time he was apprehended on the charge of murdering his servant, with whom he is supposed to have long lived: the two children of whom she was the mother are supposed to be his. Those who have long known the unfortunate Mrs. Tawell attest her excellences, and deplore the calamity which has fallen upon her by the arrest of her husband on such a charge. Mr. Tawell is the founder of the schools for the general education of the poor, situate in Chapel-place, Great Suffolk-street, Borough.

THE TOWN OF JALAPA, IN MEXICO.

THE REVOLUTION IN MEXICO.

The struggle in Mexico is progressing. Accounts were received on Monday, from New York, stating intelligence to have reached that city, that the army of Santa Anna has deserted him, and that he has been, by a decree of Congress, formally banished from Mexico. His late Cabinet, including the noted M. Rejon, has, probably, met with the same fate.

The Herald has the following :—

"That republic is now the scene of domestic commotion, which has already resulted in the overthrow of Santa Anna. The following are the particulars. On the 3rd instant, a decree for the dissolution of the Chambers was published in Mexico by Canalizo, by order of Santa Anna. The excitement caused in Mexico by this decree was immense, and the Chambers made three protests and a proclamation to the inhabitants of the republic, which were about being published, when, by an order from Canalizo, all the printing offices in Mexico were closed, and all publications of any class forbidden, with the exception of the infamous organ of the tyrant, the Diario del Gobierno. This was adding fuel to the fire, and the excitement became so great and so general in every class of society, that Canalizo assembled all his troops, about 2000 in number, within the palace, and shut himself up with them and his four Ministers.

"On the morning of the 6th public feeling burst out in a general rise, and all the most respectable part of the male community presented themselves, arms in hand, together with the lower populace, at the Convent of San Francisco (engraved in our journal of January 18), where the Congress had assembled, after having been driven from the Chambers, and thence marched up en masse to the Palace, and demanded the surrender of Canalizo, giving him two hours to reflect before they commenced hostilities.

"Canalizo, far from being willing to listen to reason, prepared to make a sortie at the head of his troops, and having called upon them to follow him, one of his chief officers replied that he was the soldier of no tyrant, but of the nation, and shouted out 'Viva el Congreso!' which was echoed throughout the ranks. Canalizo, thus finding himself alone, retired in consternation to his apartments, and, having assembled his Ministers, demanded from the populace and the troops, now united, quarter for his own life and that of his Ministers. To this it was replied, that he should receive only the guarantee of a trial; upon which, finding that nothing better could be done, he surrendered himself and was placed under arrest—he and two of his Ministers, the Minister of War and Senor Rejon, having escaped.

"The populace then proceeded to the town-house, and took the portrait of Santa Anna from the Ayuntamiento, and dragged it through the streets, making 10,000 pieces of it, that each one might have a piece as a trophy. They then overthrew the famous statue of him which had been erected in the middle of the public square, and after having decapitated it, dragged the trunk in triumph through the streets. This done, they proceeded to the Pantheon of San Fernando, where Santa Anna's leg was interred with so much ceremony. The monument containing it was destroyed in the twinkling of an eye, and the embalmed leg was dragged forth and kicked through the streets."

Letters from various parts of Mexico speak in glowing terms of the pacific accomplishment of the revolution, and of the beneficial results which are likely to flow from the establishment of a firm, vigorous, and, above all, honest government, in lieu of the military despotism and grinding exactions which have, under the dictatorship of Santa Anna, crushed the people for the last few years.

The escape of Santa Anna is highly problematical. At the last advices he was at Queretaro, with about 2500 men. His troops were daily thinned by desertions. There is every probability that he will be ultimately left alone, and that he may be so hemmed in by his enemies as to leave him no chance of quitting the country. Should he succeed in escaping, he will probably proceed to Cuba, where, with his princely revenues, he can still live in his accustomed splendour. His private fortune is estimated at some four millions of dollars. For the last twenty-three years Santa Anna has, with very brief intervals, wielded the destinies of Mexico; but his career appears now to be really drawing to a close, leaving him the alternative of a disgraceful flight or an ignominious death. Congress, it is said, has outlawed him, in case he should not lay down the command of the troops.

In our front page, we have engraved the focus of this revolutionary movement—the Plaza Mayor, or principal square in the city of Mexico, which, on two sides, is surrounded by the cathedral and the palace, and on the other two sides by shops and dwelling-houses, with the exception of the Casa del Estado, or the palace of Cortes. In the centre of the square was formerly a magnificent equestrian statue of Charles IV. of Spain, which has been removed since the Revolution. This square is the market for vegetables and fruits. The cathedral stands on the ruins of the great teocalli, or temple of the god Mixitli. One part is low, and of bad Gothic architecture; but the other, built in the Italian style, is very handsome. The interior is lofty, magnificent, and imposing.

Humboldt's praises of the capital do not exceed the truth; and amongst the various capitals of Europe, there are few that can support with advantage a comparison with Mexico. The general style of the architecture is very peculiar. The streets are broad, airy, and drawn at right angles, so that, by looking down any two, at the point where they intersect each other a view of nearly the whole extent of the town is commanded. The houses are spacious, but low, seldom exceeding one story; the roofs are flat, and when seen at a distance, resemble immense terraces; but the numerous churches and convents, with their cupolas and steeples, give the town a magnificent appearance.

The squares are spacious, and generally surrounded by buildings of hewn stone. In that represented in our engraving, are situated the Parian, and principal shops. The town, too, has its Alameda, or public walk.

Our second illustration presents a view of the town of Xalapa, or Jalapa, from Mr. Ward's valuable description of Mexico: it lies in the state of Vera Cruz, on the eastern ascent from the coast, very much below the level of the table-land. Its position will, however, be better understood by an extract from Mr. Ward's work, wherein, having left the capital, he says:—"I took the La Puebla road, and made my first stage to the Venta de Cordova, about eight leagues from Mexico, having left that town very late in the day. The second day, I reached La Puebla; the third, Ogo de Agua the fourth, Perote; the fifth, Jalapa, where I passed the morning of the sixth day, and from whence I arrived at Vera Cruz in twenty-four hours." Jalapa lies in the temperate country (Tierra templada); yet, such is the variety of the Mexican climate, that although Jalapa would be called Tierra templada by a native of Mexico, that state would not, perhaps, be so termed by a native of Jalapa; while both would be designated in the same way by an inhabitant of Tierra fria (cold country), to whose district Nature has assigned a degree of warmth much inferior to that of the other two.

Jalapa will be found mentioned in the intelligence of our journal of the 18th ult. It is not a town of great beauty, although Mr Ward speaks of being most luxuriously lodged here, in the house of Madame Santa Anna. The environs present a beautiful variety of well-wooded surface; and in the horizon is some finely-varied mountain scenery, including the lofty Coffre de Perote. The town itself, containing 13,000 inhabitants, lies on a level spot, situated on a steep ascent, 4335 feet above the sea level; and such is its salubrity, that to this place the merchants of Vera Cruz retire when the vomito pietro is raging along the coast. This terrible disorder is very similar to the worst species of the yellow fever in the West Indies: and is named from one of its worst symptoms—the black vomit (vomito pietro).

The third scene will convey some idea of the usual mode of travelling in Mexico—the locality being on the road between the capital and Jalapa, with the Peak of Orizava in the distance. The vehicle is the travelling carriage of the country, and the cattle are mules; yet this is a sorry mode of locomotion. The carga mules, of the best Durango breed, will, however, on a journey, continue at a trot before the horses 30 or 40 miles, with a load o 150lb. or 160lb.

TRAVELLING IN MEXICO.

CHURCH AT COLABAH,

IN MEMORY OF THOSE WHO FELL IN THE WARS OF SCINDE AND AFFGHANISTAN.

"Pious memory" of the dead has seldom been more strikingly exemplified than in the sentiment of veneration for the brave departed which prompted the building o. Colabah Church. In the Eastern Indies the iron rule of conquest has yet to be adorned by the precepts of the Prince of Peace. A few Christian patriots, feeling this to be a desirable consummation of the bloody struggle in which we were engaged with the northern tribes of Hindostan, resolved on the erection of a church in the neighbourhood of our battle-fields, and to devote it, not only to the religious instruction of the heathen population, but also to consecrate it as a lasting monument of the public virtues of the thousands of our fellow countrymen who perished in the conquest of Scinde and the castigation of the Affghans. This generous purpose has been accomplished in the structure of which our engraving gives an exact representation. The building is now in progress of erection, and, when completed, will form no mean specimen of the architectural arts of the home country. The design, which is by J. M. Derick, Esq., is a modification, on a plain and cheap principle, of the florid Gothic; a style admirably sdapted to the climate, and calculated to have a good effect in the midst of the florid scenery of India. The plan is cruciform, and the whole arrangement affects a somewhat cathedral character. We consider the entrance to be too small, and the substructure much too slight and mean in its proportions for the basement of a largely-proportioned building. The purpose of the church, however, disarms criticism.

THE CHURCH OF COLABAH.

NEW ZEALAND.

There is an arrival of New Zealand papers and letters to the 13th October, which possess considerable interest. Captain Fitzroy had made such arrangements with the native chiefs respecting the disputes about the land sales, that he had been able to order the troops from Sydney to return in the vessel that had brought them, without their requiring to make any demonstration. The Bay of Islands had been declared a free port, a measure which had given great satisfaction to the natives, as it will enable them to obtain a better market for their hemp, which they are now cultivating to a considerable extent, as well as other products, for the supply of the whalers.

THE FRENCH CHAMBER OF PEERS.

Last week, the Chamber of Peers was the scene of very important discussions on the Address. This fine edifice was formerly the Luxembourg Palace, erected by Mary de Medici: it is a good specimen of its particular style (the Florentine), where three orders are introduced with rusticated columns and pilasters. One of the most splendid features of the interior is the grand staircase leading to the Hall of the Peers, executed by Percier and Fontaine. The hall, or chambre itself, is a semicircle, 77 feet in diameter. The walls, ceilings, and soffites, are elaborately panelled, ornamented with imitative marble, and decorated with paintings, busts, and sculptured door pediments; and there is an effective range of consoles throughout the design. In the middle of the axis of the semicircle is a semicircular recess, in which are placed the seats of the President and Secretaries; and the demi-cupola above, is ornamented in caissons. The Peers' benches, arranged as in an amphitheatre, occupy the area in front of the President. The Peer who addresses the assembly takes his station in the tribune, below the President's desk.

The recent discussions in the Chamber of Deputies are of peculiar interest, involving, as they do, the question of the stability of the Ministry. A long debate having taken place on the third paragraph of the address—and the amendment upon the subject of Tahiti being, on Saturday, rejected without a division—on Monday the Chamber resumed the discussion on the third paragraph, the amendment to which was rejected by a show of hands on Saturday. After some remarks from M. Billault, M. Garnier Pages, and other deputies, the ballot was proceeded with, when there appeared—

For the original paragraph	213
Against it	205
Majority in its favour	8

After the vote adopting the third paragraph, by 213 to 205, the Chamber roceeded to the discussion of the remaining paragraphs of the Address. To the fourth paragraph M. Cremieux proposed an amendment, which he immediately withdrew.

On paragraph 6, which alludes to the friendly relations of France with foreign Powers, being read,

The President said—M. Vivien has proposed on the latter paragraph an amendment.

M. Vivien.—In the present state of things I withdraw it.

Paragraph 6 was then adopted, and the next, alluding to the prosperous state of the finances, was brought forward.

M. St. Priest, who had signified his intention to propose an amendment on this point, declared that he should withdraw it. (Laughter on the Left.)

Paragraphs 8, 9, and 10, relating respectively to the bills that were to be brought forward—to the marriage of the Duke d'Aumale—and to the union between France and the present dynasty, were then adopted without opposition.

The Chamber then proceeded to the ballot on the ensemble of the Address.

Almost all the members of the Left abstained from taking part in the vote.

Whilst the members were dropping in their balls, Marshal Soult, M. Guizot, M. Martin (du Nord), and M. Duchâtel, retired. MM. Cunin-Gridaine and Dumon remained in their places. M. Guizot, however, returned before the ballot had concluded.

Count Molé, who was present during the whole sitting, was seen to speak with great animation to M. St. Marc Girardin.

The ballot having been taken, there appeared—

For the Address	216
Against it	33
Majority for the Address	183

The Chamber of Deputies met on Tuesday to fix the order of its deliberations. The President having enumerated the bills lying over since last year, and consulted the Assembly respecting the manner in which they should be disposed of, M. Manuel observed that, in the present state of preoccupation of the Chamber, the bill relative to the accounts of 1842 could not be examined with the attention which so important a subject required, and proposed to adjourn its discussion. The house, however, decided that it should come on on Thursday. M. Mercier next rose, and said that the Customs Tariff Bill was ready, and might be immediately placed on the order of the day. The Minister of Commerce replied, that during the recess various modifications had been introduced into the Customs Tariff by Royal ordinances, that a bill demanding the sanction of those modifications should be submitted in a few days to the Legislature, and might be referred to the committee on the Customs Bill to report upon it, so that the two bills could be discussed together. The Chamber acquiesced in those reasons, and decided that it should ulteriorly appoint a day for its discussion. Marshal Soult, M. Guizot, and the other Ministers, were present at the sitting. M. Duchatel had addressed a letter to the President, to inform him that the King would receive the deputation chosen to present the address to his Majesty, at eight o'clock on Wednesday evening.

As the previous proceedings of the Chamber of Deputies are interesting, and will serve to elucidate more clearly the result, we give an analysis of them.

On Saturday, the discussion was opened on the third paragraph, which is as follows:—

"Incidents, which at first seemed of a nature to trouble the friendly relations between France and England, had deeply agitated the two countries, and called for all the attention of our Government. We are well pleased to learn that a reciprocal sentiment of good-feeling and equity has maintained between the two States that happy accord which is so important both to their prosperity and to the repose of the world."

To this paragraph, M. Leon de Malleville moved the following amendment:—

"We are happy to learn that the accord so necessary to the repose of the world has been maintained between the two States, but we regret that, in granting a reparation which was not due, the rules of justice and reciprocity which France shall always respect, were not sufficiently taken into account."

M. Malleville in support of his amendment condemned the whole course adopted by the Ministry relative to Tahiti, and attacked Mr. Pritchard with great virulence, accusing him of being a spy.

M. Peyramont defended the Ministry, and did justice to the conduct of England.

M. Guizot ably and energetically defended the Government. He read his despatch to Count Jarnac, dated the 8th August, as well as that of the 29th August, both of which had been read to the Chamber of Peers; on concluding which M. Guizot held up his hands, and in a manner the most solemn, challenged the Chamber to declare whether his language had varied or not. He denied that the English Government had offered any menaces, and defended the Count de Jarnac's diplomatic conduct, who had so properly described the facts as he had observed them. He went on to say he would accept the position as it had been propounded. Yes, there must always be between France and England an exchange of good offices. No one was more convinced, too, than he was, that no physical prosperity could compensate for the humiliation of a country. When he had heard it said that the good offices were not reciprocal, he thought he must be dreaming, so contradicted were such assertions by positive facts. So far was that from being the case that he could prove, if necessary, that France had gained ground in every part of the globe. After dwelling generally on the circumstances attending the whole negociations, M. Guizot observed that there was no alternative between an accommodation and a rupture. Never had the policy of the country been abused in his hands; all they wanted was a clear decision on the subject. (Great approbation.) He sat down amidst much applause, and was listened to throughout with great respect, even by the Opposition.

M. Dufaure spoke for some time, but there was nothing new in his arguments. A scene of great excitement ensued, and the question was put. The secretaries declared the result to be doubtful, there being no ballot; but upon a second trial, the Opposition amendment was declared to be rejected. The mode of taking the division was by counting the Opposition members as they rose first, and then the Conservatives were counted.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"T. W. B.," Ryde; "J. T. N. V.," Bodmin.—1. The Bank of England covers an irregular space of 4 acres, comprising the greater part of the parish of St. Christopher. The exterior walls of the south side measure 365 feet; the length of the west side is 440 feet; of the north side, 410 feet; and of the east side, 245 feet. This area comprises 9 open courts—the Rotunda, Committee-rooms, apartments for officers and servants, and the rooms appropriated to business. The number of rooms beneath the ground-floor and below the surface of the ground is greater than those above ground: here are the vaults in which the Bank treasure is deposited. (See No. 121 of our journal for additional details.)—2. The area of St. Paul's Cathedral, and enclosed church-yard, is a ground plot of 2 acres 16 perches and 70 feet. —3. The alterations in the New Houses of Parliament have been so numerous in the progress of the building that it is scarcely possible to state the precise area without actual measurement: the total length of the river-wall is stated at 876 feet 6 inches; and of the clear terrace walk, 673 feet inches long, by 32 feet wide, between the wings and fronting the river. Our correspondents, who profess to treasure "information of this kind," should provide themselves with our Large View of London, and Key, the latter comprising a mass of details of the area and architectural data of the metropolis.

Last week we engraved the Burning of the Greyfriars Churches at Edinburgh: next week we shall present our readers with a picturesque view of the Ruins of the venerable edifices.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1845.

THE colonisation of New Zealand was commenced on a plan that was, upon paper, perfection itself: the country was described in such terms that it became a marvel how the world could have gone on so long, and left this, one of its fairest corners, neglected. A company was organised that gave public entertainments, and had drawings of land allotments, after the fashion which the Legislature has since abolished in the Art Unions; ship loads of emigrants went out to this latest found of terrestial paradises; much property was invested in land in the colony, and for a time there was hope; but soon came disappointment, and now the accounts from that distant island are filled with absolute despair. The Company throws the fault on the Colonial Office; the Colonial Office has been, from the very beginning, at variance with the Company; the natives have been puzzled by two authorities, and the settlers having purchased land of one, are refused the confirmation of the grants by the other; the Governor sent out by the Crown appears to have been neither very wise nor very energetic; quarrels with the natives about titles and purchases of land have arisen, attended by bloodshed and massacre, and the result of the whole series of mistakes and mismanagement is, that the colony is ruined. The last accounts are truly grievous. Three hundred individuals have left Nelson to find a home in other settlements, Sydney, or elsewhere; and there is no employment whatever. The failure of the Company has shaken all public credit there; employment there is none; property, especially cattle, is dreadfully depreciated, and in the impossibility of procuring food by labour, the workmen are beginning to take it by force. A continuance of the present state of affairs will undo the work of years, and leave things, after an immense expenditure, and the waste of hope and enterprise on the part of thousands, just as they were at first, or rather worse, if any thing. If ever a case imperatively demanded an inquiry from Parliament it is this. We do not think emigration is the sole, or the best means of bettering our social condition; but it is a most important one, and the failure of a plan, founded on a principle that at first promised so fairly, is almost a national misfortune.

The great evil seems to have been in the jealousy between the New Zealand Company and the Crown, or rather the Colonial Office. The Company made its settlement without assistance from the Government, and probably desired nothing more than that it should be "let alone." But this could not be; and from the moment the Government interfered, everything seems to have gone wrong. The lands purchased of the Natives by the Company, and bought of it by the settlers, ought to have become the undisputed property of the buyers; instead of this, it seems that the Crown has put in a claim to large portions of this land, and the buyers, who thought themselves safe after paying the Company's price, have a demand made on them of £5 an acre more by the Crown, which they must pay in addition to the first purchase, or lose all. We cannot help thinking this in the highest degree unjust. The Government did nothing for the colony; it sent out no labour, no emigrants, no armed force for protection; conceding to it a right of territory, that did not constitute it proprietor of the land, which, without labour, was worth nothing. An acknowledgment of the title of the Crown was all that was necessary, and this could have been secured as well by the payment of a halfpenny an acre, as of five pounds. To compel the payment of such a price for land, that not seven years ago was the hunting ground of the savage, and which, but for the labour bestowed on it, could be worth nothing at all, was neither more nor less than bringing ruin on the heads of those who had been unfortunate enough to buy and cultivate it. The feelings of the Colonists may be gathered from the following extract from a letter from Nelson, published during the week :—

A sudden rupture between the New Zealand Company and her Majesty's Government has at once deprived us of our possessions; in fact, not only ourselves, but I may add hundreds of others, who, having purchased of the Company here, and not having had that purchase (as they term it) legally recognised by the Home Directors, have been victimised, and that by the fiat of a Commissioner, who sits in judgment to adjudicate on the different claims to land between native and European, and between the Company and the Government. Our section, among others, is declared the property of the Crown, and we have now either to pay into the Government Treasury the minimum price of £5 per acre, for the section of 50 acres, making a total of £250, or lose all. You, no doubt, will think this a queer way to do business, and would naturally suspect that our former purchase-money would be refunded. No such thing; the Company, within the last month, have stopped payment, and we are told by them that we had no right to purchase in such a manner.

Here is a case in which what the writer calls a "calm and happy retreat" is broken up by a claim on the part of the Crown of an extortionate price for land which it has neither purchased of the natives, nor conquered by force of arms, nor settled, nor improved, nor cultivated in any way or manner whatever. To the Crown the land never cost fivepence, nor intrinsically is it worth it; without the labour that these industrious settlers have bestowed on it, it will relapse into wilderness. Here, as in many other instances, the Colonial Office doing nothing in the way of good, has a most unfortunate tendency to spoil all things that, without it, were prospering. The Company is by no means free from blame; we are not its advocates; but it did succeed in carrying energy, labour, and capital, into a sphere where all might have been exercised with advantage, and we have confidence enough in the sturdy spirit, untiring industry, and perseverance of our countrymen, to believe that they would have succeeded against almost any obstacles, if the Government in an evil hour had not interfered; the authority of the Crown over all countries inhabited by its subjects must be acknowledged; but that does not make the Crown proprietor of the land, or warrant it in exacting exorbitant prices for it. Colonization is but conquest in another form, and should be conducted on terms as favourable a possible to the colonizers—to those who encounter all the risk. We read that when Willliam I. conquered England, he gave or divided the land among his Norman Barons, requiring from them only a military suit and service, which was but light in itself, yet served at once as an acknowledgment of the King's authority, and sufficed for the defence of the realm either against outward attack or inward rebellion. And his Barons on that condition built castles and strong holds, which were the germs of future towns, and established peace and security, in which the people gradually prospered, notwithstanding the hatred of races. But suppose William had turned land-jobber and had insisted on his followers—the last colonists of England—paying him fifty pounds or any other exorbitant price per acre for their goodly manors, would he have conquered the land? or, if his design was not known, if he had conquered it, could he have kept it? We believe not. The Crown has turned land-jobber in New Zealand; not content with authority it wanted profit; so the colonists are disgusted, are flying from the country, and the whole is summed up in one brief sentence—the Colony is ruined.

THE death of Earl St. Germain's, the father of Lord Eliot, the late Secretary for Ireland, has made a vacancy in one of the most arduous offices of the Government. The successor of Lord Eliot is Sir Thomas Fremantle. A more important change in the personel of the Ministry has been announced, in the rumoured retirement of Mr. Gladstone from office, on account, it is said, of a difference of opinion with the head of the Government, as to his policy with respect to the Church. Opinions of the Tractarian School are certainly entertained by Mr. Gladstone, and he seems more willing to conciliate Rome theologically than politically. The recent disposition shown by Sir R. Peel to conciliate the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland, however coldly his advances have been received; his avowed intention of increasing the grant to the College of Maynooth; his decided support of the National Education system, and the political intercourse he has lately held with the Papal Court, have, it is probable, awakened scruples in the mind of Mr. Gladstone, who is a high Churchman. But there may also be other reasons; of all the advocates of slavery, and defenders of it, as a system, Mr. Gladstone was the acutest, the ablest, the most eloquent. The system was overthrown; but it is becoming impossible to confine the trade of England to our own Colonies, and any commercial intercourse with other nations must involve an encouragement of the slave system by a consumption of slave grown produce. This, Mr. Gladstone thinks unjust, and having expressed such decided opinions on the subject, perhaps he does not feel able to modify them to the extent that the exigencies of office may require. There are reports abroad of contemplated changes in the Sugar Duties, which may have too great a tendency towards an adopting of the principles of free trade to suit the exclusively colonial theory of Mr. Gladstone. In accounting for his defection from the Ministry, his opinions on commercial questions should not be forgotten, as they may be as much at variance with the tendencies of the Government as those he holds on subjects connected with the Church. We cannot help thinking the Ministry will sustain a loss in Mr. Gladstone that the Conservative ranks are not able to supply, for his remarkable and unquestioned talents have secured him an influence in the House of Commons, and a weight with the public, possessed by no other man of his age and standing.

ZURBANO, whose insurrection gave so much anxiety to the Spanish Government, after a long concealment, has fallen into the hands of Narvaez; and, as might have been anticipated, was shot without trial and without delay. He was arrested by an old Carlist enemy, who watched for him with all the vigilance of long cherished hate, and at last succeeded. Zurbano was concealed in the house of a brother-in-law, Cayetano, who was shot dead in trying to escape from a window when Zurbano was seized. The whole family, it is said, is now nearly exterminated. There is less pity for the fate of this man than for those connected with him. He was as cruel and remorseless as those by whose hands he has fallen; it is said he met his fate with the same indifference with which he often did, and would again have inflicted it on others, had he succeeded in his design.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last, the Queen and Prince Albert took their accustomed early walk in the pleasure grounds and the Home Park. On the return of the Royal party, the Prince, attended by Mr. G. E. Anson, Major General Wemyss, and Captain Meynell left the Castle for Dorney-common, to hunt with the harriers. Her Majesty, attended by the Marchioness of Douro, rode out in a pony phaeton. Colonel Bouverie was in attendance on horseback.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—This morning her Majesty and Prince Albert walked out for some time. The Queen, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the Court, and the domestic household attended divine service in the private chapel in the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay officiated.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took equestrian exercise in the riding school attended by Colonel Bouverie. The Marquis of Douro arrived at the Castle on a visit to her Majesty. The Right Hon. Sir Robert and Lady Peel also arrived in the afternoon on a visit to the Queen. Her Majesty and Prince Albert walked in the pleasure grounds and Home Park this afternoon. The Royal dinner party at the Castle included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, the Countess Wratislaw. Sir George and Lady Couper, and Captain Francis Seymour.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their usual early walk in the grounds adjoining the Castle and in the Home Park, this morning. On the return of her Majesty and the Prince, his Royal Highness left the Castle on a shooting excursion in the Royal preserves, accompanied by the Marquis of Douro, and attended by Mr. Anson, Colonel Bouverie, and Captain Meynell. The Marquis of Ormonde has relieved Viscount Sydney from his duties as the Lord in Waiting on the Queen; and Major-General Sir Frederic Stovin has succeeded the Hon. Nelson Hood as the Groom in Waiting on her Majesty. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert walked out for some time. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, and the Countess Wratislaw joined the Royal circle at dinner.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their early walk this forenoon in the pleasure-grounds and the Home Park. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were taken a carriage airing this morning, and were also taken to the gardens at Frogmore to walk there. The Right Hon. Sir Robert and Lady Peel left the Castle this morning for town. The Marquis of Douro also took his departure. At five o'clock this afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Equerries in Waiting, went to the riding-school to take equestrian exercise.

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The Queen and the Prince Consort took their accustomed early promenade this morning. Her Majesty and the Prince, after visiting the Royal aviary, proceeded to the private kennel, and returned to the Castle shortly before ten o'clock. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards proceeded in the Sefton-carriage and four to Flemish Farm, and shot over the Royal Preserves in that part of the Royal domains, where he enjoyed some excellent sport. The Prince was attended by the Marquis of Ormonde, Sir Frederick Stovin, Colonel Bouverie, and Mr. George E. Anson. Their royal highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, took walking and equestrian exercise this morning in the private grounds in the Home Park. His Royal Highness Prince Alfred was also taken for an airing at noon. The Royal dinner party this evening will include the Duchess of Kent, the Countess of Wratislaw, the Marchioness of Douro, the Hon. Misses Kerr and Murray, Lady Fanny Howard, the Marquis of Ormonde, Major General Sir Frederick Stoven, Major General Wemyss, Colonel Bouverie, &c. The band of the Royal Horse Guards will perform during the dinner, and her Majesty's private band of musicians have been commanded to be in attendance the remainder of the evening. The infant Royal family will leave the Castle on Saturday morning for the Pavilion at Brighton, and on Monday the Court will take its departure for Buckingham Palace.

MORE ROYAL VISITS.—We understand that during the approaching sojourn of the Court at Brighton it is the intention of her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert to visit the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk at Arundel Castle, and the Duke and Duchess of Richmond at Goodwood. The day on which her Majesty will proceed to Arundel Castle is understood to be fixed for Monday the 17th, or Tuesday the 18th February.

THE MAJORITY OF THE MARQUIS OF WORCESTER.—The rejoicings consequent on the Marquis of Worcester attaining his majority this day (Saturday) have already commenced in the neighbourhood of Badminster. Many distinguished individuals have already arrived. An abundance of good fare will be distributed to the poor. The carcases of no less than six oxen will be given away, besides an immense quantity of other viands, and twenty hogsheads of strong ale. The festivities are not confined to Gloucestershire; at Monmouth an ox will be roasted whole in Agincourt square, after having been paraded through the principal streets of the town to Troy House, the Duke of Beaufort's seat in that locality; and arrangements have been made, under the directions of his grace's steward, to regale all the poorer classes in honour of the occasion. At Swansea and at Crickhowell similar demonstrations of affectionate attachment towards the noble duke and his family have been determined on.

The late Edward Wood, Esq., of Northumberland Wharf, Strand, an extensive coal-merchant, has left an immense property. The personal estate alone amounts to £300,000.

ANOTHER MURDER AND SUICIDE.

There was considerable excitement yesterday (Friday) morning in the vicinity of Luke-street, Paul-street, Finsbury, on its being discovered that a man named Joseph Barry, a respectable surgical instrument maker, had in the course of the night murdered his wife, and afterwards committed suicide, at his residence, No. 7, Little Luke-street.

It appears that the husband was 63, and his wife, Priscilla Barry, 52; they resided together with one son. Thursday night, about 10 o'clock, the wife went to bed, leaving the husband seated in the kitchen with his son; the husband retired to rest at 11 o'clock; and the son, after waiting for his parents next morning till 10 o'clock, became alarmed. He knocked several times at the bed-room of his parents, and was horrified at beholding, through the keyhole, marks of blood on the bed-clothes. In his terror he went to his brother, who resided in the adjoining house; they both broke into the room, and on turning down the sheets, the awful spectacle was presented of their parents being both dead, with their throats cut in a frightful manner.

As yet no cause can be assigned; they were not in want, and the husband had lately been busily engaged in his business. The police are in possession of the house, round which hundreds of persons had assembled.

THE LATE MURDER AT BETHNAL GREEN.

On Thursday evening Mr. Baker resumed, at the London Hospital, the inquiry touching the death of Emma Whiter, aged 21, a weaveress, alleged to have been wilfully murdered early on Tuesday morning, by a young man named James Tapping, a lover of hers, now in custody on the charge. The particulars of this melancholy affair are given in our 75th page.

William Slater, of 4, South Conduit-street, Bethnal-green, whose house is situated at about thirty-six yards from the spot at which deceased's body was found, saw her pass his door laughing and chatting with the prisoner Tapping, who had his right arm round her neck, and about seven or eight minutes after he heard the near report of a gun or pistol. He looked through his bed-room window, and saw no one. All this occurred about half-past twelve o'clock on Tuesday morning.

Thomas Whiter, a brother of deceased, said he heard of the murder about the hour just named. That he went immediately to the hospital, and there saw the dead body of his sister. He told the police he suspected Tapping of being the murderer, on account of his bad character, and the witness said it was doubtful whether his sister kept company occasionally with Tapping through fear or love. She carried on no correspondence with any other person.

Thomas Whiter, a very respectable-looking man, and father of deceased, said that about two o'clock on Tuesday morning a man, named Richard Bunn, came and knocked at his door, and asked if he had a daughter from home, and whether he knew a man named James Tapping. Witness answered both questions in the affirmative, and then the man Bunn said, Tapping is at home raving about the house, exclaiming, "I have done it, I have done it." The witness then repeated evidence about going to Tapping's lodging, and giving information to the police, which caused the latter to apprehend him.

Richard Bunn, a weighing machine-maker, said—I was at the Rising Sun public-house, Sale-street, Bethnal-green, between one and two o'clock on Tuesday morning, when James Tapping, the prisoner, came in, and seated himself on a table, and said to a brother of his, Henry Tapping, who was standing in the tap-room, "The deed is done, and it cannot be undone." The public-house being about to be cleared, the prisoner left, and I followed him to the corner of the court in which he lived, saying, "James, what is the matter with you?" He exclaimed, "What is the matter, indeed? Oh, the stars look bright, and the moon shines clear." I said, "Jem, will you come with me?" He answered, "No; why should I go with you?" I at last persuaded him to come away from the court; and as he was doing so he said to a man named Thomas Capes, who was with him by the court, "Thomas Capes, you have been the whole of this destruction, and I never want to speak to you again."

Thomas Perkins, gun-maker, of Sale-street, Bethnal-green, proved having repaired, on Saturday last, for James Tapping, the pistol produced, and which was found close to deceased's body. Witness also gave Tapping four leaden bullets, which, he said, he wanted for a shooting match with Dick Bunn (the above witness).

Two bullets were here produced that had been extracted by Mr. Cummins, house-surgeon, from deceased's head, and they exactly fitted a mould in which Perkins had cast the four bullets he gave to James Tapping.

Perkins, in answer to the coroner, said he had no doubt that the two bullets produced were given by him to Tapping.

At eleven, after an inquiry of nearly six hours, the case was adjourned to Monday next.

Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Court, return to Buckingham Palace on Monday morning.

WILL OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS SOPHIA MATILDA.—The will and fourteen codicils of her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda have just been proved in Doctors'-commons, by the Hon. and Rev. Henry Legge, George Bankes, Esq., Lady Alicia Gordon (lady of deceased's bedchamber), and Miss Charlotte Cotes (woman of the bedchamber). Each of the last-named ladies has a legacy of £1000. All her Royal Highness's relatives seem to have been considered by her most kindly. She bequeaths to her steward, £500; to her surgeon, £100; and to her dresser, housemaid, and a host of other domestics, annuities varying from £6 to £50 a year; and in a codicil gives one hundred guineas to her butler, if in her service at the time of her death; and, after various legacies, bequeaths the residue of her property to Capt. Waldegrave, R.N. There are the following bequests:—To her Majesty Queen Victoria, a pair of bracelets, a portrait of deceased's father, the Duke of Gloucester and Edinburgh, and a miniature of her brother; to Prince Albert, a portrait of her (deceased's) mother, by Sir Joshua Reynolds; to the Princess Alice Maud Mary, "a long string of 191 pearls," and "a Bible and Psalter in German, richly bound, with the royal arms thereon;" to Queen Adelaide, a bracelet, "containing an enamel portrait of King William IV., set round with pearls, and two miniatures;" to Ernest King of Hanover, portraits of her father and mother; to the Crown Prince of Hanover, a handsome vase; to Leopold, King of the Belgians, a case of instruments for the table, containing paper-knife, &c.; to the Princess Sophia, a ring, "given me by the own dear hand of King George;" to the Duchess of Cambridge, a ring set with diamonds, "the gift of Queen Charlotte;" to Prince George of Cambridge, "a mahogany box, containing a handsome silver coffee set, the gift of her present Majesty." Her Royal Highness bequeaths to the National Gallery her picture, by Salvator Rosa, of "Diogenes throwing away his Cup." The personal property of her Royal Highness has been sworn under £25,000.

THE EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.—The German Gazette announces that most unfavourable accounts had been received at Vienna relative to the health of the Empress of Russia.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—It is now quite certain that the Queen intends to open the ensuing session of Parliament on Tuesday next in person. The necessary orders have been issued from the Lord Chamberlain's Office for the occasion, and a number of workmen are busily employed in the House of Lords fitting up seats, and completing the usual preparations for the reception of her Majesty.

A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office to-day. All the Ministers were present.

THE EARL OF MORNINGTON.—We regret to say that this venerable nobleman continues in a very weak state. The answer this morning was, "His lordship is much the same as yesterday."

DEATH OF THE MARQUIS OF SLIGO.—We regret to state that accounts have been received of the death of the Marquis of Sligo, which took place in Ireland. The noble earl had been in diplomatic service, and was formerly Governor of Jamaica. He was born in 1788. The deceased marquis, though professedly a Whig, had not mixed up in party matters for many years past.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY, Jan. 31st.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Bell Scholarships: The Vice-Chancellor has given notice that an election of two scholars upon this foundation will take place on Friday, the 7th of March, 1845; the candidates to signify their intention of offering themselves, on or before Thursday, the 6th of February, in a Latin epistle, to be presented to each of the electors, viz.:—The Vice Chancellor; Dr. Ollivant, Regius Professor of Divinity; Dr. Geldart, Regius Professor of the Civil Law; Dr. King, Lucasian Professor; Mr Crick, Public Orator. The Examination to commence on Monday, the 10th of February, at nine o'clock in the forenoon, in the Senate House.

EAST CORNWALL ELECTION.—William Pole Carew, Esq., of Antony House, a Conservative, has consented to stand in pursuance of a requisition, signed by an overwhelming array of names, which was presented to him on Monday last.

THE IRISH MEMBERS.—At the last meeting of the Repeal Association, the committee had not made their report upon the subject of the attendance of the Irish members. We learn, however, that the report has since been promulgated, and it advises the Irish members not to attend in their places, on the ground that the House of Commons, as at present constituted, does not possess the confidence of the Irish people, who cannot expect justice or fair play from that assembly.

THE WEATHER.—Another rather heavy fall of snow took place about three o'clock yesterday morning. This is the second time we have had snow during the present week, a slight fall having taken place early on Tuesday morning also.

THE CASE OF MR. CARUS WILSON.—In the Court of Queen's Bench yesterday Lord Denman gave judgment in this case. His lordship said that himself and his learned brethren were of opinion that the writ of habeas corpus issued by Mr. Baron Rolfe at chambers was legal and valid; therefore the rule obtained against it must be discharged, and Mr. Wilson brought up to the court within ten days, when the return to the writ could be argued and disposed of.

THE EXPLOSION ON THE MANCHESTER AND LEEDS RAILWAY.—On Thursday an inquest was held on the bodies of the three unfortunate men who lost their lives by the explosion of a boiler on the Manchester and Leeds Railway, under the circumstances stated in another part of our paper. The evidence did not supply any certain information as to the cause of the accident, and the inquest was adjourned till Monday.

THE ALLEGED MURDER AT LAMBETH.—Yesterday (Friday) Mr. Carter renewed the inquiry into the death of Diana Kemble, alias Campbell, who was found dead in the passage of her house in Fore-street, on Sunday morning last, under the circumstances stated in our Police Report. Several witnesses were examined, and the Jury returned a verdict—"That the deceased died from the effects of the bursting of a blood-vessel in the brain, occasioned by a fall while in a state of intoxication."

THE LATE MURDER AT SALT HILL.—Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, who has been specially retained, in conjunction with Mr. Montague Chambers, for the defence of the accused, has, it is stated, received a fee of three hundred guineas. The assizes take place on the 10th of March.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—RETENTION OF OFFICE BY THE GUIZOT CABINET.

Our advices from Paris to-day fully confirm our opinion that the recent proceedings of the Chamber of Deputies would have no effect upon the stability of the present French Ministry. There was a very numerous meeting of Conservatives on Wednesday, at Paris, at which no less than 47 members who had hitherto stood aloof from the Ministry, gave in their adhesion, and such was the feeling expressed towards the Government, that Marshal Soult in his own name and that of the Cabinet, assured the meeting that the Government did not intend to resign. No less than 211 Conservatives were present, and full confidence in the Government was expressed. In the evening, the President, Secretaries, and Commission appointed to present the address of the Chamber to the King, repaired to the Tuileries, accompanied by a vast number of the Conservative members. The King received them surrounded by his family, and attended by his Ministers, and delivered the following gracious reply to the address:—

"Messieurs the Deputies—I thank you for this loyal address. It will contribute, with that force which attaches itself to everything that emanates from you, to guard the future against the dangers which the blindness of passion too often draws upon the people. A mutual regard for justice and for peace presides over our relations with all foreign powers, and the agreement so happily and so honourably re-established between France and England attests the spirit of wisdom and of conciliation which animates the two Governments. Thanks to your concurrence, to the support that you have lent my Government, thanks to the stability that the union of the powers has given to our institutions, our country, protected by Divine Providence, enjoys that always-increasing prosperity which constitutes the glory of my reign, and, if I may be permitted to say it, my personal consolation. And instead of seeing neighbouring nations fear that the force and power of France may be employed in the ravages of war or propagation of revolutionary anarchy, we have inspired them with just confidence that our resources and our power shall be for them as for ourselves, a pledge of peace and security.

"I feel much touched with the sentiments that you have expressed towards my family and myself. Always devoted to our country, the happiness of my sons consists in being able to serve it; and their devotedness, like mine, shall have no other limit but that of our existence."

TRIAL OF THE GREAT BRITAIN.

THE VOYAGE FROM BRISTOL TO BLACKWALL.

They held me long with the axe and forge,
The deep groove and the chain,
While they told the world that—a giant thing!—
With sail for my bride-robe and steam for my wing,
I should some day wed the main!

They slung me up in a spacious vault,
With an artificer crew,
Who swore that I should defy the wreck!—
But I shudder'd each day, as they wrought my deck,
To see how large I grew!

Round and round my body they bound
Tight wondrous stays of plank;
Copper and iron to clench me sound;
Hot furnaces under my ribs I found
To dry the rust and dank!

Of fish that ride through the stormy tide,
The brawniest is the whale,
So they destined me of the world's wide fleet
As the giantess whale, 'gainst the winds to beat
With my steam wings and my sail!

I was not like the human brood,
With but one heart in my breast;
They gave me two—and their clock-work blood
Was to roll and plunge as I ploughed the flood,
Still beating without rest!

And the iron pulse was still to throb
For merchant and for mail—
Whether the sun rose fair in the sky,
Or Heaven looked down with a tearful eye,
Or thunder shook the gale!

At last I—cradled monster! lay
Ribb'd and fetter'd and staunched!
Till they let me loose on a gala day,
And christen'd me forth with a Champagne spray,
And shouted when I was launched!

They towed me forth, and Venetian Doge
Had never a train like me!
Had never a pageantry half so grand,
When he went with the nobles of all his land
To wed the eternal Sea!

Neptune of all that Sea was King!
And his Trident ruled its tide!
Oh! I flew out on my bridal wing
And I heard the rapturous Mermaids sing,
While I was made Neptune's Bride!

Six masts!—like princely sons—to bear!
"GREAT BRITAIN" for my name!
My trail-smoke black on the sun-bright air,
My wheels as swift, and my sails as fair,
As the trumpet-voice of Fame!

I'm on the deep, and afar I go,
With my grand deck bravely trod;
Who wish me safely to and fro
On my great trade missions [shine or blow],
Go home and pray to God!

Pray that my fate may be like hers
From whom my name I gain—
Great Britain! Queen of all the seas,
With glories and prosperities
Still gather'd from the Main!

On Thursday week, this extraordinary vessel, which has created so much interest in the nautical and mercantile world, left Bristol (Kings-road) to come round to the river.

At seven P.M. the vessel was got under weigh, but upon the anchor being sighted it was found that it had fouled with the wreck of the Norah Creina, a schooner which was run down and sunk a few weeks ago, and had brought up a portion of gear. As it took a considerable time to clear the wreck from the anchor, the vessel did not proceed at more than half speed until abreast of Holmes Light House, at forty minutes past nine, when her speed was increased, the engines making fourteen revolutions per minute, the pressure being 4½lbs. to the square inch. At five minutes past ten the engines were again slackened to adjust one of the bearings, and the vessel was kept at a reduced speed until past midnight, when it was again increased.

At the time the ship got under weigh at Kings-road it was blowing a fresh breeze from the S.S.W., which, at three A.M., on Friday, had veered to the N.W., and increased to a gale, with a heavy cross sea. No vessel could have a more favourable opportunity of testing her capabilities than was afforded to the Great Britain during her passage from the Holmes to the Land's-end. The wind had been blowing fresh from the S.W., and caused a heavy swell from the Atlantic, and upon its chopping round to the N.W. there was a counter swell from the Irish Channel, causing a disagreeable and heavy cross sea. The ship behaved nobly throughout the gale, and did not appear to labour much. Her pitching was extremely easy, and although she rolled considerably, as might naturally be expected from her being so lightly laden, still it was very gradual, and not attended with any disagreeable jerking motion. The gale continued to increase, and was for a considerable time on her starboard bow; yet, notwithstanding this, she made considerable progress, and in the face of the gale, and a heavy head sea, with a strong ebb (spring) she made five and a half knots per hour. At twenty minutes past twelve, when about fifteen miles to the westward of Lundy, she was struck on the starboard bow by a tremendous sea, which must have contained two or three thousand tons of water. The shock for a moment seemed to paralyse the vessel, and to bring her to a stand-still; and even to make the engines themselves jerk in such a manner, that, had they not been fixed to a nicety, might have done them some damage. This, however, was but for one moment; the vessel recovered the shock instanter, and continued to brave the gale as though nothing had happened to check her progress. Some idea may be formed of the force of the concussion from the damage done to the vessel. Three of her starboard bow bull's eyes were stove in, together with their frames—the diagonal bands of her forecastle deck were bent—the woodwork started two inches upwards, a portion of carved figure head carried away, also the wooden fittings of her bulkhead—the iron sheathing of both bows split above deck in two places. The gale continued throughout the day until half-past five, P.M., when it became more moderate. At a quarter to nine P.M. rounded the Land's-end, and at twenty minutes to eleven was off the Lizard, proceeding up the channel at the rate of ten and a half knots per hour. During the heavy gale the engines were found to work uniformly, which is not the case with those of paddle fitted vessels, in consequence of the wheels being frequently plunged even to their axes, at which time the engines are, as it were, paralysed, and the next moment, in consequence of the water leaving the wheel, the engines fly off at a speed much beyond their usual rate of working, which not only requires the greatest attention of the engineers, but frequently, in spite of every precaution, causes considerable derangement to the machinery. The uniformity with which the engines of vessels with screw propellers work is of more importance than may perhaps first strike those not practically acquainted with the subject; for, when the engine of a paddle vessel is reduced in its speed, the power, as a matter of course, is less in proportion, and this deficiency generally occurs in gales of wind, when its maximum effect is most required—it being well-known that a power, however great, applied at intervals, is less efficacious than when steadily and constantly applied; and this in some measure accounts for the Great Britain making so good a passage under such disadvantageous circumstances. It having been stated that the screw, from its peculiar position so far aft, would, by the pitching of the ship, be subjected to a similar disadvantage, the paddle-wheel being lifted out of the water; it was noticed during the gale how far this statement was borne out in practice, and it was found at that no time, even when the fore-foot of the ship was distinctly seen the propeller was out of the water, except three or four feet of its upper part, which was only momentarily. This is fully confirmed by the engine never varying more than from a half to a whole stroke per minute.

On Saturday, at ten minutes past twelve A.M., we were abreast of Falmouth, and proceeded up Channel, with light winds from the south-west, at an average speed of twelve miles per hour. At forty-five minutes past twelve P.M., entered the Needles passage, and upon arriving off Cowes, at fifteen minutes past two, stopped the engine to land despatches. At eighteen minutes past two proceeded again on our course. Upon arriving at Spithead, passed under the stern of her Majesty's ship Apollo, fired a gun, and gave her three cheers, which were returned by the crew and troops on board. After passing the Nab the weather became thick and hazy, with squalls from the south west, and continued so until midnight. At —— passed the South Foreland, and at forty minutes past one A.M. on Sunday came to an anchor in the Downs, having, during the last twenty-nine hours, from the time we rounded the Land's end, run three hundred and fifty miles at an average speed of twelve miles per hour.

At fifty-five minutes past seven A.M., the vessel was got under weigh again from the Downs, and upon rounding the North Foreland, and steering through the Queen's Channel, encountered a stiff gale from the W.N.W., the wind having shifted during the night to that point. The vessel, however, encountered it in gallant style, and made nine-and-a-half knots against it. At the Nore at half-past twelve P.M. came up with the Waterwitch Hull steamer, and passed her hand over hand, having from the time we first descried her beaten her five miles in an hour and a half. Previously to coming up with the Waterwitch, met the Prince Albert American packet, who hoisted her colours and gave us three cheers as we passed, which was returned by the Great Britain, who hoisted the English ensign abaft, and the American colours at the main. When off Gravesend there was some difficulty in threading the way through the numerous fleet of colliers and other vessels that were at anchor there. The Great Britain, notwithstanding her immense length, steered as easily, and answered the helm as readily, as a small boat would have done. The pilot in charge, Mr. Knight, who usually attends her Majesty on her aquatic excursions from the river, seemed to be perfectly confident of bringing his charge safely through the numerous difficulties with which he had to contend. He had come round with her from Bristol, and had witnessed her performances during the voyage, and knew he had her as much under his command as if he had undertaken to pilot the smallest river steam-boat. A collier brig drifted against the Great Britain, and struck her on the bows, and by the force of the concussion carried away her own bowsprit, while the Great Britain did not sustain the slightest injury.

The Great Britain is divided in compartments, to each of which the engine-pumps, by the means of pipes and cocks, can be applied. The water-tight divisions of each compartment add greatly to the strength of the ship, either as struts or ties. All steamers, whether on the score of humanity, or for the preservation of property, ought to be so divided, for if a vessel be divided into five or six compartments, and any one of them should from accident fill, her buoyancy would only be slightly affected. If two compartments filled, and those two were not at the extremes, the extreme compartments would still keep her afloat. If two consecutive compartments, either forward or aft, filled, it is certain if she went down head or stern foremost that she would be some time about it, long enough, probably, to give time for all the boats to be got in readiness.

As she passed up the river the crews of every vessel run on deck to obtain a view of her. Her extraordinary length, and her singular appearance, with six masts, rendered her an object of considerable attraction. She arrived off Woolwich at thirty minutes past three, P.M., and at Blackwall a few minutes after. At both these places there was an immense concourse of people assembled to witness her arrival. After she had taken up her moorings off Blackwall, Capt. S. Lushington, on behalf of the passengers who had come round from Bristol in her, presented Capt. Hoskin with the following testimonial: and, in doing so, said, it was with extreme pleasure he fulfilled the duty that had been imposed upon him, in handing that address in his own and in the name of his fellow-passengers to an officer who had been under his command, and who had zealously fulfilled his duties. Lieutenant Hosken in 1828 was first lieutenant in the ship commanded by Captain Lushington. About an hour and ten minutes after the Great Britain had been moored, the Waterwich, which she passed at the Nore, arrived at Blackwall. During the voyage the Great Britain carried four large life-boats of wood in the davits, and one large life-boat on deck; they were built according to a patent taken out by Mr. Guppy, and are capable of containing four hundred people. From the time she left the Holmes light until she arrived at Blackwall, she made 54,521 revolutions with her engine; and 163,563 revolutions with her screw.

Her six masts give her an extraordinary appearance; they are all fitted with iron rigging, adopted in consequence of its offering two thirds less resistance than hemp, a great point in going head to wind. It was wished that five should have been the complement, but there was some difficulty in adjusting that number, and the alternative was either four or six. Economy of labour is a principle which has, in a great degree, affected the mode of rigging both the Great Western and the Great Britain. Nothing is so difficult to handle, under a variety of circumstances, as the sails of a steamer, unless the engine be stopped, which can never be allowed in Atlantic steaming, where onwards, and for ever onwards, is the rule. The greater the number of masts, the more handy the sails, and the smaller the number of seamen required to handle them. If these ships had been rigged as ships ordinarily are, the former would require a crew of more than one hundred seamen, and the latter that of a large frigate. Divided as the canvass is, and reduced, the former only requires twenty seamen before the mast, while thirty are enough for the latter. In the Great Britain there is, in fact, but one sail, the square mainsail, which, under any circumstances, can require all hands to furl it. Five masts of the six are hinged for lowering, when, in the captain's judgment, contrary gales shall appear to have set in, as the westerlies do at certain seasons of the year, prevailing for months in the Atlantic. To a seaman's eye they have a look of insecurity; but, if the strain which a fixed mast will stand is compensated by additional shrouding and stays, either in strength or quantity, the same end is attained. The after masts could not be stepped in the ordinary manner, on account of the space occupied by the screw shaft.

In theory, the principle of lowering is evidently right, because a steam-ship's masts and rigging going head to wind offer more resistance than the hull out of water, and there seems no reason to fear the result of practice.

In taking up her moorings at Blackwall, as the tide was flowing, she had occasion to swing round, and in so doing she presented a singular appearance, for when lying athwart the river she actually occupied nearly the whole breadth from bank to bank. Some idea of her extraordinary length may be formed when it is stated that she is upwards of one hundred feet longer than either of our first-rate line-of-battle ships, the Queen, Caledonia, and St. Vincent. The length of these vessels being 205 feet, while the length of the Great Britain is 322 feet, and the length of her keel 289 feet. She is to lay off Blackwall for some time, and will prove an object of great attraction to all those at all interested in nautical matters.

On board the Great Britain Steam-ship, River Thames, Jan. 26, 1845.

We, the undersigned passengers, on board the Great Britain steam-ship, on her experimental voyage from Bristol to London, having witnessed her performances during a stiff gale and a heavy sea, and amidst generally unfavourable weather, feel called upon to express our conviction of her great length being no detriment to her excellent sailing qualities and her seaworthiness; and of the great advantage of the application of Mr. Smith's crew; as also our sense of the skill, attention, and urbanity of her commandant Lieut. Hoskin, R.N., and the good conduct of her officers and crew.

We further beg to express our high sense of the spirited conduct of the company by whom so great a monument of commercial enterprise was designed and carried out; and to congratulate them, and the engineers, and artisans employed in her construction, upon the success which has attended their labours, as evinced by the results of a voyage so well calculated to test her powers as the present has been.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT-GARDEN.

The production of a five act drama is now-a-days a circumstance of rare occurrence. Not that there are no authors bold enough to write one; the principal difficulty appears to be that of finding a manager of sufficiant nerve to produce one, after the unfavourable results which have attended the representation of the majority of those lately brought forward; in some instances amounting to summary condemnations; in others, where the immature production was not, at once, charitably put out of its misery, to an alarming deficit in the accounts of the treasury.

Mr. Laurent, however, has been found sufficiently chivalrous to come to the aid of the declining drama; and what is more remarkable, to bring out a five-act play from the pen of an author comparatively little known in the theatrical world. Mr. Spicer has, however, written other dramas, although up to the present time he has ranked amongst the "unacted." We remember reading one of his productions a year or two ago, "The Lords of Ellingham," written with spirit and vigour. Two other dramas, "Lost and Won," and "The Steward," have also emanated from his pen; but the present piece which is called "Honesty," is the first that has been represented at the theatres.

The plot is somewhat difficult to follow, not from any intricacy in its construction, but from an occasional deficiency of motive for some of the incidents that occur. Douglas Trafford (Mr. Vandenhoff) has arrived at the brink of ruin through his reckless prodigality. He has very little property left that he can turn into money: and his servants rob him even of that. A usurer who has supplied him from time to time with money, Deverell (Mr Rogers), is about to arrest him, finding little more is to be made of him, and comes with officers to his house for that purpose at a time he is sorely pressed by creditors, some of whom he has completely ruined: as he says when he beholds them—

TRAFFORD (apart).

And this work is mine.
I—I have made these poor homes desolate—
From infant mouths kept back the wholesome food—
Brought clouds upon the fair and prosperons morn
Of honest industry; trod merit down;
Struck from the old man's hand the crutch and stay,
And left him prostrate!—I—O God!—their tales
Cry to me with a truthful, hungry woe,
That sounds in spite of all.

Just at this period a letter arrives from Sir Philip Lancaster, a man of immense wealth (Mr. Archer), who is desirous that Trafford should wed his daughter Julia (Miss Vandenhoff), in order that the riches with which she will be endowed may be properly shared. These are certainly pleasant terms to court a young lady upon, and so Trafford appears to think. Deverell immediately becomes most obsequious, as the prospects of his debtor appear to brighten, and Trafford starts upon his mission. In the succeeding act we find Julia Lancaster surrounded by suitors, who have come to be chosen, by Sir Philip's orders, as he tells his daughter he has called together

All that desire to win
Your love or gold. Proud Pembroke—Douglas Trafford—
Thy mincing flatterer, yonder—he that sings—
Mordaunt, the soldier—the grim miser, Seyle—
And flocks of meaner note—all craving. I
Proclaimed an open field, and there shall be,
I trow, no lack of champions.

JULIA (starting up).

How, sir! make
A market of your child?

The motive for this freak is not very clearly shown. However, the aspirants arrive, and are one by one rejected. Presently comes Francis Gage (Mr. Vining), a poor advocate, who presumes to enter the field upon the strength of having reined in Julia's frightened horse upon some former occasion. Gage is a poor lawyer, because he is an honest one. Trafford speaks of him as

The cunning man of law
'That 'pleaded 'gainst me when yon beggar won
Redress—'twas called so—for the means wherewith
I wrested from him what I thought my own!

SIR PHILIP.

Your name is—

GAGE.

Francis Gage.

TRAFFORD (half aloud).

Otherwise styled
"The beggar's advocate."

GAGE (turning).

You give me, sir,
A title of more honour, and a name
Greater than I inherit.

Gage pleads his cause to Julia, but without success; and is at last insulted by Trafford, who strikes him with his whip, which Gage wrests from him, and departs. He is then left alone with Julia, and, to his surprise, is rejected in the following speech:—

TRAFFORD (impatiently).

Sweet, no more delay—
Long have you known my heart.—In honesty,
I do believe thou'rt mine: therefore, at once
Speak me that gracious word which shall repay
The insults lately borne, yet unavenged,
Ev'n for thy sake.

JULIA.

I thank you, sir, for that,—
And, since repentance must be shown by prompt
Confession—I have loved you, cousin.

TRAFFORD.

Aye—

JULIA.

Aye!—Is that lover-like?——Well, to proceed—
Aye—so it is—or was; for, as I live,
I like not tavern brawls; nor much affect
Their company, who riot, drink, pervert
The darling ends of wisdom, and believe
Love's hallowed fabric based on filthy gold.
I will not be commanded,—yea, myself
Being proud, do, as the proud are ever wont,
Dislike my haughty peers. So, for these causes,
I will not be your wife. Storm if you will—
I fear you not. You have lost both whip and sword—
Or, being defenceless, I —— Weep, if you will—
There's grace in that—it were retributive—
For you and I have from a nobler heart
Drawn anguish, worse than tears. Cousin, farewell.
Get thee another riding-rod—and cease
Thy swaggering exploits in the hall of peace. (Exit JULIA.)

SCENE FROM THE NEW PLAY OF "HONESTY," AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

This blasts all Trafford's hopes of retrieving his condition, and he goes away breathing vengeance against Lancaster and his daughter.

We next find Gage and his brother Cyril (Miss Fitzjames) in a sorry abode, and nearly dying with hunger. Deverell arrives for some writings they have had to do for him; and finding that they are not finished, threatens to turn them out of doors for some little rent due, after churlishly treating Cyril. Pembroke, however, enters, and satisfies Deverell's demand, to his great amazement. But Pembroke has come to procure Gage's services as an advocate. Sir Philip Lancaster has been murdered and Pembroke wishes Francis to defend the murderer. He refuses, stating that he has been scorned and grown poor with shielding innocence, and cannot plead for an assassin. Pembroke reminds him that he is in his debt, which he shall press for unless he accepts the offer, whereupon, after a struggle, Gage says:—

'Tis a bargain. Now, sir, to your tale—
Out with it, quick. Shew me the ditch—the pool—
Where I must plunge these honest hands and wring
The filthy dregs. I an guilt's sworn brother. Come,
Shew't me, I say!

The murderer turns out to be Julia, Sir Philip's daughter, and she is found guilty upon trial, all the service that Gage can be to her, consisting in his demanding that she may avail herself of the ordeal of trial by battle, her accuser. Trafford, being the challenger. In the meantime, an Italian woman, Infelice, (Mrs. Brougham) whom Trafford had formerly seduced, returns to try and gain his affections once more:—

A gentle voice to our lost home
Recalls us: come away. Quit these dark scenes,
And seek once more the valley where we strayed
From morn, not blither than our own glad souls,
Till languid eve, when to our lattice-pane
The prating night-breeze stole, with kiss and hymn,
To chide our tireless talk. Cheerly—sweet life—
Come—we have both been wanderers—I, the first,
Have seen the peril of the way—and now
By honour's path—to truth—to peace—to love—
To calm in this poor world—and bliss beyond—
I woo the back.

(Trafford turns, deeply moved, and holds her by both arms apart.)

He rejects her, and she determines to be revenged. In the last scene, we have Smithfield prepared for the battle, and execution of Julia. Trafford challenges any comer, and this challenge is accepted by Gage. Infelice attends

MADAME CELESTE AS "MIAMI."

Trafford as a page; and directly before the combat gives him some wine to drink, which poisons him just as he begins to fight. He throws up his arms and falls exclaiming:—

I am slain—but not
By thee—The poison—Help! I die—

GAGE.

Confess—
Speak, thou unhappy—she is guiltless! Aye

TRAFFORD (hoarsely.)

Lift up my head . . . . I murdered Lancaster!

[Exit PEMBROKE.

And, with my steel glued to her snowy breast,
Prescribed that oath which—wretched fool! she kept Ev'n to the grasp of death . . . The page!—the page—
'Tis he hath done this . . . Seize him! Bring him near—
O fellow—tell me . . . what did I to thee?
What wrong hadst thou?—

[He raises himself with a sudden effort—gazes eagerly at her—and falls back dead.

INFELICE.

He knew me. It is good.
Now lead me where you will.

[She is led back.

Julia is immediately pardoned, and, as the curtain falls, she gives her hand to Gage.

It would be wrong to say that there are not traces of much poetic feeling in "Honesty." Some of the situations are conceived with dramatic power, and are very effective, but, as a whole, we cannot conceal the truth that it is an unsatisfactory production. The characters lack individuality. Mr Spicer says in his preface, that his aim has been less directed to fine writing, than to the development of as many varieties of character as the prescribed limits of a five act play will allow. Now this is a wrong plan to follow. Endless "varieties of character" may be given. One man may be extravagant, another jealous, a third hypochondriacal, and so on; but unless each in himself is drawn with sufficient power to stand boldly forth from the piece upon his characteristics, nothing is gained: on the contrary, the interest of the drama is much weakened. A little care would have improved the blank verse. It generally scans well, but has very frequently awkward words at the end of the lines, which mar its effect and euphony. However, we are by no means anxious to find fault. The play has passed the ordeal of a public representation, and amidst general applause. Whether it will be found sufficiently attractive to command full houses for many representations, remains to be proved.

The acting was excellent. Mr. Vandenhoff apologised for himself at the conclusion of the play, upon the ground of indisposition, but it was not needed. Miss Vandenhoff fully maintained the good opinion we formed of her in Antigone, and when she was called for at the end of the piece, was greeted by a shower of bouquets and long continued applause. The other ladies and gentlemen also exerted themselves in a most praiseworthy manner.

We must not omit to speak of the perfect manner in which "Honesty" has been put upon the stage. Every thing was in excellent taste, and the scenery, by Mr. Macfarren, very cleverly executed, especially in the last act.

Our illustration represents the last scene of Act III., in which Julia, as the murderess, has an interview with her advocate and lover, Francis Gage.

THE FRENCH PLAYS.

The season of these very attractive performances commenced on Monday, having been postponed from the preceding week, as first announced in the programme. The opening of the French theatrical campaign is, in the dramatic world, what the first primrose is in the natural one—the sign that winter is on the turn, and that preparations are being made to herald in the spring. The migratory birds of fashion collect together again—some from the Continent, others from provincial hybernacula, and others from living through the winter at the backs of their houses, that the blinds might be down, and the shutter-knobs papered in the front, to gain at least the credit of being out of town. Tho occupants of the boxes at the French plays no longer wish their attendance to remain a secret to the world on account of the unfashionable period, but swell the lists of the distinguished personages reported as having visited the performances during the week.

The opening of the St. James's Theatre is the avant courier of the Opera; and, simultaneously with it, the West-end begins to show signs of returning animation.

The house on Monday evening was excellently attended, every box being filled, and the other parts of the house showing few vacant places. Contrary to the usual custom of putting up some insignificant farce, supported by second-rate performers, to "play the audience in," M. Lafont, of the Variétés, and Mdlle. Nathalie both appeared in the first piece—a pleasant vaudeville, entitled, "Le Mari à la Ville et la Femme à la Campagne." The title of the play may suggest some of the incidents, which were exceedingly light, but sufficiently amusing to keep the audience in great good humour; at the same time it was admirably played throughout. The drama which followed, called "Pierre le Rouge," is exceedingly interesting, embracing three epochs—before, during, and after the Revolution; and in this the capabilities of the new performers were admirably developed. They at once established themselves as favourites, and were warmly applauded, being called for at the end of the piece. With respect to M. Lafont, however, it was rather a reappearance than a début. Some of our readers may remember to have seen him in the same piece at the Lyceum, some years back. Mdlle. Nathalei, as Jeanneton, made a decided impression on the audience She is a valuable actress.

The prospectus of the season looks well. Mr. Mitchell promises us many of our old favourites, including Achard, Madame Albert, and Mdlle. Plessy; together with Frederic Lemaitre, and M. Arnal. It is likewise stated that Alexander Dumas has written a comedy, expressly for the company, and will be over here to superintend its production,

The Engraving shows that scene of Pierre le Rouge, in which Pierre tears the unerited wreath from the head of Jeanneton.

ADELPHI.

The new drama of "The Green Bushes, or a Hundred Years ago" produced this week at the Adelphi, has quite brought about a revival of its glories, and adds another to the list of masterly productions for which this theatre is indebted to the talent of Mr. Buckstone. It possesses in an eminent degree all the qualities for which that dramatist is so distinguished—a naturally sustained interest, working through a series of the most dramatic incidents with the utmost lucidity and neatness of construction, abounding in coups de théatres, which, whilst they are of a striking description, bear a freshness about them which saves them from mere conventionality. The interest is spread over a period of three years, beginning from 1745, and the scene is chiefly in Ireland, although in the second act we are transported to the wilds of America.

The first act commences with an Irish fair, all the peasants being discovered before a whiskey booth, and amongst them we find Wild Murtogh (Mr. O. Smith), a gentleman desirous of bettering himself, and not particular about the means. He is at this moment the proprietor of a lucky bag and invites the peasants to take a dip. The first candidate for the prize is Nelly O'Neil (Mrs. Fitzwilliam), a smart little wench courted by all the lads, and telling long stories to Master George (Mr. Hudson), the Squire Connor O'Kennedy's brother, about losing Connors child, and finding it again through singing the old song of "The Green Bushes." She draws a prize, and all the rest, who draw blanks, vent their disappointment on Wild Murtogh, terminating the scene in a general row. We are then introduced into the house of Connor O'Kennedy (Mr. Selby), and find his wife Geraldine, (Mrs. Yates) pressing him not to mix himself further in the rebellion. Here, Nelly, who is Geraldine's foster-sister, comes in with a placard which she has torn off from a wall, offering a reward for Connor's head. No time is to be lost, and instant flight is determined on. We then witness an altercation between George Kennedy and Wild Murtogh, who have been in league together against Connor—one to obtain the price of his capture, the other his estate, but are now at odds, as George would prefer assisting his brother's flight. The last scene of the act is a barn, where the peasants are assembled for a dance, Wild Murtogh officiating as piper. The jigging is interrupted by the appearance of Connor and his wife, who have come to bid them farewell. The barn door is opened, and a boat appears on the water, into which Connor steps. At that moment a trap door springs open, and a party of soldiers concealed there by Murtogh's information, rush upon the rebel. His wife interposes her body before them, striking up the muskets levelled at him, and the boat moves off, a tableau being formed of the peasantry overpowering the soldiers.

In the second act the curtain rises on a hut near the borders of the Mississippi. It is inhabited by a strange couple: Miami, Madame Celeste, the wild huntress of the Mississippi, the orphan daughter of a French officer who married an Indian squaw—an extraordinary being, who has found a mate in the escaped rebel Connor, to whom she is passionately devoted. Connor is no less fascinated by this strange creature, half savage and half civilised; but is occasionally tormented with the bitter remembrance of the wife and the child he has left at home. At last, as he is left alone, remorsefully pondering, for the hundredth time, over a letter from his wife, a figure, pale and faltering, appears on the bridge that crosses to the entrance of his hut. It is Geraldine, who has crossed the Atlantic after her husband, and wandered in search of him. Connor is overwhelmed at the meeting; joy at seeing his wife again, and dread for the consequences of her appearance distract him. Suddenly, whilst she is in his arms, Miami appears on the bridge, starts at the sight, and then stands fixed, her eyes riveted on the couple like a tigress watching her prey. They move, Connor leading his wife to a place of concealment, and Miami follows in the track bursting with fierce jealousy. At last, overpowered by it, she levels her rifle at Connor, and as he is embracing his wife the bullet pierces his breast. A shriek follows, and Geraldine rushes to the spot where Miami is, and, ignorant that she did the deed, entreats her to come to Connor's assistance. Miami is thus dragged to witness the dying agonies of her faithless companion, and when he has breathed his last, she mounts a rock and throws herself into the stream—the scene being on the banks of the Mississippi, which is illuminated by the ruddy glare of the setting sun. Just after her plunge, a raft, bearing a party of French officers to their homeward-bound ship, appears, and they are seen to raise the body of Miami from the water, the curtain descending on the tableau.

The third act brings us back again to Ireland, where George Kennedy is endeavouring, by proof of his brother's death, to take possession of the estate; having, by the assistance of Murtogh, got rid of his little child, Eveleen, left to the care of Nelly, who, on her side, is nearly driven distracted by the loss, and, remembering how she found the child by the same means, is wandering about the country, singing "The Green Bushes." Miami has been to France, and inherited an estate. She appears now in Ireland, in civilised habits, having vowed to make all reparation for her deed of vengeance. By good fortune, she discovers Connor's child in the care of a blacksmith, and immediately takes it under her protection. Geraldine, too, has returned to Ireland, and meets with her sister as she is pursuing her search for the lost child.

At last all meet—Nelly's plan succeeds, and it leads her to Miami's presence. George Kennedy repents his misdeeds, and Miami gives up all her property to the little child, after which she dies broken hearted. We have omitted to refer to the comic portion of the drama, which was entrusted to Messrs. Wright and Bedford. The former is the master of a show, travelling in America in search of natural curiosities, and the other a Jack Tar, who assists the views of his friend by enticing the affections of a real squaw, with whom they make their departure, not without a fearful encounter with some Indians.

The piece from beginning to end was admirably put upon the stage, and as admirably acted: there was not a part but was done the fullest justice to Were we to detail the merits of each, we should exceed all limits: let us mention one only, as having more than usually distinguished himself—Mr. Selby, who, in the part of Connor, was impressive without effort, and quiet, yet conveying the full effect of every situation. The music was also very effective. A duet, delightfully sung by Mrs. Fitzwilliam and Hudson, was encored the first night. Great praise is also due to Mr. Mellon for his melodramatic music; it is of a far higher order than such occasions usually call forth, and did much to enhance the poetry of many of the effects. "The Green Bushes" is, in short, a thorough hit, and will run, and what is more, draw, for many nights.

Our Illustration represents the closing scene of this deservedly successful drama.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The taste of the public palate is in such constant rage for novelty, that any change for a time is found to be acceptable. Nevertheless Mr. Lumley seems to think that "toujours perdrix" will form a good bill of fare, and consequently secures the best dishes of the old table d'hote. It is true he has added some entremets but the standing dishes remain the same. We have lately given some announcements of the novelties and changes; and our recent information enables us to state that the approaching season will be as attractive as any which has preceded it. In lieu of the list of dramatis personæ which have already appeared in many contemporary prints, we subjoin the following from a correspondent.

EXTEMPORE, ON THE APPROACHING OPENING OF THE ITALIAN OPERA.

Another season of sweet song and dance,
From sunny Italy and merry France,
Is now prepar'd to dawn upon us, and
Shed its Art-sunbeams on our happy land.
Land, happy to receive as to bestow,
The industries of Genius—and to know
That intellect is not to clime confin'd,
But has a range o'er earth with various mind!
'Tis said the muses love at large to roam,
But if they ever settled in a home
It must be here—where all things so combine
To give a welcome to the Tuneful Nine!

LYCEUM.

A laughable little farce, adapted by Mr. Wigan from a French vaudeville, "Une Passion," was successfully produced at this house on Monday evening, under the name of "A Model of a Wife." The plot is too flimsy to analyse, turning upon the love inspired in the breast of a foreign gentleman by an artist's dummy, seen in the opposite house, where resides Mr. Stump (Mr. F. Matthews), a jealous drawing-master with a young wife (Miss Walcot), whom he supposes to be the object of the foreigner's passion. Clara (Miss Farebrother), his niece, at last prevents all unpleasantry by dressing herself in the dummy's clothes, and herself gaining the affections of the enamoured gentleman.

This is all very slight, but it kept the audience laughing heartily from beginning to end, and the applause at the conclusion was general. Every character was famously played; especially the foreign gentleman, Mr. Pygmalion Bonnefoi, by Mr. Wigan, who gave us another of his inimitable impersonations of Frenchmen.

The arrangements between the Keeleys and the proprietors of the Lyceum have been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. Messrs. Strutt and Keeley take the theatre on for three years from Easter; and during the recess, it will be entirely cleansed and redecorated. Considerable improvements are also spoken of in the auditory.

STRAND.

This little theatre is still bravely weathering the powerful opposition on all sides: and the manager and his compact band of actors are deserving of every encouragement. Mr. Leman Rede's drama of "Jack in the Water" has been played during the week, in which Mr. Wild has been giving his effective representation of one of the lower classes in this metropolis. No author can draw a type from the humbler orders so well as Mr. Leman Rede, and his pieces have an excellent moral. "Monseigneur" is running its second week; and, to judge from their applause, greatly to the satisfaction of the audience. A light farce or burlesque concludes the programme of the evening's entertainments, and sends every body away merry and gratified Several novelties are underlined, showing that Mr. Roberts is indefatigable in his exertions to provide fresh amusement for the patrons of this establishment.

SURREY.

A novelty of a somewhat superior character was produced with perfect success at this theatre on Monday evening. It is an historical three act play, entitled, "Cardinal Wolsey; or, the Secret Witness;" and its plot, language, and dramatic incidents are highly creditable to the author, Mr. J. Smith. The play is founded on an episode in the life of "the great Lord Cardinal." Walter (Mr. Hicks), a favourite of the Cardinal's, is in love with Margaret de Mandeville (Mrs. R. Honner), niece of Sir J. de Mandeville (Mr. Heslop). Margaret returns this love, but Sir J. de Mandeville, having exhausted his own fortune, is resolved to marry his niece to secure her possessions. His son (Mrs. H. Vining), is secretly in love with Margaret, and warns her of the intention and perfidy of his father. Adam, an Italian physician (Mr. Neville), and agent of Sir J. de Mandeville, counsels his patron to poison his niece, who is also his ward, if she refuse his hand, and by so doing, at all events, to secure her inheritance. The poison is swallowed by Henry de Mandeville, and the guilty father finds that a murder has been committed and no object gained. The swallowing of the poison by Henry has been witnessed by the Cardinal, who in the disguise of a friar has obtained entrance to the house of Mandeville. Adam then incites Mandeville to accuse Margaret of having prepared the poison and given it to his son, so that, in the event of her condemnation, he may succeed to her estates. He does accuse her. She is tried and condemned for the murder, and is about to be led to execution, when Wolsey appears, gives evidence as to the real facts of the case, rescues the lady, and procures the merited punishment of the guilty confederates. The part of Wolsey was played by Mr. H. Hughes with good effect, and Mrs. Honner as the heroine was entitled to high praise. The other performers exerted themselves very successfully; and the enthusiastic reception is creditable to the Surrey audience. It was well put upon the stage, with new scenery, dresses, and appointments, in appropriate taste.

MUSIC.

MADAME DULCKEN'S SOIREE MUSICALE.

On Wednesday evening this distinguished pianiste gave the first of three classical chamber concerts, at her residence, in Harley-street, to a numerous and highly respectable company. To us, no class of concerted pieces yields so high a pleasure as that in which the several parts are confined to a single instrument—there are no imperfect unisons to offend the ear—no anachronisms in the delicate passages; there is an absence of that confusion which, to a certain extent, prevails even in the best orchestras during the execution of rapid and elaborate movements—we can individualise the performers. We went to this concert with high expectations, and were not disappointed. The first part opened with Mozart's quartuor in D, most exquisitely performed by Messrs. Willy, Goffrie, Loder, Hill and Lucas; this was followed by Cherubini's aria "O Salutaris Hostia," well sung by Miss Sarah Flower, but with scarcely sufficient feeling. Hummel's quintuor for piano-forte, violin, tenor, violoncello, and double-bass, a composition of the very first character, was executed by Madame Dulcken, Messrs. Goffrie, Hill, Lucas and Howell, in a manner that left nothing to be desired. A duet by Mendelsohn, "I would that my love," was very sweetly sung by the Misses Williams; and the first part concluded with Weber's Grand Sonata in D minor. This, as a specimen of piano-forte playing, was perfect. Madame Dulcken displayed in its execution extraordinary brilliancy and power, alternating with the most exquisite delicacy and finish. Notwithstanding its great variety and richness of modulation, this sonata requires extraordinary capabilities in the player to render it effective.

The second part opened with Beethoven's grand concert in C minor, for the pianoforte, with full orchestral accompaniments. This was a new feature in these soirées, and Madame Dulcken handled the giant of music as none but herself, that we have heard, can handle him. The general effect, however, was marred by the smallness of the room.

In the programme, Madame Dulcken announces this series of concerts as the last it is her intention to give. We sincerely hope that the amateurs of music will show such an appreciation of her talents, and those of her coadjutors, as will suffice to alter that determination.

MUSICAL MONOLOGUES.

This species of entertainment has risen to a kind of mania on the part of the public. It is, no doubt, in the hands of a clever locutor and vocalist, a very amusing [illegible] of hearing over again what we had heard a thousand times before: [illegible]tedious is a twice told tale after all, and he must be a very "well graci'd actor" who can succeed in attracting our attention. Mr. Lover has commenced his hebdomadal performances (to be repeated on every Monday evening) in his usual felicitous manner. Mr. Ransford, a new candidate for "individual distinction," has been favouring us with a Zingarese Rhapsody, or Lecture upon Gipsies, interspersed with songs, &c. Since George Stevens lectured on Heads, and Dibdin gave his vocal entertainments, few have had the hardihood to encounter an audience single handed till the time of Mathews. After his time the custom fell into desuetude for some years, when Wilson, the vocalist, originated an entertainment as instructive as amusive, which proved to be so popular, that we may say, every one which followed it was a parody ad captandum vulgus. There is, nevertheless, much amusement and instruction to be derived from this species of entertainment; and while we deplore the rapid decline of THE DRAMA, the picture—nay, the historical picture of life—we cannot withhold our applause from the generality of what we have presumed to designate "Musical Monologues."

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

We regret to announce the death of Miss Julia Cruise, which took place at Cookstown-cottage, Ennesdery, near Dublin, on Sunday week, after a long and severe illness. Miss Cruise was an actress of great talent, and for several seasons occupied a high position in public estimation in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dublin.

BALFE.—This talented composer has happily recovered from a severe attack of the small-pox. He will, no doubt, as soon as his health will permit, resume his industrious composition.

MONSTER CONCERT.—The first of this series for the season will take place on Monday next, at Covent Garden Theatre.

SIR HENRY BISHOP.—All lovers of music will rejoice to learn that there is a chance of hearing something new from the hands (or rather brain) of this distinguished composer. We have been told that a new opera by him will shortly appear at the Princess' Theatre.

PARIS FASHIONS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

At this epoch, when pleasures are so rife in Paris, and when all the luxury and resources of that capricious deity, La Mode, whose frowns or smiles are studied with such intense interest by our belles, are brought forth, I cannot do better than to give you some account of novelties which are, at this moment especially, of such deep interest to your fair countrywomen. The balls, réunions, concerts, and theatricals, at the Court, the Embassies and the Prefecture, give occasion for the production of every variety of evening costume, from the toilette de petite comité to the toilette de bal, and who knows so well as a Parisian élégante how to adapt her dress to the exigencies of every occasion! So numerous are the novelties brought forth every day, that it is most difficult to choose from amongst them. I will endeavour to collect, however, all my freshest reminiscences, all that I have gathered in the balls I have visited with an observant eye, and all that I have learnt from some of the fairest leaders of fashion here, and to select what is most worthy of the attention of those belles Anglaises, who are now, I suppose, so anxiously revolving the important question, "What are the dresses to be fixed upon for the gaieties of the coming season?"

Never has the evening dress of young unmarried ladies surpassed in elegance, and, at the same time, in simplicity, what it is this season. White is almost universally worn, and in the most aerial textures. The lightness of the material takes off from the strange appearance that would otherwise be offered by their excessive amplitude. Never was so much material used in dresses as now; and the one or two tunics which are de rigueur, add to the vapoury appearance of the whole. The tunics, no longer weighed down by garlands surrounding the hem, float in the air, the long sashes completing the effect. Bouquets of flowers dispersed here and there over the front and sides of the dress, have a charming effect. The bodies of these dresses are usually made quite tight, with very long points; a berthe of gauze or lace surrounds the the top of the dress, which now covers the shoulders more than formerly; the sleeves are worn very short and tight. The charming costume of Mdlle. de B., at the last ball of the Duke de Nemours, may serve as a model for the toilette of a young unmarried lady. Her dress was in plain white crape, the two sides of the skirt ornamented by bouquets of roses, placed at regular intervals, and diminishing in size as they approached the waist. The body was made in folds, gathered in towards the waist, and terminating in a very long point. A single rose fastened the folds in front, and another rose ornamented each of the short sleeves. In her hair, dressed in ringlets (which, you know, have here the name of Anglaises), was likewise a single rose, placed above the curls.

I will give you a description of another toilette, in contrast to this, also in the highest vogue, and also worn by a young lady, Mdlle. de T., at the ball of the Bavarian Embassy. Her dress was composed of a skirt of jonquil-coloured satin, with a short tunic of tulle of the same colour. The tunic was trimmed with fifteen rows of very narrow satin ribbon (which are here called comettes), in the same colour. The under skirt was trimmed with a deep puffing of white tulle, which was confined at intervals, by rolls of the same satin as the dress. The fine black hair of the lovely wearer was dressed in bandeaux—the colour of the dress giving additional brilliancy to her appearance, and confirming the maxim so long established amongst the laws of dress, that "Le jaune est la fard des brunes." This costume, though of charming effect, belongs, however, rather to the class of dresses worn by young married ladies—you know that in Paris, in this respect, the laws of toilette are much more rigorous than with you, the distinction between the jeune personne and the jeune femme mariée being always strongly marked; not however to the disadvantage of the latter, for whom are reserved the contrast and effect of darker, more sombre, but often more becoming material—above all, that most exquisite of dresses—black velvet. Velvet dresses in all colours are, however, more than ever worn I saw the other day one which is likely to surpass all its competitors. It was in ruby coloured velvet, opening over a skirt of white satin, richly embroidered in silver; the opening of the velvet skirt fastened at intervals by tassels of pearls; the body of the dress opening en cœur in front and behind as far as the waist, and disclosing likewise a white satin corsage underneath, embroidered also in silver. One of those head dresses called petits bords completed this toilette. It was made in white velvet, with a tuft of feathers of the same colour as the dress, and caught up on the other side by a pearl tassel. This brilliant ensemble was destined to be worn by one of our most distinguished élégantes, the beautiful Countess L——, at the ball of the Duke de Nemours next Saturday, and I must remind you, that nothing can be too rich or gorgeous in costume for the fashion of the present moment. The dress of her friend, the handsome Madame de N——, mother of the young and well-known dancer of the mazurka, will be composed of moire d'orient, trimmed with flounces of English lace, forming en tablier in front; at each extremity of the flounces large round bows of pink satin ribbon, en choux with short ends, edged by a slight silk fringe. The body trimmed with a berthe in English lace, engageants in the same lace, surrounding the sleeves and fastened at the side by similar choux of ribbon. I cannot resist giving you a last description of the toilette of our fair and noble English visitor, the Marchioness of A——, at the private theatricals of the English Embassy the other night. It was in gros des Indes of a grey ash-colour, trimmed up the skirt with 14 rows of silver chefs, diminishing in breadth towards the waist. The body, extremely pointed, was surrounded at the waist by a band of the same silk cut in scollops, and forming a sort of narrow kirtle round the waist. The short sleeves were composed of three little puffings of the silk, separated by narrow silver chefs. Her head dress consisted of white feathers and pearls. This costume excited universal admiration.

The favourite mode of dressing the hair for young ladies is in Bandeaux, although the Anglaises still boast some favour. But, fortunately for good taste and beauty, the fashion of wearing bands advancing very much on the cheek, and contracting the face, is past. They are now rather drawn away from the face; all the hair gathered up together at the back, and plaited, forms a sort of crown, which is also worn higher than formerly; the flowers, instead of being—as they were even last year—brought quite to the front of the face, are now placed backwards, behind the ear; the whole effect being infinitely more simple, more natural, and more classical. The same unity of fashion does not prevail in the head-dresses of married ladies. At the ball of the Liste Civile, a display of Coiffures of the most varied forms might be observed,—the distinguished ladies who patronise these balls, being forbidden by etiquette, however young and graceful, from dancing, and therefore adopting the more matronly forms of dress. The Princess de Razoumowska chose a Petit Bord, looped up by a tassel of pearls, and ornamented with a plume of feathers. The Duchess de Chevreuse, an Algerian turban, in white crèpe lisse, trimmed with chefs and fringe of gold. The Countess de St. Aldegonde, a Resille, in ponceau silk, with golden beads. The Countess Patocka, a Mary Stuart, in blue velvet, edged with a row of diamonds. These head-dresses have a charming effect, and are of the newest and latest vogue. I wish I could enumerate a thousand other novelties, which, however, at present time will not allow me to do. You may rely upon those I have sent you as warranted by the sanction of the most distinguished leaders of la mode.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

DEATH OF A VETERAN.—On Tuesday last Samuel Shergold, one of the partakers of Nelson's glorious victories, died at Southampton, aged 82. The old tar was 25 years in the Royal Navy prior to 1814, in which year he was paid off from the Royal George, at Plymouth. During that period he served under Nelson in no less than 14 actions. For the last five years he had been bed-ridden.

THE MARINES.—The following is now the strength of the corps of the Royal Marines:—94 divisional companies, each company consisting of 1 captain, 2 subalterns, 5 sergeants, 5 corporals, 3 drummers, and 87 privates —total 103. Five Artillery companies, each company of 1 captain, 4 subalterns, 7 sergeants, 7 corporals, 3 bombardiers, 3 drummers, and 120 gunners —total 145. The whole establishment being, divisional companies, 9682; artillery, 725; staff, 62—total 10,469.

SALE OF THE EFFECTS OF THE LATE PRINCESS SOPHIA OF GLOUCESTER.—The sale of the effects of her late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia of Gloucester commenced on Wednesday, at Chesterfield-house, the residence of the late lamented Princess. Most of the furniture, greenhouse plants, &c., had been withdrawn from the sale about a week since, and the residue, consisting of services of china and glass, bijouterie, articles of vertù, books engravings, plate, &c., and a small cellar of choice wines, were amongst the articles offered for public competition. It was expected that there would be an unusual degree of competition, her late Royal Highness, from her many and estimable virtues, being held in the highest esteem whilst living, and as deeply deplored now dead. Considerable competition was excited, and most of the articles disposed of fetched a very high price. Lot 354 was a very handsome dessert service, which was knocked down to a gentleman residing in Greenwich for £25. The next lot, 355, was also a dessert service, which was put up at £15, and was eventually knocked down for £40. Lot 440 was a very splendid winged cabinet, formed of pollard oak, a present to her late Royal Highness by her late Majesty Queen Charlotte. This was a splendid piece of workmanship, being inlaid with ebony; it was bought, we understand, for a nobleman at £16 5s. Lot 470 was a cup and saucer of very rare old Sèvres china, and fetched the price of £3 17s. 6d. The cellar of wines of the very choicest quality realised excellent prices. The last lot of the day worth any particular notice was No. 471, being a pair of Sèvres vases, a present from his Majesty Louis Philippe on his recent visit, bearing the French crown and Royal initials. It was knocked down at the sum of 47 guineas. The day's sale realised upwards of £800.

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES OF THE WEEK.

How do those journals which are supposed to live all upon fun—to move, breathe, and have their being in a rarified atmosphere of laughter—how do they exist now? Their editors truly must dig the earth for jokes—for, indeed, there are but few upon the face of it. Society has become a humdrum, and the world will soon have to run round itself in search of a jest. This, indeed, is a horrid consummation for civilized creation to be brought to—no merry hearts—no sounding laughter—no revelry, no devilry—no cakes and ale—not hot ginger in the mouth. Tut! tut!—we must look about us. The week may have seemed a dull unconsionable week, but there must be some food for gaiety under its cloak of gloom! Come—come—O week! doff this solemnity of yours—spread out your desart of newspapers and show us the green spots. Fork out your gaieties as well as your gravities—trot out your Thalia as well as your Melpomene.

F—unnily, funnily, ride we on,
E—ver with mirthful smile,
B—rewing some sport for crowd and court,
R—oystering glad the while!
U—nto Despair we'll toss old Care—
A— fig for his face of gloom!
R—ide we away, with a visage gay—
Y—outh turns aside from the tomb!

And rather betakes itself about this time to think of Valentines. At all events, the week has brought us over the threshold of a new month; and, if we are not mistaken, we have been unconsciously singing an Acrostic upon February! Who were the three persons who (talking of acrostics) gave three different reasons for preferring the beginning, middle, or end of this month—according to its orthographical division rather than for its meteorological influence? The lawyer liked the beginning of it, because it was a Fee—the maltster the middle, because it was redolent of a Brew—and the poor prisoner the end of it, because it was Airy!

But to get back again to the week. Foreign politics have still been the political absorption—and of these we have lacked not. Gods! how the French Opposition have strained their nerves and backs in abusing we Britishers! Tahiti—nothing but Tahiti—the everlasting thorn! the one gnat on the nose of the modern regime—the only trunk its elephant is allowed to carry! You see it has rather provoked our neighbours [à non lucendo—neighbours most unneighbourly]—that Lord Aberdeen should have given the Tahiti missionary a consulate appointment in another bunch of islands. This, with his compensation of a thousand pounds [say a thousand!] is to make him too happy. This sets the Frenchman au bout de son Latin! What! he exclaims, "Dis Monsieur Preach-hard [so he pronounces the name of the missionary—with the same felicity of accident for satirical purposes as that which "punned down" Wellington into Vilain-ton."] dis Preach-hard preach too hard already—and Lord Aberdeen, just to insult la gloire de la France, make him Consul, and send him vere he vill preach harder dan ever!" Which for the Frenchman's honour we throw into an epigram.

Preach-hard comes home from being cooked,
And shut in Bruat's larder;
Preach-hard goes out well paid and booked
For preaching all the harder!

But now really the incident was altogether so trifling—so wanton on al sides, as we think—that it is quite monstrous to reflect upon the possibility of such a mere social and diplomatic conventionality, plunging Europe into a war! Blood—endless streams of blood, perhaps, to flow from such a petty quarrel!

Yet for this have the French Opposition been fighting tooth and nail—the whole existence of the Ministry has hung upon the question. Guizot has had days of difficulty and nights of unrest; the correspondents of the morning newspapers have been perched upon a sort of electric qui vive—two, and even three expresses a day have been extorted from their zeal and assiduity; courier has ridden after courier—whip has followed upon spur—and Thiers, with the sarcasm of a foe—the force of an assailant—the indignation of a patriot, and the horror of a Frenchman in the hysterics of imaginary insult—has actually threatened France, or Paris—which is the same—with all the terrors of a "Pritchard Revolution."

Eh! par example! what then. Mon dieu! what a sequitur!

All our friendly relations disturbed! Ah! ah! Quoi! No more Windsor Castle for Louis Philippe! no more Chateau d'Eu for Victoria! no more fromage de Cheshire, or Biere de Guinness upon the batteries of Treport! no blandishments for the "Sours!" no snuff-boxes for the Suites! no cordial celebration of Royal internationality by the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS and l'Illustration! oh! oh! Monsieur Thiers what did you contemplate? what were you about!

Well, but the Ministry really oscillated over Mr. Pritchard, first a majority of twenty-four set them upon their pedestal, then a dwindling and disputed horreur of eight took them off it, then the Thiers party raised the shout of "a dead ministry!" and then because the belief in their vitality had ceased, they were enabled to carry the whole Address, Pritchard, Clause, and all, by a majority of ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY THREE!

Here was the Address of one side, and the Mal-address of the other, with a vengeance; but what gambling chances!—what absurd trifling with national destinies!—how fraught with all the miserable elements of ridicule and contempt!

We hope, however, and we believe, that the Guizot Ministry will stand. It is the best for both countries, for it is the Ministry of peace.

Spain has been, as usual, dabbling her hands in blood. Zurbano has been taken, and shot in the back. He died stoically; and, according to the usual process of Spanish justice, he was, of course, executed before trial! Executions after trial, it would appear, are not popular, for Prim, who, being known to be innocent, was tried, and found guilty, has been pardoned! Everybody connected with Zurbano has been served the same way as their relation; and after settling the general and his friends, it is almost a marvel, and seems inconsistent with Spanish vengeance, that they did not turn out a regiment to shoot his luggage! or, perhaps, if he had a dog, or a monkey, like Zea Bermudez! But Narvaez drinks no blood short of human; he would give the monkey to the Queen!

The Americans, and Texans, and Mexicans are all at it. There is the very Soul of Shindy abroad!

* * * * * *

What is Doctor M'Hale, Archbishop of Tuam, about? He has come out in a perfect fury—he is going to Catholicize England—meanwhile the Evening Mail is pelting the Catholic Bequests Bill with the Oath of Supremacy. The Conciliation Hall is, as usual, the Den of Lions—Dan is in it quite unharmed; while upon the subject of Repeal the roaring is infinite. Doctor Nagle, as an enthusiastic agitator, has betrayed some anxiety about his salary—two guineas a week. There are also rumours of the formation of a secret society for the assassination of the Retrenchment Committee!

Sir James Graham has got enough to do with his medical business. He is not, however, the best M.D. in the world, or he would have felt the national pulse to better purpose. The people do not like to take their salts from a senna-tor like Sir James. They prefer Epsom another way. However, at one public meeting they resolved to send him a whole petition at a dose, and to send it through the Post-office, because then he would be sure to receive it. These medical wits probe as deeply as their lancets. They go to work very Wide-a-Wakley!

So there is a new Judge.

Before they made an Earl a Judge,
Not Judge an Earl! now pat,
They give a bundle of this nice
Judicial straw to Platt!

Well, Platt or Twist, 'tis all the same
When once the game they are on;
For, bless us! he was barren once,
And now they've made him Baron!

Furthermore, the defunct Bankrupt Commissioner is succeeded by a Shepherd! It is to be hoped there will not be too many sheepish debtors to flock to his Court! What will be the chief duty of the clerks under a Shepherd? To mend their pens!

Talking of debtors, there is a capital joke out of the Insolvent Court—a rare piece of unaccustomed pleasantry. An actor from Astley's went up for his discharge and got it. He had been a benevolent good fellow in his time, and had taken a boy for whom he had a liking, educated him, not only well for any line of life—but made him an especially excellent juvenile equestrian. Nay, he had, as le petit Andre, acquired a celebrity—and was now in Paris. The opposing creditors—learning that there was property in the lad—that is, in the talent and popularity he had acquired through the insolvent—came into court to know whether it could'nt order the boy to be given up!

There, that is at least a gaiety of rare device, and we leave off with it rather than get out of temper over some less entertaining theme.

IRELAND.

AFFRAY AND LOSS OF LIFE.

A desperate conflict, attended with loss of life, took place near Killaloe, on Thursday week. Captain Cole's company of the 15th Regiment is there stationed, and it appears four of the soldiers accepted an invitation from a few of the townspeople to a night's party on the river, with the intention of amusing themselves by moonlight fishing.

Previous to going on the water the company rambled as far as Clanfadda, about a mile and a half from Killaloe, where they agreed upon taking supper on a small island, which they intended visiting, known by the name of Friar's Castle.

Being a little elevated from liquor, they made free with a couple of geese belonging to a farmer named Gleeson, which they carried away to their boat, and embarked for the island. Soon after, the owner missed his fowl, and, having traced their route, immediately repaired to Killaloe, where he gave information of what had taken place to the police, only two of whom, subconstables Brophy and Callaghan, were at the barrack, the remainder of the party being at the time on patrole.

A boat having been procured, the two policemen accompanied Gleeson to the island, where they found the soldiers and their friends enjoying themselves, and they had by that time kindled a fire under the pot for supper. Gleeson was directed by the police to look for his geese, but while he was in the act of doing so he was struck by one of the party and knocked down. Sub-constable Brophy remonstrated, and the party instantly turned on him and his comrade, knocked them both down, and one of the soldiers unscrewed the bayonet off Callaghan's carbine, and with it stabbed him in the body, until he lay for dead. Brophy received two bayonet wounds, from the effects of which he, too, fell; but, watching an opportunity, again raised himself from the ground, and, though writhing with pain, grasping the carbine which lay by his side, he discharged it in the direction of his antagonists, one of whom, a young man, named John Ellis, fell dead, the ball having passed through his neck. Before he fired his ramrod was drawn from his carbine by the party, thrust into his mouth, and forced out at the back of his neck. The policeman reloaded, fired again, and, it is said, the shot took effect, as one of the party, name Malone, is missing, supposed to have fallen into the river when he received the shot.

While this dreadful affray was going on Gleeson had escaped from the island, but soon returned with a strong police party from Ballina and Killaloe, who made prisoners of the four soldiers and William and Joseph Ellis, brothers of the deceased. The military also recived bayonet wounds in the desperate conflict with the police. The life of sub-constable Callaghan is despaired of. The prisoners and wounded policemen were soon after taken to the police barrack, and subsequently the body of Ellis, to await the coroner's inquest.

The names of the soldiers under arrest are Edward Barrow, Thomas Moore, Edward Greene, and Thomas Wethers, the latter known in the 15th as "the Manchester Pugilist."

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—Last Monday's sitting was a very uninteresting one. Mr. O'Connell apologised for not being ready with the report of the committee on the question whether the Repeal members ought to attend in Parliament this Session, and moved that another week be allowed to the Committee, which was agreed to. The learned gentleman then spoke shortly, but very confidently, in favour of Repeal. The rent for the week was £257 only.

The University of Dublin have conferred on Mr. Emerson Tennent, M.P., the degree of Doctor of Laws.

Lord Rosse is elected a Representative Peer of Ireland.

Mr. James Daly, formerly M.P. for Galway, is about to be elevated to a peerage, by the style and title of Dunsandle. Mr. Daly is brother to the Bishop of Cashel.

INDICATIONS OF SPRING.—A Dublin correspondent, referring to a paragraph in last week's paper giving indications of spring in Devonshire, says: "In the parish of Finglas, county of Dublin, primroses are to be found in numbers, in the same state of bloom, and one gentleman has already a goodly number of hands employed in planting potatoes."

ANOTHER MURDER.—A letter from Shinrone, dated Monday, says:—"Yesterday (Sunday) a Protestant schoolmaster, named James, was barbarously murdered near this town, by three demons in human form. James is said to have defended himself with great perseverance, wounding one of his assailants, whose blood was traced into an adjoining wood."

FATAL ACCIDENT AT LIMERICK.—Last Sunday night an accident of a very serious character occurred in Limerick. The corpse of a woman named Mary Shaughnessy, who died the same day, was being waked in the attic story of an old house in the Abbey, where the friends of deceased had assembled in numbers, when suddenly the floor gave way and came down with a tremendous crash, bridging with it the other floors of the house, and burying over thirty poor creatures in the ruins! Assistance being procured, with much difficulty the rubbish was cleared away, and the dead bodies of nine human beings were taken from beneath. Two others expired while being conveyed to the hospital, to which institution the killed, dying, and injured, were brought. The Rev. J. Braham, parish priest of St. Mary's; the Rev. J. Quinn, parish-priest of St. John's; the Rev. Mr. Bourke, the Rev. Mr. Egan, and the Rev. Mr. Mackay, were in attendance on the poor sufferers, and administered to them the rites of their religion. There are seventeen persons in the hospital badly wounded. The lamentations of the friends and relatives of the unfortunate people were very affecting. The Mayor, Mr. Crips, Colonel Maunsell, and all the medical profession, were in attendance on the sufferers. Four of the dead bodies have not yet been recognised or claimed, and consequently the names are not known. The following are among the victims:—Honora Murphy, Catherine Haneen, James Lynch, Catherine Madden, Mary Molony, James Enright. Badly injured and limbs broken:—George Mason, Alicia Grady, Margaret Halloran, Margaret Jourdon, Rachael Connell, Margaret Enright, Margaret Lee, Mary Barlow, Bridget Kennedy, Ellen Fitzgerald, Catherine Jourdon, Eliza Jourdon, Mary Hayes, Catherine Barlow, Catherine Enright, Thomas Kenny, John Kennedy, Patrick Jourdon, and James Halloran. Several others were slightly wounded, but sent out of the hospital after being dressed.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

MURDER OF A YOUNG WOMAN AT BETHNAL-GREEN.

There was on Tuesday a good deal of excitement in Bethnal-green, in consequence of a rumour that a young woman named Emma Whiter, 21 years of age, had been shot dead with a pistol, by a young man named James Tapping, who had for some time past been paying her his addresses; and from a very early hour in the morning the vicinity of the police court, at which the case was expected to undergo investigation, was densely thronged.

Shortly before one o'clock the accused was brought up in a cab, in the custody of Sergeants Shaw and Backhouse, of the K division, and was placed at the bar of WORSHIP-STREET, before Mr. Bingham, to answer the charge. The prisoner, who is a fine young man, about 23 years of age, upon entering the dock, which he did with a firm step, looked around him with a placid expression of countenance, and did not appear at all affected by the critical position in which he was placed.

The following witnesses were then called, and examined in support of the charge:—

Thomas Auvache, a weaver, living in Manchester-street, Waterloo-town, Bethnal-green, stated that at a quarter before one o'clock that morning he was passing down a turning leading from Sebright-street to South Conduit-street, Bethnal-green, in company with a friend of his named Harvey, when he observed a smouldering fire, resembling lighted tinder, at the foot of a brick wall belonging to one of the houses. He instantly proceeded to the spot, when he discovered a young woman lying on her left side, with her head resting against the wall. On looking closely at her, he observed that her face and person were deluged with blood, which was flowing from a wound in her neck, and she was apparently lifeless. Witness raised her from the ground and supported her in his arms, while Mr. Harvey ran to the top of the street, at which two men were standing, to entreat their assistance for the dying woman. Witness then placed his hands beneath the arms of the young woman to further raise her, when he distinctly felt her heart beat, or rather heave, as though she were in convulsions; the heaving ceased, and she dropped her head in a state of insensibility upon the witness's shoulder, and although he thought he saw her once open her eyes, she did not utter a word, and on the return of Mr. Harvey, they together carried her beneath a gas lamp, the part of the street where she was found being very dark, that they might have greater facility for rendering her assistance. A policeman having now arrived and looked at the injured woman, he instantly pronounced her to be dead, and she was as quickly as possible conveyed to the Duke of Gloucester public-house adjoining, where a shutter was procured, on which she was removed to the London Hospital. In answer to a question from the magistrate, the witness added that the smouldering fire he observed when his attention was attracted to the deceased was one of the poor creature's bonnet-strings burning like a slow-match.

Sergeant Backhouse, 37 K, examined the spot where the young woman had been found by the first witness, and discovered a large pool of blood extending three yards in length down the pavement, in the midst of which he found a woman's patten, about eight or nine inches further on another patten, and about twelve inches beyond that a large-sized and well-finished pocket-pistol, with percussion lock, the hammer of which was down, and which had evidently been but very recently discharged, as it smelt very strongly of powder. About half-past two in the morning witness first saw the prisoner in the police-station; he had then on, over the dress he now wore, a white apron, upon the right side of which Sergeant Shaw and the witness observed several spots of blood. On being called upon to furnish an explanation of these appearances, the prisoner replied, "Oh, I didn't know that there were any spots of blood upon it, and if there are, I can't account for them." [The witness here produced the pistol, the two pattens, and the prisoner's apron. The former was such as the witness had described it—somewhat large for the pocket, and next in size to a duelling-pistol. The latter was an ordinary workman's apron, and the spots of blood spoken of were plainly visible upon it.]

Sergeant Shaw stated, that he had that morning been at the London Hospital, where he had seen the dead body of the young woman. He observed in the throat a small hole, which was perfectly black in appearance, and manifestly caused by the perforation of a bullet, which must have been discharged into the deceased's neck from the side, as it had completely cut through the jugular vein. There was no corresponding orifice on the other side of the deceased's throat, and from that circumstance the witness considered it evident that the ball must be still lodged either in the young woman's throat or head.

William Slater, a weaver living in South Conduit street, Bethnal-green-road, stated that he had been well acquainted for some time past both with the prisoner and the young woman he was accused of having murdered. At about half-past 12 o'clock on the preceding night, on his return home, he was standing on the door-step of his father's house, where he lodged, when he saw the prisoner and the deceased walking together towards the upper end of the street. They appeared to be in conversation, and the prisoner had one of his arms round the young woman's neck. Witness watched them in the same position as far as the first turning in the street, and then went upstairs to bed. He had not been in his bedroom more than six or seven minutes, and had scarcely undressed himself, when he heard the loud report of a gun or pistol, sounding "close at hand," and of such extreme violence as to shake everything in the place. The report was so alarming that he instantly hastened to both the front and back window of the room, and looked into the street and garden, but was unable to discover anything, and therefore retired to rest, not imagining that such a tragical occurrence had taken place till he saw the pool of blood before spoken of on the next morning.

William Whiter, the brother of the deceased, a respectable-looking man, keeping a beer-shop in Brick-lane, Spitalfields, stated, that at ten o'clock on the preceding night the prisoner, with whom he was acquainted, in consequence of his paying attentions to his sister, came to his house in the company of the deceased. The latter went into the back parlour, while the prisoner went into the taproom, and both of them remained in the house until twelve o'clock, when they left together.

Mr. Bingham.—Did they appear to you to be on good terms with each other?

Witness.—Yes, Sir, perfectly so; I observed nothing to the contrary.

Thomas Whiter, the father of the deceased, an elderly, grey headed man of respectable appearance, formerly a licensed victualler, but now a silk-weaver, said he had applied to a policeman to take the prisoner into custody. Upon entering the kitchen of the prisoner's house, in Manchester-row, he found him seated at a table with his head resting on his hands, and excessively pale. Witness asked him what he had done with his daughter? and the prisoner positively denied that he had either seen her that night or the night preceding. Witness then asked him if he knew anything of her? and the prisoner answered in the same positive manner that he did not. Witness, however, replied that that was very strange, and taxed him closely with a knowledge of his daughter; on which the prisoner "recanted" all that he had previously said, and acknowledged that he had been in the deceased's company up to half-past twelve o'clock at night, and that he had then parted from her at the end of Mape-street, and that he knew nothing whatever further about her.

Richard King, a tailor, living in Beckford-row, Bethnal-green, stated that he was acquainted with the prisoner, and that one night last week, but the witness could not recollect which, he was in company with the prisoner in the Rising Sun public house, in Waterloo-town, Bethnal-green, when a pistol, similar in size and appearance to that produced by Sergeant Backhouse, and which, though he could not possitively swear to its being the same, he had very little doubt was so, was handed about among the persons in the room. He did not, however, notice what ultimately became of the pistol upon that occasion, nor did he hear what remarks the prisoner made respecting it.

There being no further evidence to produce, the magistrate then formally asked the prisoner if he had any answer to make to the charge, and he replied in a hoarse half-choked tone, "No, Sir, I have not."

Mr. Bingham made no observations upon the case, and ordered the prisoner to be again brought up that day week.

A coroner's inquest was afterwards held before Mr. Baker, at the London Hospital, upon the body, but adjourned, in order that a post mortem examination might be made.

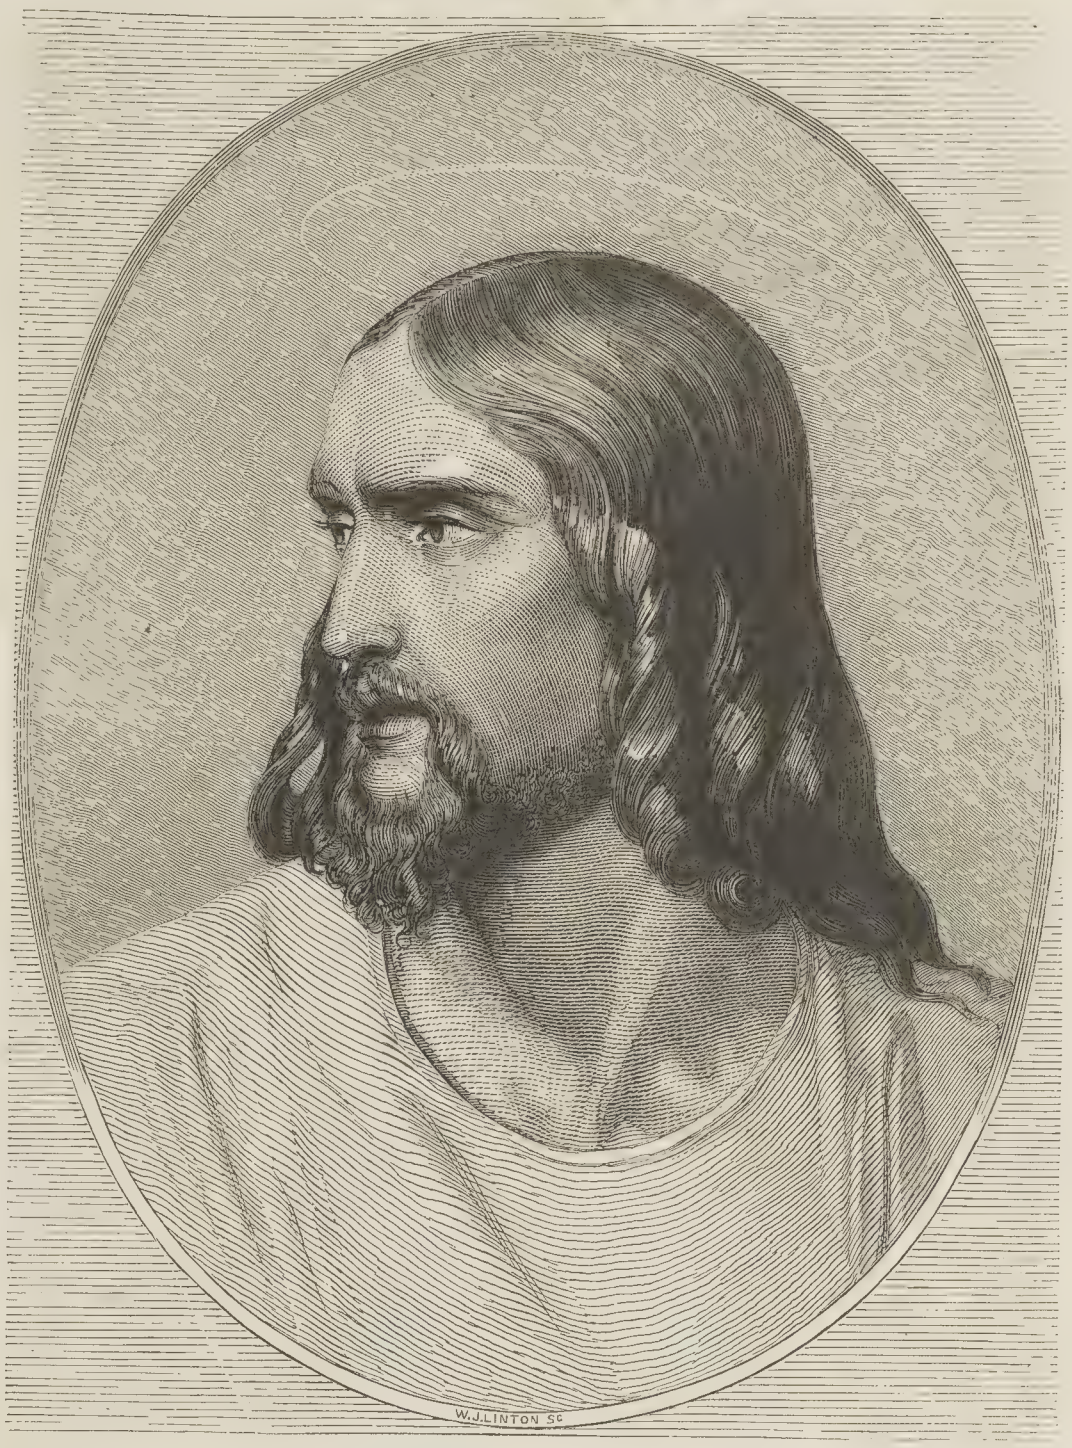
THE NEW JUDGE.—Mr. Baron Platt, on Tuesday morning, took the usual oaths before the Lord Chancellor, on being appointed one of the Judges of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer. His lordship afterwards proceeded to the Court of Common Pleas, and went through the ceremony of being admitted a Sergeant at Law. The learned judge subsequently attended in the Court of Queen's Bench, when the customary oaths were administered, the judges and counsel standing during the ceremony. In the course of the morning the learned baron took his seat on the bench of the Exchequer Court as the successor of Mr. Baron Gurney.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.—At the general meeting for the session of the above society, held on Tuesday last, some eminent foreigners of distinction were admitted as honorary members. A very interesting paper on the Domestic Architecture of France during the Middle Ages, was read by M. Poynter, Honorary Secretary.

The annual ball for the benefit of the Associated Catholic Charities and Spitalfields Free Schools, took place at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover-square, on Wednesday, the 29th January, and went off with great eclât, the company being, as usual, numerous and select. The dances, well chosen, and led by Mr. T. Adams' admirable band, were kept up with unceasing animation until a late hour on Thursday. Mr. Corrie, with his tact and urbanity, proved himself the M. C. par excellence. Among the novelties which were introduced, was a new vocal quadrille, called "The Flight of Care," composed by one of the stewards, which had the benefit of an encore.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—As the train, which leaves Gateshead, Sunderland, and South Shields, at a quarter before nine o'clock on Thursday morning, was proceeding towards Darlington, an accident of a rather alarming character occurred near to the Fence House Station, in consequence of the springing of one of the metal rails. The engine and carriages were thrown off the line, and many of the latter were much broken, while several of the passengers, the engine-driver, and stoker received personal injuries, some of them of a serious nature. The rail which sprung from the line passed through a panel of one of the carriages, and nearly struck Mr. Bramwell, off Sunderland, a passenger within. Mr. J. J. Wright, of the same town, was cut on the head, and much hurt on one of his hands. Mr. Harrison, the engineer to the company was slightly injured. Fortunately Mr. Green, governor of the county gaol, and formerly a medical and surgical practitioner, was present, and rendered immediate assistance to the sufferers. William Smith, the engine-driver, it is feared, has received serious internal injuries. In consequence of the accident the mail-train from the south was detained for a considerable time near the scene of the calamity.

A WOMAN BURNED TO DEATH.—On Saturday afternoon an inquest was held at the Falcon Inn, Wandsworth-road, before Mr. Carter, on the body of Mary Spencer, cook in the service of William Ward, Esq., an East India merchant, residing in Lavender-sweep, Battersea. It appeared that on Wednesday night, about ten o'clock, the deceased having no candle to go to bed with, poured some camphine into a teacup, and placed a thin floating wick therein. This she lighted, and was proceeding up stairs, when the spirit suddenly caught fire, and the deceased, in endeavouring to put it out, set fire to her clothes. The nursemaid heard the deceased scream, and found her, on the second landing, a sheet of flame. The nursemaid was so terrified that she ran past the deceased without attempting to render her assistance. The poor creature followed her down stairs, imploring her to save her, and the latter only escaped being caught by the deceased by running out of the halldoor and shutting it after her. The deceased then ran down into the scullery, where the housemaid was at work. This young woman immediately commenced quenching the fire with a wet mop, and it was ultimately put out by Mr. Ward wrapping a door mat round the unfortunate woman. The deceased had by this time every bit of clothing burnt off, except a very small portion of her stays, and her screams were heart rending. Dr. Parrott, of Clapham common, attended, and rendered every assistance in his power, but the unfortunate woman died at five o'clock on the succeeding morning. The Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."



SUDDEN DEATH OF A CLERGYMAN.—On Tuesday, Mr. Wakley. M.P., held an inquest at the Devonshire Arms, Devonshire-street, St. Marylebone, on the body of the Rev. R. H. Chapman, aged sixty-four, rector of Kirkby Wisk, Yorkshire, and incumbent of the Marylebone parish chapel. The evidence of two of deceased's female domestics, long in his service, and evidently much attached to him, proved that he was found dead in his bed at half-past seven on Sunday morning last, at his residence, 15, Beaumont-street, Portland-place. He had been ailing for a considerable time, and had not left his room for three weeks or a month, and they believed his death had been perfectly natural. Mr. R. Stocker, surgeon, of Baker-street, said he had attended deceased for the last six weeks, for disease of the heart and incipient dropsy. He fully expected he should die suddenly, and had prepared the family for such an event. Some of the Jury wishing to have Mrs. Chapman called as a witness, and a discussion arising on that point, the room was cleared of strangers. In their absence the Jury decided not to summon that lady before them, and then returned a verdict of "Natural death."

SUICIDE OF A MEDICAL GENTLEMAN.—On Wednesday, Mr. W. Carter held an investigation at the Cock, Kennington, on the body of Mr. George Youd, aged thirty-three years, an assistant to Mr. Taylor, surgeon of Harley-ford-place. From the testimony of several witnesses it appeared that the deceased had been, during the past few days, in a very desponding and unsettled state of mind. From what cause, however, none of them were able to tell. On Sunday night last the deceased was employed in making up some medicine for a patient, and on the following morning, when one of the servants entered his bedchamber to get his boots to clean, he noticed the deceased lying on his back. Having spoken to him and received no answer, he became alarmed, and called on his master. Upon that gentleman entering the room he found deceased quite dead. On the floor at the bed-side a bottle was found, which had contained some of the essential essence of bitter almonds. A note was also found written by deceased, in which he stated that he had no recollection of anything, therefore could not correspond with any one, but he hoped God Almighty would bless all his friends. The jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

FINE ARTS.

PAUL DE LA ROCHE.

Of the painting of the Head of the Saviour, by De la Roche, we gave a brief notice in our journal of January 18. We now annex a copy of this celebrated work of art, engraved by Mr. Linton. It has also been engraved on copper by M. Blanchard. We subjoin a memoir-sketch of the distinguished painter.

PAUL DE LA ROCHE was born in Paris in 1797; he studied under Gros, whose style, however, he forsook early in his career. His name soon became known from the spirit displayed in his works, which exhibited the hand of an artist of sound judgment, great expression, and character, and the power of seizing the most effective situations of which the subjects he illustrated were capable. He was also endowed with untiring industry and application; and this with careful study has made him remarkable for the correctness of his costumes. He rapidly rose to the highest rank among French painters. His earliest picture was exhibited in 1822, and was a Scripture piece. Two years later, he produced his "St. Vincent de Paula Preaching on Behalf of the Foundlings," which is in the possession of the Duchess of Berri. His later style was first indicated in his "Death of the President Duranti," which forms, we believe, the ceiling of one of the saloons of the Chamber of Deputies, and the "Death of Queen Elizabeth," the engravings of which are well known in this country. The latter painting is now in the Luxembourg; it has been much admired for the powerful expression of regal pride, struggling with despair and the anguish of death, in the face of the expiring Queen. It was painted in 1827; to which period, also, belongs the "Entry of the People into the Hotel de Ville, after the storming of the Bastille," which, in colouring and treatment, reminds one of Caravaggio. In 1831 he produced his "Sons of Edward," and his "Cromwell by the Coffin of King Charles." In 1834 appeared his "Lady Jane Grey on the Scaffold," These three pictures abound in dramatic power, and deep, expressive truth. It will be seen that he has frequently drawn his subjects from the events of English history. The troubled period of our civil wars has furnished him with the materials of two other paintings, also well known in this country from engravings; they are "The Earl of Strafford on his way to Execution Receiving the Blessing of Archbishop Laud," and "Charles I. Insulted by the Soldiers." Three paintings from the History of France, "Cardinal Richelieu," and "Cardinal Mazarin," and the "Murder of the Duke of Guise," were in the collection of the late Duke of Orleans. Since 1838, De la Roche has been almost wholly occupied with his designs for the paintings for the roof of the Madelaine. Unhappily, these paintings have been the cause of a dispute between the artist and the Government. Since then he has been engaged on another large painting for the roof of a saloon in the "Ecole des Beaux Arts."

M. DE LA ROCHE.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—On Tuesday several houses were sold in East Smithfield, near the London Docks, by auction, by order of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, to be cleared away for the new line of street, which is to pass across High street, Whitechapel, from Spitalfields Church to the Docks. In connexion with these improvements in Whitechapel, a new street is being formed from Houndsditch to Petticoat-lane, in the construction of which a large number of very old houses had been removed. Among the number was one, in which resided the Ambassador from the Court of Spain, in the reign of Elizabeth, the foundation walls of which were in some part about three feet in thickness; adjoining which were discovered some very large vaults.

The Right Hon. W. Sturges Bourne has received within the last week the melancholy intelligence of the death of his sister, Mrs. Martin, mother of the Rev. George Martin, chancellor of the diocese of Exeter, who died at Torquay, on Sunday, the 19th ult. It is a singular circumstance that the reverend chancellor should lose his mother and his father-in-law (the Earl of St. German's) on the same day. The deceased lady was in her 83rd year.

ST. JOHN'S, NOTTING-HILL.—The recently erected church of St. John, at Notting-hill, was consecrated on Wednesday in the accustomed manner, by the Bishop of London. The service was commenced at half-past eleven o'clock, by which time all the seats in the sacred edifice were occupied. Prayers were read by the Venerable Archdeacon Sinclair, and the sermon preached by his lordship. The collection was a large one. Amongst the clergy present were the Rev. Sir H. Dukenfield, the Rev. Mr. Millman, and most of the resident ministers in the neighbourhood of Notting-hill. The architects are Messrs. Stevens and Alexander. The style of the building is the pointed Gothic. There is a lofty spire, which, as the church stands on a commanding eminence on the right hand side of the road going from London, can be seen for many miles around. It is an elegant and appropriate structure.

TERRA-COTTA CHURCH, NEAR BOLTON.

This truly elegant structure is situated at Lever Bridge, or Haulgh, near Bolton, and is believed to be the only attempt that has yet been made in this kingdom to build an entire church of Terra Cotta. The suggestion originated with Mr. Edmund Sharpe, M.A., of Lancaster, and the whole of the work was designed and modelled under his directions; the material was got from the coal mines of John Fletcher, Esq., at Ladyshore, near Bolton, and manufactured in kilns built for the purpose on his premises.

The above church is built entirely, within and without, of Terra Cotta, or fire-clay. There is neither plaster nor stone in any part of the building, except in the foundation-walls. The walls are built of blocks of fire-clay, laid in regular course, five inches in depth, and of various lengths.

The style of the building is that of the fourteenth century—the Decorated Period of Mr. Rickman, the pure Gothic of the German antiquaries—a style that has been abandoned, by common consent, as it were, on account of the difficulty of carrying it out consistently in buildings of the present day, and with the limited means usually placed at the architect's disposal.

In this structure, however, we have all the peculiar richness of the style consistently preserved: the deep mouldings—the rich tracery—the abundance of foliage and sculpture—the pierced parapets—the crocketed pinnacles—the foliated crosses—the deep copings—the bold basecourse: all so characteristic of the exuberant richness of the Decorated Period; and, to crown all, the graceful spire pierced from top to bottom in open tracery; conveying an impression which the lover of ancient models in vain looks for in the necessarily impoverished designs of modern times.

Nor is the ornamental character of the work and the useful nature of the material less apparent in the interior of the church. The backs of the seats, in open tracery—the paneled bench ends, with their rich poppy-heads—the cornice of foliage, containing texts of Scripture in its hollow—the lofty tower arch—the deeply-moulded doorways, with their ball-flowers and running vine-leaves,—the large paneled font, with crocketed canopies, and diaper ground,—the floor of encaustic tiles,—the highly ornamental altar, pulpit, and reading desk,—the scrolled chancel step,—and, above all, the chancel itself, with its rich recessed arcade in two stages, containing the most minute work in pannelling, foliage and sculpture,—and the canopied tablets for the commandments,—are all formed of this ductile and valuable material.

Its admirable colour is one of the chief merits of the material: it is a rich warm stone colour, closely resembling that of the magnesian limestone of Yorkshire, of which so many of the noblest buildings in that county are constructed: and, a close inspection of the building is necessary to satisfy the beholder that he is not looking upon a stone building, but one built entirely of clay.

The plan of the church is a nave, west tower, transepts, and chancel.

The east window is filled with stained glass by Willement; the heads of the two transept windows and the west window by Wailes, of Newcastle; the heads of the side windows contain each the name of a martyr, with an appropriate device.

The organ case is an elaborate design of paneling and arcades, with tracery, also in Terra Cotta.

There are no galleries in the church, and it contains an accommodation of 471 sittings on the ground floor; the benches are low, and the whole of them are open.

The most remarkable feature of this church, where all is richness and exuberance, is perhaps the spire. It is the first attempt that has been made in this country to imitate the open traceried spires, a few rare instances of which are to be found in Germany; it will be unnecessary to apprise those acquainted with Continental Architecture of the open work in the spires of Freyberg, Esslingen, Vienna, and Strasburg. The design of the spire of Lever Bridge, has a resemblance to the most admired of these,—that of Freyberg:—it springs, as at Freyberg, from a light octagonal lantern, the pediments and pinnacles of which cover the base of the spire, and form a rich basement to its delicately tapering fretwork.

It is not improbable that the application of this material to architecture of ornamental character, may be the commencement of a new era in the history of the art; for although in Italy, fire clay was used extensively by the church builders of the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries, it appeared then only in the light of an expedient for enriching certain parts of a building, and not as a material to be used consistently throughout the whole structure: thus the cornices, portions of the fronts, and the decorative parts were of Terra Cotta, whilst the walls, piers, and arches, were built of stone and common red, or blue bricks.

It has also the advantage of being a genuine material, and not, like most of the cementilious preparations in imitation of stone, a deceptive substitute for the latter. In colour, tenacity, and durability, it is at least equal to stone, and in point of economy infinitely superior.

The total cost of the church at Lever Bridge has been, we are confidently informed, less than £3000. The spire alone, if executed in stone, would have cost £1000; whereas, the actual cost of this portion of the work was below £250.

In favour of the durability of this material, we have the test of ages. The bricks of Babylon, and the tiles and pot-ware of the Romans, prove that it is, when properly burned, indestructible. But upon this point—upon the size of the pieces, on the method of tempering, drying, burning, and setting, and, more than all, on the design of the construction, depend the whole value and utility of Terra Cotta.

The material is to be found wherever coal mines exist: it abounds in the manufacturing districts of Lancashire, Yorkshire, Staffordshire, and Durham, and might be used, under proper direction, extensively for ornamental purposes in those counties. Mr. Fletcher has established the manufacture of the material on his estates at Ladyshore, and beautiful specimens of his works are to be seen at his show-rooms in the Exchange Arcade, in Manchester. We understand that a second church is about to be built in the neighbourhood of Manchester of the same material, also from the designs and under the direction of Mr. Sharpe, who has superintended the erection of no less than thirty-eight churches within the last eight years.—(See next page.)

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE ANCIENT MOOT HALL, COLCHESTER.

This quaint old pile was taken down about two years since, a handsome new hall having been erected at Colchester for the transaction of the county business.

The Moot or Mote Hall—the Court of Judicature of the borough—stood on the north side of the High-street: its name is derived from the Saxon Mot-heal, a council-house, or place of assembly. Here the courts were held, and all the public affairs of the town transacted. The edifice contained the Moot-hall itself; the Freemen's Chamber, in which entertainments were given on Michaelmas-day (on the swearing-in of the new mayor), and meetings were held on particular occasions; there were, likewise, a Council-room, and sundry apartments, partly under and partly adjoining the Hall.

THE ANCIENT MOOT-HALL, COLCHESTER.

Mr. Cromwell, in his diligently-compiled History of Colchester, observes "If the present Moot Hall fails to attract the eye accustomed to expect elegance, or, at least, propriety of appearance, in public edifices, it has features that will repay the attention of the curious antiquary. For, parts of this despised fabric were built, there is some reason to believe, by Gudo Dapifer, steward to William the Conqueror. Certain passages of massive archwork remain in the basement of the building, whose style and strength appear equally to give weight to the tradition, which assigns the founding of the Moot Hall to the powerful and wealthy Norman. And, until Morant's time, not only these remain, but the very residence of Gudo, it is confidently believed, existed in Colchester."

The Hall itself was entered from the street, up a flight of steps, through a fine Norman doorway, the arch of which has been preserved. The royal arms were the work of a London sign-painter of our time: the loyal sentence, "God save the Queen," was altered from "God save the King," at the commencement of her Majesty's reign. The Hall, internally, was an ill-shapen room, with very rude accommodation for official purposes.

THE ELECTRICAL TELEGRAPH ON THE SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

Our readers will, no doubt, recollect that in a former number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS we gave a description of the electrical telegraph on the above railway. The first practical trial was made on Friday week, between the Nine Elms and Gosport, a distance of 88 miles.

The telegraph on this line was constructed by Messrs. Cooke and Wheatstone, the patentees. Several of the directors of the company and scientific gentlemen were present on the occasion. On hearing that the suspension of the conducting wires was completed, Mr. Cooke left London by the three o'clock train, and stopped at Bishopstoke, 72 miles. He then proceeded by the next train, and the hour was occupied in carrying the wires into the office at Gosport, on the branch line; so that it was only at a little before ten o'clock that, all things being ready, he dispatched the first signal to London.

The signals passed with the utmost precision, and a long conversation passed with his London correspondent over the intervening distance of 88 miles. Confidence in the system of insulation was thus proved; the experiment never having been before tried until 72 miles were completed, when the apparatus was applied at Bishopstoke about a fortnight back. Directions to his London assistant to start for Gosport by the first morning's train closed the correspondence for the night.

Professor Wheatstone joined, by appointment, at Nine Elms, about twelve next morning, and some thousand signals took their flight between London and Gosport. In Mr. Wheatstone's experiments no perceptible time was occupied in transmission. Among many others, the following inquiries and answers, preceded by the ringing of the alarum, occupying about four minutes, were made at the request of one of the company's officers.—"Q. Have you any mackerel for to night's goods' train? A. No, they cannot catch them now. Q. Why not? A. Because the nights are moonlight, and the fish see the net." Other communications respecting the shipping took place.

Subsequently, the professor's new magneto-electric telegraph was brought into a long circuit of wire, and worked to perfection through 288 miles. The apparatus dispenses with the batteries altogether, a steel magnet being the source of power. The Admiralty are to have a pair of these machines, and a pair of Wheatstone's pointing telegraphs for their distinct use.

There is a good deal of painting to be done on the line, which will require fine weather and some days to complete. As soon as that is done the apparatus will again be worked. The results of Friday night's experiments were considered rather unsatisfactory, as the state of the weather was most unfavourable to insulation, the posts thoroughly wet, and the wires strung with myriads of drops of water, sparkling like gems. The following day was fine, and though the points of connection were all wet, nevertheless the insulation was excellent. The last practical difficulty is overcome by the present system of insulation, and Mr. Wheatstone need only add a letter folding and sealing apparatus to his printing machine to prepare the communications for the Post Office.

If the telegraph were adopted to any extent by that establishment, it is needless to say that it would effect a wonderful change. The entire cost of the telegraph between London and Portsmouth, is £24,000, to be paid in equal proportions by the Admiralty and the company.

BRAMSHILL HOUSE.

This "proper house and home" of Sir John Cope, Bart., was described in our diary of the Royal Visit of last week. Its situation, about six miles from Strathfieldsaye, is strikingly beautiful. "The scenery on each side of the avenue, through which we approach the mansion, is singularly wild and romantic. Nothing can be more striking than the effect produced by the fine old pile suddenly breaking on the view, in the midst of scenery so primeval in its character, and so completely harmonizing with its peculiar style of architecture."—("Environs of Reading.")

We subjoin a description of the fine old pile from "Collectanea Topographia," vol. viii., p. 60:—

"The magnificent mansion of Bramshill was built by Edward Lord Zouche, as a residence, it is said, for Prince Henry, son of James I. The pipes bear the date 1612, with the initials E. Z., in which year the Prince died, and the mansion continued to be occupied by Lord Zouche, who died there, and was buried in Eversley Church, in 1625. The architect was, in all probability, Thorpe, who built Holland House in 1607. It was begun subsequent to the year 1600, as Lord Zouche was, at that time, residing at Guernsey, as Governor; and no mention of Bramshill appears in a large collection of letters then written by him to various persons, and now in the possession of Sir Thomas Philips, Bart. The architect placed an effigy over the north front, which is supposed to be either James I. or Lord Zouche but, on examination, it is clearly that of the latter, as it bears a strong resemblance to his portrait, by Mytens, in the gallery at Hampton Court. The small portrait in the gallery at Bramshill, shown as that of Lord Zouche, is the portrait of Lord Chancellor Ellemere. The grate in what is called the Chapel-room has the Royal arms, with the date 1604, and the initials I. R. The screen in the hall is of stone, but painted. It has ninety-two small shields, three of which are surmounted by coronets. These shields were perhaps emblazoned with the quarterings of the family, and the three principal shields may have been intended to designate the baronies of Zouche, St. Maur, and Cantalupe. Lord Zouche bequeathed this estate to his cousin, Sir Edward Zouche, of Woking, who died in 1634, and (being a dissolute character) it is likely that he sold the whole in his lifetime, as neither he nor his son, who died in 1643, and whose will was proved in 1645, are described as o Bramshill."

Our engraving shows the south or principal front; with its superb bay-window and triple porch, and highly enriched centre.

Thomas Nunns, M.A., of St. John's College, to the perpetual curacy of Trinity Church, Leeds; the Rev. Henry Joseph Maltby, M.A., of Caius College, has just been enstalled an honorary canon of Durham Cathedral.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Uti possidetis.
"Don't you wish you may get it."—Free Translation.

To-day, says the almanack, "pheasant and partridge shooting ends." This session will put an end to all kinds of shooting, except that of an occasional squire or his keeper, we are assured by the Hon. Grantley Berkeley, should Mr. Bright's announced motion on the Game-laws in an evil hour receive the sanction of the Legislature. In England every social movement is an epidemic—from the Polka to the Poor law. Just now the national sports of the country are in hot water—above boiling temperature. It began with the Nimrods, who went to war—war to the knife—and threw away the sheath. By the grace of newspaper advertisements, Mr. Drax and the gentlemen of the Vale of Blackmoor have been breaking the peace of the parts of speech in a way to call back the spirit of the great Lord Chesterfield to the flesh, that it might read in the districts of Charborough and Blackmoor the riot act of politeness. In Wilts they have recently been even more emphatic; and my Lord Gifford actually fell into the hands of the constable on a very strong suspicion of being of mind to horsewhip a brother of the chase at Buscote, a border-cover, situate on the confines of Wilts, Berks, and Gloucester.

But sad as these samples of social single combats are, they weigh as nothing compared with the question now agitating the sporting world, as to what shall be done in the game laws. It is no longer a problem of small rural policy, but has grown into matter for the grave consideration of the State. They will not be permitted to rest as they are—whether by their friends or foes: the former say they are too lax and inoperative, the latter that they disgrace the liberal practice and opinions of the times. There can be no second way of thinking upon their necessity of revision, and the mode to come at the remedy must be by first ascertaining what has brought about their present crisis. It requires no very profound knowledge of history to call up the effects of the forest laws—introduced to us by the Norman William. Field sports were at that era treated as the peculiar right and privilege of royalty. In the reign of John, who "did good by force," every freeman was allowed to keep his hawk, but the nobles and great landed proprietors secured to themselves patents of free warren, and manorial rights, and all sorts of exclusive devices—not for the purposes of enjoying manly and invigorating rural sports—but for the sake of a monopoly that seemed to minister to their love of estate and power. What the forest laws did six hundred years ago, the taste or the morbid appetite for battue shooting is affecting at the present hour. We desire to impute no unworthy motives to those whom a feeble emasculate fashion has led into the practice of that pursuit—but we beseech them not to harden themselves in its commission, because of false pride or false counsel. Why has game been preserved till it has become in some districts as devastating as the plague of locusts—to supply materiel for the battue, not incitement to sport: where have the sanguinary scenes of the poacher's career been enacted? In the battue-pandering preserve—not in the wild wood or the free champain, where the sportsman may take his pleasure, and carry home his contribution to the second course, but where the keeper could not slaughter enough to furnish a London poulterer's shop. Still there are found men of condition who seriously defend the principle of reverting to the system of game preserving which existed in the days of the Conqueror—and who not only insist upon the right of their class to overrun the farmer with a pestilence of hares and partridges, but also on the exclusive privilege of the aristocracy to slaughter them—"wholesale and for exportation." To these we answer in the courtesy of the Roman version—uti possidetis. The day is at hand when the grievance of the game-laws will be dealt with as becomes the enlightened policy of the age—and the day will be one of triumph for the cause of our national sports..... By degrees the resources of the turf begin to develope themselves in the shape of acceptances for the great handicaps; soon we shall be able to offer a pleasant prospectus of the spring racing.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A full room, and business uncommonly animated on the Chester Cup, the "leading features" being Semiseria, Obscurity, Cataract, Zanoni, and Celeste. The outlay on this lot was heavy, but not sufficiently so to satisfy their backers; hence we may look for a speedy improvement. The immense odds laid against Alice Hawthorn and Foigh-a-Ballagh leave small hopes of their being left in.

THE DERBY.—A great rush to back the Cobweb colt had a great effect on the odds, and left it doubtful whether he was not quite as good, if not a better favourite than Alarm. Both were backed freely at 13 to 1. The other betting was flat.

THURSDAY.—The Chester Cup betting was important only as marking the rapid advance of Semiseria, Obscurity, and Celeste. The outlay on each was liberal, but trifling, we are informed, compared with the business transacted on them at Manchester on Tuesday. Cataract was steady at 18 to 1, takers; offers to back the Era at 35 to 1, and St. Lawrence at 40 to 1. Very little doing on the Derby, and nothing in the shape of change beyond a bit of a rush to back Kedger at an improved figure. Betting on the whole was flat.

SUDDEN DEATH.—Last Saturday morning, between 10 and 11 o'clock, a young man, a compositor, in the employ of Messrs. Saville, the printers, of St. Martin's-lane, named John Woodberry, whilst working at his case and talking to a brother workman, suddenly fell down speechless. He was removed with all speed to Charing-cross Hospital, where he shortly afterwards expired. The medical men attribute his death to apoplexy.

SUICIDE OF A NAVAL OFFICER.—A very tragical affair took place at Deal on the 17th ult. It appears, on the morning of that day, about 10 o'clock, the family of Captain Brockman, R.N., were alarmed by hearing a groan, and on Miss Brockman proceeding to the chamber of the captain, she beheld her father stretched lifeless on the ground, having in a moment of mental aberration, committed suicide by severing his windpipe with a razor. The deceased was a retired master and commander, and was highly respected by his brother officers, and by all who knew him. He had nearly attained his 78th year. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

MURDER AND SUICIDE AT CLAPHAM.—A murder and suicide were committed at Clapham on Saturday last, the details of which are very painful. Mr. Goulding, lighterman and corn-factor, of Horsleydown, has a residence at Clapham-rise, and a number of servants; amongst them was Eliza Daniels, who had been in his service about six or eight months as housemaid. She was about twenty-five years of age, of prepossessing manners and appearance, and had been highly recommended to Mrs. Gouldmg. During the time she had been in the establishment her conduct was excellent, and even up to Wednesday night nothing had occurred to excite suspicion. She that night went to bed late, and about two o'clock on Thursday morning Mrs. Goulding was disturbed by a strange noise proceeding from Daniels's room. On procuring a light and going up-stairs, a frightful scene met her view. The floor of the room was deluged in blood, and the clothes of the girl, who was in a corner of the room, were likewise saturated with it. Mrs. Goulding, in great alarm, having called for assistance, a groom was despatched for Mr. Dodd, of Stockwell, surgeon. In the meantime it was discovered that the unfortunate woman had made no less than three deep wounds in her throat, from which the blood was gushing in streams. Mr. Dodd attended in a very short time, and, having sewed up the wounds, Daniels was placed on a bed, and another servant placed by her side for fear she might attempt to open the wounds. Mr. Dodd, on examination of the deceased's bed, discovered a child rolled up in the bed-clothes, and quite dead. It was a fine female child, and there appears little doubt that it was born alive, and having been made away with, the mother made the desperate attempt on her own life. On searching the room, one of Mr. Goulding's razors was discovered on a wash-hand stand. Mr. Dodd was unremitting in his attention to her, but she expired about two o'clock next day. On Monday morning, Mr Carter, Coroner for Surrey, and a jury, assembled at the Bedford Arms Clapham-rise, for the purpose of investigating the respective deaths of Eliza Daniels, aged twenty-five, and her illegitimate offspring, a full grown female infant. The facts of the case having been deposed to, Mr. Dodd, the surgeon, in answer to a question from one of the jury, said, "I am of opinion that the sufferings of the mother, added to the shame and remorse, produced frenzy, during which she perpetrated the murder of her infant, and afterwards destroyed herself." During the course of the proceedings Gibbons, the summoning officer, informed the Coroner that the father of the infant was in attendance. The jury said it was unnecessary to ask the father any questions, as he knew nothing of the dreadful transaction. The Coroner summed up, and the jury returned a verdict—"That the mother, Eliza Daniels, destroyed herself and infant in a fit of insanity."

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—At our market to-day there was only a moderate supply of English wheat. The best qualities were in steady request, at very full prices, while all other kinds were inactive at previous currencies. In foreign wheat very few sales took place, yet the quotations were firmly supported. The supply of barley being more than adequate to meet the wants of the dealers, the trade was excessively heavy at drooping currencies. Malt was selling slowly, at 1s to 2s per quarter less money. Oats, beans, and peas, without alteration.

ARRIVALS.—English wheat, 2890; barley, 5510; oats, 4840 quarters. Irish: wheat, —; barley, —; oats, 3040 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 20; barley, —; oats, 660 quarters. Flour, 3480 sacks; malt, 4010 quarters.

Flour, American, 19s to —; Baltic, 18s to—, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—For linseed and rape cakes the sale has been somewhat active, at full prices. In all other kinds of seeds very little doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6d, per 4lb loaf

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 7d; barley, 34s 2d; oats, 21s 3d; rye, 32s 11d; beans, 35s 4d; peas, 36s 1d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 4s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 7s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—During the present week an improved business has been transacted in this article, and prices have an upward tendency.

Sugar. Fine colourv parcels of West India have supported previous quotations, but other qualities have declined in value 1s per cwt. Mauritius and Bengal parcels, the supplies of which are very extensive, have ruled dull, at barely late currencies. Refined goods have fallen 1s per cwt—the highest quotation for standard lumps being 73s per cwt.

Coffee.—Good ordinary Ceylon has been in good request, at 51s per cwt. West India and most other kinds are dull.

Rice.—In Bengal very little is doing, at 11s to 11s 6d for middling white.

Fruit.—Currants are held firmly at 49s to 51s per cwt. For Valentias 50s demanded. Deniæ raisins, 40s.

Indigo.—The public sales have been brought to a close. Out of the 7,475 chests offered, 5,602 were disposed of in the sale-room, 1,293 bought in, out of which 230 have been since sold.

Cinnamon.—The quarterly sales were brought to a conclusion on Tuesday: 3,524 bales were offered, and 1,500 sold, at a decline of from 4d to 5d per lb.

Provisions.—Large arrivals of Irish butter have again taken place. The demand continues extremely heavy, at a decline of from 2s to 4s per cwt. Carlows, landed, are selling at 90s to 100s; Cork, 92s to 96s; Limerick, 90s to 94s; and Waterford, 86s to 92s per cwt. Foreign butter is 2s per cwt cheaper; best Friesland, 90s to 102s; Kiel, 100s to 108s; and Holstein, 98s to 106s per cwt. Bacon is a mere drug, and quite 1s per cwt lower. Waterford, landed, 43s to 44s; other qualities, 40s to 43s per cwt. All other kinds of provisions are extremely dull.

Oils.—There is a fair business doing in linseed-oil, at full prices. Other kinds of oil support previous rates.

Tallow.—Although the consumption continues to a fair extent, no improvement has taken place in value. P. Y. C. on the spot is selling at 39s 6d to 39s 9d; and for delivery 39s 6d is asked up to the end of the year. Town tallow is selling at 41s to 41s 6d net cash.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 10s; useful ditto, £4 12s to £5 3s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 12s to £1 14s; wheat straw, £1 15s to £1 17s per load.

Potatoes.—The supply of potatoes is now large, owing to which, the sale is inactive, at prices varying from 60s to 80s per ton.

Hops (Friday).—Bags of last year's growth still command a ready sale, at full last week's quotations; but in pockets very little is doing, yet the prices are supported in every instance.—1844's: Sussex pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £7 8s to £8 4s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £8 0s to £9 10s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 12s; Mid Kent bags, £7 15s to £8 15s; East Kent ditto, £11 0s to £12 0s.

Coals (Friday).—Adair's, 17s 6d; Chester Main, 18s; Holywell Main, 19s; Old Tanfield' 17s; Tanfield Moor, 20s; Wylam, 17s 6d; Lambton, 20s per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—There was only a limited supply of beasts on sale in our market of today, yet the beef trade was in a sluggish state, at prices about equal to those obtained on Monday. We had 40 beasts and 30 sheep from Holland, and 100 Scots from Aberdeen, in full average condition. The numbers of sheep were small, while the inquiry for them was steady, at fully previous rates. Calves were in moderate supply, and very brisk demand, at an advance of 8d. per 8lbs. The pork trade was active, and the currencies had an upward tendency. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £19 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime large oxen, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 0d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 4s 4d to 5s 0d; prime small ditto, 5s 2d to 5s 6d; large hogs, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; neat small porkers, 4s 2d to 4s 8d; sucking calves, 18s 0d to 30s 0d; and quarter old store pigs, 16s 0d to 28s 0d each. Beasts, 575; cows, 165; sheep, 3040; calves, 157; pigs, 290.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday.)—For each kind of prime meat we had a steady demand, but most other qualities were a dull sale. Per 8lbs. by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime large ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; large pork, 2s 10d to 3s 8d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; middling ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 4s 8d to 5s 8d; small pork, 3s 6d to 4s 6d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Funds have been very little dealt in, and some extensive sales were made on Wednesday and Thursday for the purpose of investment in railway securities, which are daily becoming more in demand on the part of the public. During the week the market has been flat, from continued sales, and the daily purchases of the Government broker have not been sufficient to support prices. Consols for money continue to quote 99⅞ to par, and 100 to ⅛ for the account. The new Three-and-a-quarter per Cents have slightly receded, and close at 104¼. Three per Cent Reduced are 100⅜ to ½. Bank Stock has been an exception, having advanced about two per cent. since Monday; it closes at 215. Exchequer Bills have fluctuated, and the price is readily acted upon in the present state of the market, any considerable sale or purchase haing an immediate influence. The last quotation is 65 to 67. India Stock is firm at 285 to 286. The Bonds are 76 prem.

The only novelty in the Foreign Market has been the introduction of the New Russian Loan for £2,000,000, contracted by that Government for railway purposes. The price it fetched was 98. Spanish, although it has been not much dealt in, continues to maintain its advance, and Mexican was in demand on Wednesday and Thursday, some speculative purchases giving a slight impulse to prices. Columbian has receded from a report that Lord Aberdeen has declined to interfere further with Senor Mosquera, notwithstanding the earnest wishes of the committee of South American bondholders. The last quotation is 14⅛ to ⅜. Mexican closes at 36. Portuguese Converted, 59. Spanish Actives, 28½. Three per Cents., 40⅜. Dutch Two and a Half per Cents., 63¼. Four per Cent. Certificates, 98½.

The shareholders of the North Kent Company at their meeting on Wednesday agreed to apply to Parliament, notwithstanding the rejection of the proposed line by the Board of Trade. The shareholders who are not inclined to accede to this proposition are to have the deposit paid returned to them; and those who agree, are guaranteed against any expense exceeding ten shillings per share. This is an example that we hope will have its effect in the arrangements of other rejected lines.

The Railway Market continues to absorb the attention of all classes of capitalists, and has been buoyant with an upward tendency during the week. Every day produces some new project, and if it should be a foreign line, the shares are generally at a premium before the issue takes place. Attention has been directed lately to the Irish lines, from several new schemes having appeared in that quarter. The settlement took place on Thursday, and for amount has been seldom if ever equalled. It, however, passed off quietly, as was anticipated from the market having been a rising one. Since the last account, money has fetched high prices for continuations, but this is not a matter of moment while no reaction takes place. Should, however, any crisis occur, the result may be easily foretold. The closing quotations of the lines in which fluctuations have occurred, are Birmingham and Gloucester, 115; Chester and Holyhead, 6⅞; Churnet Valley, 7; Cornwall, 3⅞; Eastern Counties, 18⅝; Birmingham Stock, 235; Greenwich, 11¼; Brighton, 52⅝; Croydon, 18⅛; London and York, 5⅜; South Western, 79; Lynn and Ely, 4⅜; Manchester and Leeds, 131; Midland, 130; Newcastle and Darlington, 66; Dover, 47⅜; Glasgow and Dumfries, 26; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 63 to 65; Sheffield and Manchester, 100 to 101; Boulogne and Amiens, 5; Great Northern of France, 5⅜; Orleans and Vierzon, 10⅝; Orleans and Bordeaux, 7½; Paris and Lyons, 3¾; Paris and Rouen, 44⅛; Rouen and Havre, 27½.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The operations in the English and Foreign Markets were of an insignificant character yesterday, and no material alteration in prices occurred. The Share Market was, on the contrary, very active, and it being the day for paying the balances of accounts, great animation prevailed. Extraordinary fluctuations in prices took place during the day. Birmingham and Gloucester advanced to 126, Churnet Valley to 9, Dovers to 49, Great Western to 184, and Eastern Counties to 19.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK and PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1845.

It contains a greater variety of Information and seasonable entertainment than is to be found in any other Almanack. The Wrapper is beautifully printed in colours; and the artistical execution of the entire Almanack entitles it to a place upon every drawing-room table in the empire.

The Press is universal in praise of this beautiful Almanack.

EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best Illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.

"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the Calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post Nov. 20.

"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries; and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 19.

"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets, as they will be visible in the ensuing year are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.

"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood-cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 17.

"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical observations, and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this 'Illustrated Almanack' is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy. —Era, Nov. 24.

"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the foolish almanacks of times that are passing away—and, we may add, one of the most successful. It is filled with illustrations, some of which, representing the signs of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardeners' Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper."—Gardeners' Chronicle.

"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. The illustrations are very beautiful. Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy, and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

Just Published, Demy 4to., neatly bound in cloth, with Engravings and Diagrams, price 6s.,
THE HAND-BOOK TO THE PIANOFORTE, comprising an easy Rudimental Introduction to the Study of that Instrument and Music in General; the Art of Fingering, according to the Modes of the best Masters, exemplified in various Exercises, Scales, &c., in all the Major and Minor Keys; and interspersed by Relax tions from Study, consisting of Popular Melodies and Romances, and Selections from Pianoforte Compositions of some of the most celebrated Ma ters. Also, a Short and Easy Introduction to Harmony or Counterpoint, and a New Vocabulary of Terms. By J. AUGUSTINE WADE, Author of "The Dwellings of Fancy," "Songs of the Flowers," "The Two Houses of Grenada," an Opera; "The Prophecy," an Oratorio, &c. &c.
"From the first 'example' to the last 'exercise' everything is brought before the learner in the clearest manner, and the means of conquering each new difficulty as it arises literally placed at his fingers' ends. Indeed, after carefully digesting some sixty pages, and mastering the 'digital' and other exercises here given, he need not fear the thickest army of semi-demisemis, or the most whimsically-noted passage of the most gifted manipulator of the keyboard. The work comprises, in addition, a brief and excellent treatise on the elements of harmony, developing the laws of composition in a simple and sound manner; and we altogether warmly recommend the book to public favour." Literary Gazette, October 19.
"The book now before us is the most admirable instance we have ever met with of a man acknowledged as a poet and composer condescending to construct a threshold to harmony. Mr. Wade has written the best first-book we ever read."—Sunday Times.
"This is one of the best works of musical instruction which has been brought under our notice; the author unites an earnest love of music with sound knowledge of the art, and has, therefore, given a life and animation to his lessons, which relieve the dry and technical details of teaching."—The League, October 12.
"An ingenious and tasteful work, comprehending a large amount of information in a comparatively small space. The volume seems to us calculated to be very useful; and it is certainly ORNAMENTAL also, being handsomely printed and bound, and embellished with a striking portrait of the celebrated pianist, Franz Liszt."—Watchman, October 9.
"We regard it, on the whole, as very able and useful, and recommend it to the attention of students of the Pianoforte."—John Bull, October 19.
London: WHITTAKER and Co., Ave Maria-lane.

AGENCIES.—COUNTRY SHOPKEEPERS and others are informed that the LONDON GENUINE TEA COMPANY are now filling up their Lists of AGENCIES for the Present Year, and persons seeking for a respectable addition to their business, by which many have derived, during the last 27 years, considerable incomes, may apply to the Company, at their Warehouses, 2, LAURENCE POUNTNEY-HILL, LONDON.

GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, DISEASED JOINTS, SPINAL and GLANDULAR AFFECTIONS, LUMBAGO, SCROFULOUS ULCERS, SKIN DISEASES, SWELLED LEGS, &c. &c. Innumerable Cures in the above class of Complaints are daily effected by the use of COD LIVER OIL. This remedy may be obtained through all respectable Medicine Vendors in bottles at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. each; and the genuine bears the signature of the only mercantile Agents, JONES and Co., 201, Strand.

BENEVOLENCE.—All Classes, in all places, who suffer from Mind or Nervous Complaints, are invited by Rev. Dr. WILLIS MOSELEY to be CURED FOR NOTHING, except the Chemists' and Druggists' Charges. For twelve years the Nobility, Clergy, Medical Men, their Patients, &c., have been cured by this new treatment, after some had been ordered to asylums, and all pills, powders, and draughts had failed. The cure is as certain as water quenches thirst. A Pamphlet for nothing will be sent free to any address, if a stamp is inclosed. Apply or write. At home from Eleven to Three.—9, Charlotte-street, Bloomsbury.

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are apprised that Agents continue to be appointed in London and Country Towns by the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, for the sale of their celebrated TEAS (Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate-street). They are packed in showy leaden canisters, from an ounce to a pound, with the prices and weight marked on each packet, and but little trouble is occasioned by the sale; the license is only 11s. per annum, and many, during the last nineteen years, have realised considerable incomes by the Agency, without 1s. let or loss Application to be made (if by letter, post-paid) as above.

LOSS OF TEETH SUPPLIED, without Springs, Clasps, or Wires; Loose Teeth Fastened; and Filling Decayed Teeth with Mineral Marmoratum.—Mons. LE DRAY and SON, SURGEON DENTISTS, 42, Berners-street, Oxford-street, continue to restore Decayed Teeth with their celebrated Mineral Marmoratum, applied without pain, heat, or pressure, preventing and curing the Toothache, and rendering the operation of extraction unnecessary They also Fasten Loose Teeth, whether arising from age, neglect, the use of calomel, or diseases of the gums. Incorrodible Artificial or Natural Teeth, of surpassing beauty, to match in colour and shape those left in the mouth, fixed, from one to a complete set, without extracting the roots, or giving any pain, at the following charges:—A single tooth, 10s.; a set, £5 5s. Arranged on the most approved principles, and restoring perfect articulation and mastication. At home from Ten till Six.—N.B. Removed from 60, Newman-street, to 42, Berners-street, Oxford-street.

CLOSE OF HOLIDAYS.—Now that the season of annual festivity is about to terminate, and the respective boarding-schools be re-instated by the busy throng of youthful aspirants, the personal comfort and attractions of whom become naturally an object with friends and relatives of great solicitude, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for accelerating the growth, and for preserving and beautifying the Hair; ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for preserving the Skin and Complexion, and removing Cutaneous Eruptions; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, for beautifying the Teeth, and preserving the Gums, are universally considered indispensable in the requisite accompaniments of the decorative toilet. The ancient privilege conceded by all the Sovereigns of Europe to those creative removing specialties, and confirmation, by experience, of their valuable efficacy, have characterized them with perfection, and stamped them celebrity unparalleled.
CAUTION.—Beware of Spurious Imitations under the same names (some under the implied sanction of royalty). See that the word "ROWLAND'S" is on the Wrapper of each article. For the protection of the public from fraud and imposition, the Hon. Commissioners of Stamps have directed the Proprietors' Signature to be clearly cut on the Government Stamp, thus—"A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden," which is affixed on the KALYDOR and ODONTO. Sold by the Proprietors, and by Chemists and Perfumers.— All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

TO CLERGYMEN AND COUNTRY GENTLEMEN.—The ORTHOCHRONOGRAPH; an instrument patented by WEBSTER and SON, Chronometer-makers to the Lords of the Admiralty and the East India Company, and introduced by Dr. Robinson at the late meeting of the British Association. By this instrument true time may be obtained at any part of the world, for the correction of clocks, watches, and chronometers, by the most inexperienced person, to a correctness not hitherto attained, but by those accustomed to the use of astronomical instruments. Its simplicity, portability, and the ease with which the results are obtained, will enable persons to keep their clocks and watches to true time. An explanatory pamphlet, one shilling, forwarded free on the receipt of 16 stamps.

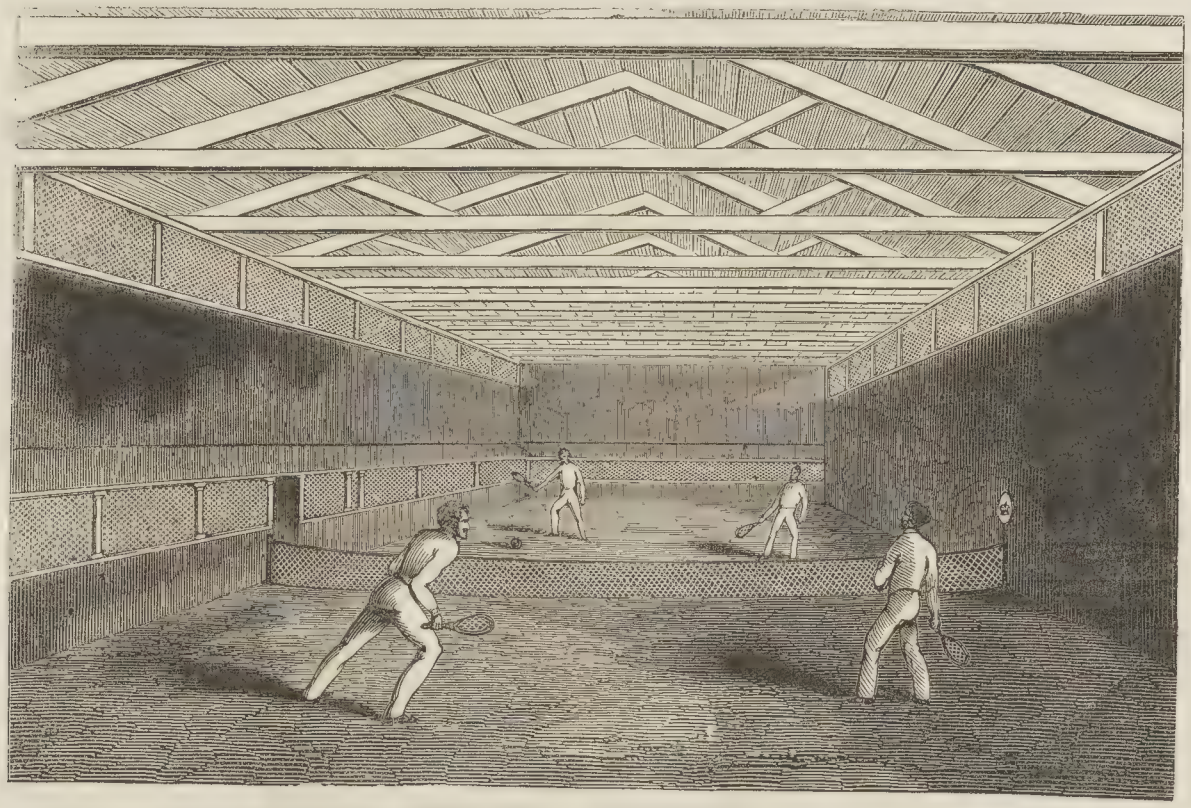
"THE MYSTERY" FAN STEAMER.

EXPERIMENTAL STEAM TRIP.

Many attempts have been made to supersede the use of side paddles in steamers, and to substitute for them a concentrated propelling power, acting under water, beyond the reach of shot (in war-steamers), and all liability to accident. The success of one of these substitutes—the Archimedean screw, fixed to the stern of a steamer—may be seen in the splendid Great Britain, now lying off Blackwall; or rather in the details of her passage from Bristol to the Thames, as reported in another part of our journal.

Opinions upon the propelling power of the screw are very various; and on this and other accounts, engineers are still studying to effect the above object by additional means. The great desideratum is now stated to be on the point of being accomplished. A beautifully constructed boat, about fifty tons burden, has recently been launched at Greenwich. Her engines—a pair of tens—were made by Messrs. Penn and Son, of Greenwich. They are fixed lengthwise in the vessel, and are remarkably light and handsome. The propeller is on the "fan" principle, similarly constructed to the fan of a windmill, and, like the screw, is fixed to the stern: it possesses a two-fold action—the one perpendicular, which regulates her speed, and the other horizontal, which describes half a circle and regulates her steerage. This latter action of the "fan" is of such power that, while it supersedes the use of a rudder, it can wheel the boat round as if she moved upon a pivot, and continue to spin her round like a top, without making head or stern way, except what little the tide or wind may effect. This peculiar action of the "fan" is ingeniously contrived, and is the sole invention of Mr. Hunt, the engineer, of Greenwich. The "fan," combined with this fine principle of action, can be attached to any sailing vessel, from a line-of-battle ship down to a collier, and can be worked by hands, totally unconnected with steam. Its power, though it could not be so great as when worked by steam, is such that it would enable a ship of the line to bring both her broadsides to bear against an enemy in about two minutes.

The vessel is named the Mystery, and, although she was not quite finished, it was determined to give her an experimental trip down and up the river. Messrs. Holl and Hunt, the patentees and owners, invited several friends to accompany and enjoy the excursion with them. The day opened gloomily, rough, and stormy. The tight little steamer, however, dauntlessly started from Greenwich-pier at a quarter-past eleven o'clock, A.M. Her engines worked admirably, and she made her way over the waves, impelled by an invisible power, as buoyant as a cork, and scarcely disturbing the water. When she reached abreast of Grays, near Gravesend, she was veered round, and returned to Woolwich, which was reached about two o'clock, P.M. The distance from Greenwich-pier to Grays and back to Woolwich (about thirty-five miles) was performed in exactly two hours and three quarters.



She then proceeded up the river as far as Chelsea. This part of her voyage afforded a fine opportunity for testing the immense advantages springing, not only from the non-use of side-paddles, but from the facilitous and admirable way she answered to the helm, in which point she has no equal. She cut in and out barges, rafts of wood, colliers, and ships with such ease, precision, and certainty, that she astonished every beholder. She gave the "go-by" to several Woolwich and other steamers which were compelled to slacken speed, ease, stop, and back, in consequence of the crowded state of the pool, and the fear of injuring or smashing their paddle-boxes and paddles by collision.

There could not have been a finer day for the experimental trial. The wind blew strongly from the westward, and with or against the wind or tide she proved herself to be a capital sea-boat. The trial proved most satisfactory and successful throughout. She bounded over the waters like magic, without a sail or any perceptible propelling power, and almost without herself creating a ripple. She, however, possesses a propelling power equal, in the ratio, to any other steamer on the river. It is impossible to injure the propeller by shot, collisions, grounding, or any other casualty. One or the other paddle or steamers navigating the wide ocean, is frequently out o water, but the fan-propeller can never cease performing its functions, but through some casual derangement in its own machinery. The Mystery is now fast approaching completion in all its various appointments, when a more efficient trial will be given.

THE LATE GALE.—On Saturday and Sunday there was a severe gale along the coast, during which several vessels were wrecked off Yarmouth; several lives were lost. The accounts from Liverpool state the Manchester (of London), Hall, master, went down on Hoyle Bank, but the crew were saved. On Saturday evening, the Athlone steamer sailed for Belfast, and had amongst her passengers the celebrated pianist, M. Thalberg, and Miss Dolby, Mrs. Dolby, Mr. John Parry, and Mr. Calkin. Mr. Calcott, the manager of this musical company, was also on board. The party had performed at two grand concerts in Liverpool, the second of which came off on Saturday morning, and were proceeding to Belfast for the purpose of performing at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of that town to-night. The Athlone returned to Liverpool, and immediately after, M. Thalberg and his friends drove to the Adelphi Hotel, where they described the sufferings they had undergone during the night as being of the most painful nature. It appears that they had succeeded in steaming in the face of the gale as far as the Isle of Man, but that they found it impossible to proceed further, and for hours the captain considered the vessel in imminent peril. The party seemed to have given up all hopes of ever seeing land again, and expected every moment to go to the bottom. Their joy at reaching their comfortable quarters was unbounded.

GREAT FOOT RACE.—Upwards of four thousand persons assembled on Monday, at Gannick-corner, about a mile and a half beyond Barnet, to witness the great foot-race between Jackson, the American deer, and Sheppard, of Birmingham, which has excited so much interest in the sporting circles during the past fortnight. Both these men have, in a number of contests, exhibited the most extraordinary speed, and, in a race between them only a few days ago, surpassed anything ever known in the annals of pedestrianism. On that occasion Jackson, who was the winner, after a most splendid race, performed upwards of eleven miles in an hour, a task hitherto unprecedented. The exceeding closeness of the race between Jackson and Sheppard until the latter fell, at the conclusion of the tenth mile, with the extraordinary game displayed by both, was the theme of conversation amongst some gentlemen shortly after the struggle, and a match was made for £50 a side, and the money was deposited in the hands of Owen Swift at once for a five-mile race. Both men shortly after two o'clock made their appearance on the ground. Betting was 6 to 4 on Sheppard. The men were to run one mile out and return, the distance being measured towards London. Jackson took the lead, which he maintained until nearly the whole of the distance had been accomplished, his opponent waiting upon him the whole of the way, and being but a few yards behind him. The speed throughout the race was most extraordinary. The first two miles were performed in ten minutes ten seconds, and the four miles under twenty-one minutes. In going up to the fifth mile, the men appeared to increase their speed, and Sheppard ran right up to his opponent, and they were together for about fifty yards, when Sheppard, almost within sight of the distance post, gradually headed his opponent, and won by about four yards, accomplishing the five miles in twenty-five minutes forty-five seconds. It was admitted to be the finest race ever witnessed.

TROTTING MATCH.—On Tuesday afternoon a match came off on Mitcham Common, between Mr. Vanderstein's cob Wonder, and Mr. Griffin's cob Merrylegs, for £50 aside, to trot two miles in harness, Merrylegs having 250 yards start. Betting commenced at 7 to 4 and 2 to 1 against Wonder. Burke, of trotting notoriety, drove Merrylegs, and Mr. Monk Wonder. The horses started well, Merrylegs keeping the lead till the mile and a half, when Wonder caught him, Burke trying all he could with his horse, but Wonder went a head and won easily by about five yards, doing the two miles in six minutes and a half, being considered a wonderful performance for a pony only thirteen hands three inches. The match drew a great number of persons to the common.

TENNIS COURT, AT STRATHFIELDSAYE.

THE TENNIS COURT AT STRATHFIELDSAYE.

We noticed this recreative adjunct to the mansion of Strathfieldsaye, in chronicling the Royal visit of last week; when his Royal Highness Prince Albert enjoyed this olden game.

Tennis is played with rackets, but differs from the game of rackets, inasmuch as Tennis consists in dropping a ball over a central net, on each side of which the players stand; the aim being to keep the ball in motion as long as possible without allowing it to fall to the ground.

Tennis was formerly played with the hand, then with a glove, which was, in some instances, lined; and afterwards the players bound cords and tendons round their hands, to make the ball rebound more forcibly; and hence, it is added, the racket derived its origin.

It was exceedingly fashionable in France during the reign of Charles X., it being often played by the nobility for large sums of money. Shakspeare mentions a "present of tennis balls," in the play of Henry V. Henry VII. was a tennis player; and, an entry in a MS. register of his expenditure, mentions an item of 12d. for his loss at tennis, and 3d. for the loss of balls. In the 16th century, tennis courts were common in England, and the game was very popular with the nobility, which it continued to be down to the reign of Charles II., who frequently played at tennis with his courtiers. Thus it was, in past ages, a royal and noble game.

PROSPECTUS.

THE Proprietors of this Journal, in announcing a project so important as that which is indicated in the title of the work above set forth, are anxious to enlist the good-will and interest of all their readers in its favour, because they believe that, with the assistance of public attention to its details and disclosures;—to its construction and carrying out;—influences of the highest social value may be engendered, a large amount of the best sort of instruction diffused over the community, and benefits extended both to the employing and employed classes, consequent upon the fact of the former having a better knowledge of the latter, and upon the creation of strong and lasting sympathies between them both.

The theme is one of abounding interest and fertility, evoking the best powers of reflective thought, and pointing to a wide and true field for the exercise of Philosophy, Religion, Morality, and the Social Virtues. It should have, too, an especial charm for families, for it will lay bare—in its truthful nature—the home-life of all the Industrial Community.

Whatever political conclusions may be drawn by others from these "Pictures of the Working People," they will assume no points of public doctrine of their own, with, perhaps, the single exceptional principle, which their illustrations are so likely to work out—that "Employment is the great and chief good that can be provided for a people—a good that it is the imperative duty of all who have the means of furnishing it, to give to all who are able and willing to barter their skill and labour for the means of life. To thousands and thousands work would be more welcome than alms, and employment furnished to one honest labourer, would save the individual the degradation of being, and society the burden of supporting, a pauper. And labour given, be it remembered, is not a loss but a gain to the giver."

The structure of this whole design will be of an enlarged character. The "Pictures," be it remembered, are intended to reflect the twofold condition—that is, the condition during work, and the condition when at rest from it—of "ALL THE EMPLOYED CLASSES OF THE POPULATION OF OUR DOMESTIC EMPIRE." The Agricultural—the Mining—the Excavating—the Building—the Pastoral—the Metropolitan—the Manufacturing—the Artizan—and the Domestic—in a word, all the employed—English, Irish, Scotch, and Welsh—old or young—male or female—paid or pittanced—contented or discontented—miserable or happy. The whole world of employment will be brought under the faithful scrutiny of fact, so that society may receive it with confidence, and accept it as truth. The ambition is to achieve a noble and unbounded good.

The style adopted will be throughout the real; not the style of the cynic of humanity, the hypocritical champion of a one-sided brotherhood, who paints only what is painful, and exaggerates that—but of the hearty, sympathising, truth-telling narrator, who has a leaning to no class, and a love for all; who will be sorry when he comes to cruelty and wrong, and glad when he can shake hands with happiness and content; who will not pay the pride of the poor the bad compliment of detracting from the amount of comfort which the industry of many have gained, nor flatter the repose of the rich by omitting the detail of a single oppression that ought to go to the gates of conscience with its reproachful ring: the motto of the writer will be the truth—the golden truth—for all, and for all alike. The matter, it should be added, however, will assume all the vivid interest which Fiction itself is obliged to borrow from Nature—derivable from graphic painting of the social, the domestic, the descriptive, and the picturesque—from the illustration of anecdote, and the frequent introduction of scenes and episodes of humble life, in which may be said to consist the "Romance of Industry;" and the public may expect in the "pictured poetry," as rendered enduring by the painter, the most striking beauties and fidelities of art.

To assist the honesty of purpose with which this work is set on foot, the proprietors most earnestly request

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

ENGLISHMEN seek from the institution of Parliament those changes in their laws, and ameliorations in their condition, which other nations look for, but do not find, in the violences of revolutions, revolts, and insurrections. With us everything may be considered in a state of gradual transition from what is bad to something that shall be at least endurable, from what is good to something better still, for it is not our peculiar foible as a people to be satisfied with things as they are. In France, political changes are convulsions. A charter is gained, or a dynasty expelled, by force of arms; a "gunpowder" spirit enters largely into what ought to be pacific discussions; war always stands in the back ground as the ultima ratio, which may be called on to decide all controversy, and the musket is too often considered the speediest and most effectual reformer. This spirit, tending always to violence, is kept down by violent means: hence the laws that in France prohibit political meetings, fetter the press, and cripple the trial by jury, while an enormous standing army flings the shadow of arbitrary power over all. Still more evident is the old Gallic love of war in the discussions that spring out of the relations between France and other countries. Causes of quarrel will arise unavoidably, but they need not be always made the most of. A slight perusal of the French debates on the Address will show how deeply they are tinged with old hatreds, and the memory of former triumphs. The pride of the victors of Jena and Austerlitz is there, as well as the darker reminiscences of Trafalgar and Waterloo. To renew the triumphs and avenge the overthrows, is the ardent wish of thousands in France, and the feeling is more than indicated, it is even expressed, in the Chambers. The discussion with which our Session has commenced is remarkable for nothing more than the general and earnest desire, among men of all parties, for the continuance of peace. In both places the mind of the two nations is manifested and expressed.

As we regard our Parliament as the source and origin of all the new laws that are necessitated by change of circumstances, and alterations of old ones, made no less necessary by the lapse of time, the opening of the Session is always regarded with something of a lively hope. Evils will be at least discussed, information and opinion will be elicited; and though, at the close of the annual sitting, the summing up of work and labour done may exhibit a sad preponderance of words over action, of intentions over results, yet the future disappointment does not lessen present anticipations, and at the opening of Parliament there is heard on all sides the question, "What will be done?" Hope, that, like Charity, "trusteth much," gives a cheering answer; when Experience puts the other question, "What has been done?" Certainty furnishes a reply that is not so satisfactory.

Independently of these anticipations at the opening of Parliament of what the Session may produce, there is much in the ceremony itself that awakens attention. In proportion as the power and prerogatives of the Crown have been diminished, so have our Sovereigns assumed the more easy, every-day sort of life, that accords better with the position of the chief magistrate of a state, than the stiff and cumbrous magnificence which of old surrounded the person of royalty. But the privilege of calling together and dismissing the Legislature of the realm is still one of the distinct prerogatives of the Crown, and is generally exercised with a ceremony full of its former "state and ancientry." Royalty assumes its pomp, and the Ministers of the Crown are scarcely recognisable for the very staid and ordinary looking elderly gentlemen the greater number of them are, when seen in the robes that are the costumes of centuries ago, accompanying her Majesty as subordinates bound to render personal suit and service in the old feudal fashion, preceded by Heralds, and Pursuivants, and Equerries, and Gentlemen Ushers, and officers of hereditary dignity, with high-sounding titles and duties that are to the bulk of the world unknown. In such a scene we are caught up, as it were, from the midst of an age of buying and selling, and calculating, that looks to profit more than pomp—to money more than magnificence, and that is characterised by an almost too exclusive a regard to utility—an age in which power itself is content with its own reality, and cares comparatively little for the exterior display of it—from the midst of so plain and plodding a generation we are transported suddenly into the midst of one wholly different, in which rank was careful of its outward emblems, and did not shun, but courted the being seen of men; in which the garb of office was scarcely second to its functions, and power was not satisfied without its pageantry. Then all the "robes and furred gowns," the chains and wands of office, had a significance and value, and the inconvenience of splendour was undergone for the sake of its imposing effect on the multitude. All this has departed, and the power and benefit of government and law are not the less acknowledged, because they have adopted the costume of daily life. But to our forefathers this was incomprehensible. The prime minister of Henry the Eighth—the magnificent Wolsey—never went to attend his official duties without a numerous retinue of officers and dependants, as ushers, train-bearers, and mace-bearers in splendid liveries that denoted the great wealth of their master, as their numbers indicated his place and power. The prime minister of Victoria walks down to Westminster alone, in hat and coat of the most plebeian and unobtrusive plainness, with an umbrella under his arm, and looking as little like a successor of Wolsey—with more power than a Wolsey ever possessed—as can be conceived. Could the shade of the Cardinal encounter him, would not the proud statesman-priest look on the plain citizen figure with contempt? Yet as we, the contemporaries of the minister of England, recognise the possessor of her power, we walk on rather disposed to admire! Such is the difference between the life of the present and the past!

Thus the ceremony that attends the opening of Parliament by the Queen becomes, as a revival of old feudal magnificence and ancient pageantry, invested with a certain kind of curious interest; we see existing along with the power-loom and the rail-road, a faint image of that regal supremacy which was so often so oppressively used, that the people have no reasons to regret its decay, and many to feel thankful that it cannot be revived. To that magnificence of the one and of the few, the welfare of the multitude was sacrificed, till they grew too strong to be coerced, too enlightened to be dazzled into a blind obedience, or the acknowledgment of "the right divine of kings to govern wrong." On the pomp of royalty men now look with a kind of antiquarian interest, or that curious admiration with which the geologist regards the fossil remains of those extinct races whose powers must have been almost too terrible to have made them either safe or agreeable contemporaries of man: we admire their strange structure, so different to aught our present experience offers to us; but it is with a secret gladness that they are extinct and perished, and can crush and trample no more.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The joyous season of the Carnival has now passed, and is replaced by one very different, which even in these days claims much solemnity of observance. Pleasures have been kept up with alacrity to the last, and seemed to be the more furiously pursued that their time was short. To the higher classes, the rich and titled, the past season has presented an unremitting succession of pleasure; but the old observances and customs, the out-of-door joviality and buffoonery that formerly rendered it one of merriment, even to the poorest, exist no longer. Here, as elsewhere, the spirit of fun has departed. The only relic of the "good old times" that remains, is the procession of the bœuf gras, which was promenaded through the streets of the capital on Sunday and yesterday, though much shorn of its splendours. Numerous spectators filled the trottoirs, or joined the cavalcade in their carriages. If you have never chanced to see this procession, a slight account of it may not be unentertaining to you. The Municipal Guards, on horseback, open the pageant, followed by two heralds and eight drummers, in the costume of Louis XIV., and after them a band of the 14th Light Infantry. Then proceed on horseback those important personages, M. Rolland, butcher, owner of the bœuf gras, and M. Cornet, the grazier. A motley assemblage on horseback, drawn up in two files, follow, amongst whom are Louis XIV. with a nobleman of his Court; Louis XIII., three Chinese Mandarins, the Emperor of Morocco, two Moorish Princes, Francis I., and his attendant; Henry III., and his attendant, the Provost of Paris: two Pages of Francis I., the Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Lorraine, besides numerous pages and gentlemen of the time of Louis XIV. and Charles VI. After them comes the enormous Pere Goriot himself, richly caparisoned, his head ornamented by a large plume of feathers, surrounded by sacrificers, lictors, conductors, &c. He is followed by a golden-wheeled chariot, with crimson velvet drapery, drawn by four horses, covered with skins from head to foot, led by Time, bearing comme de rigueur his immense scythe. The chariot is occupied by Cupid, Jupiter with his thunderbolts, Apollo, Hercules, Mercury, and all the other deities of Olympus en grand costume. This whimsical medley of heterogeneous personages is certainly laughable, but does not make up for the bon bons, the masques, and the jollity of the ancient Carnival.

Amidst the parting splendours of the season, which, like the fabled colours of the dolphin, redoubled in brilliancy as they approached their term, the ball of the Liste Civile and the Polish ball were the most remarkable. The ball of the Civil List was, as usual, attended by the élite of the faubourg St. Germain, amongst whom were those distinguished legitimists, the Duke de Levis, Marquis de la Rochejacquelin, M. Berryer, and Viscount Walsh. The peculiar character of the old aristocracy pervaded this brilliant assemblage; the union of richness and simplicity in the toilettes, and the courteous dignified bearing, recalled the days of the ancien régime. Polkas and mazurkas prolonged the dancing till four in the morning; 3000 persons were present. The Polish ball, given under the auspices of the Princess Czartoriska, at the hotel Lambert, presented a scene of great magnificence. The splendid apartments of the amiable princess, refulgent with light, were filled with ladies covered with diamonds, amongst whom the Marchioness of Aylesbury was, as usual, remarkable. A magnificent gallery had been constructed in the principal court yard, which was converted into an immense ball-room, where the fountain in the midst, surrounded by flowers, paintings, and lights, gave to the whole a fairy-like aspect. The mazurkas, above all, executed with truly national grace and spirit, were admirable. The one which was danced by the Countess Nansouty, the Marchioness of Aylesbury, Mdlle. Villiers, and Madame de Mackaw, and several other noble foreigners, excited general enthusiasm. The ball lasted until seven o'clock in the morning; 3500 persons were present, and the receipts are said to amount to fifty thousand francs.

The Arab chiefs have left Paris for Marseilles, delighted with their reception here. Unfortunately, all their countrymen do not partake in their cordial feelings, and it appears that Marshal Bugeaud has received formidable accounts of the hostile preparations of Abd-el-Kader, who has formed an army of 8,000 men, among whom 3,000 are, it appears, subjects of the Emperor of Morocco, in order to re-commence in the spring their struggle for independence. Algiers itself is becoming daily of more importance to the French, and more peopled with French subjects. Modistes now go over there to make their fortunes, and every description of trade flourishes. As a sample of the increase of the Christian population there, I have only to tell you that the number of baptisms, which in 1830 was only one during the whole year, augmented in 1844 to 1,025; and the marriages, of which in 1830, there were none—in 1831, only 9—amounted in the past year to 270.

You have, ere this, had tidings of the elevation of M. de Salvandy to the post lately occupied by M. de Villemain, of Minister of Public Instruction. I have sincere pleasure in announcing to you the restoration of the latter to his wonted soundness of intellect, which was fully attested by an admirable letter he wrote to the Duc de Cazes the other day, expressing his gratitude for the generous intentions of Government towards his family, and, at the same time that he refuses to accept the provision destined for his children, declaring that his fortune, though not large, was sufficient for their maintenance, besides, that he trusted to be yet enabled to be useful to them. The ex-Minister also hints that his resignation had been somewhat prematurely accepted by the Government. We hear that he has taken a house at Chaillot, where the perfect calm and quiet of the country will, it is hoped, confirm his recovery, having given up, in compliance with the earnest intreaties of his friends, his desire of resuming his seat at the Academy. It is said that M. de Salvandy will shortly be elevated to the French peerage.

Amongst the many traps laid by the Parisian shopkeepers for unwary customers, one of the most novel and successful is the following:—A commis, dressed in the last extreme of elegance, promenades with fashionable nonchalance the front of the shop. When a grisette, with longing eyes, stops to contemplate the merchandise she has it not in her means to purchase, the graceful shopkeeper advances, inviting her to enter, with the assurance that the sight will cost her nothing. Once allured into the shop, and bewildered by envying admiration, she has not fortitude to resist the offer of the commis, who, in an undertone, begs her to accept the article she most admires. But, alas! for the treachery of man! before she has left the shop the insidious clerk calls out to the cashier the price of the article she has taken, and the poor grisette is obliged to pay the cost of her vanity.

FRANCE.

Nothing of political consequence has occurred in Paris during the week. The proceedings in the Chamber have been without interest. The only matter of discussion for the Paris press, therefore, has been the dismissal of Count de St. Priest, Minister Plenipotentiary of France, at Copenhagen, and M. Drouin de Lhuis. Both these functionaries voted against the Government on the Address. The Opposition consider the dismissal of these gentlemen as an arbitrary act on the part of M. Guizot. In the case of M. de Lhuis the step is, however, justified by the Débats upon very reasonable grounds. That paper says:—"The dismissal of M. Drouin de Lhuis, because it was not only just, but necessary and indispensable. M. Drouin de Lhuis was director of the commercial division at the Foreign-office. The person filling that situation is initiated by his position into all plans and negotiations relating to treaties of commerce. His functions place him in daily contact with the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and he is in some measure the intimate and confidential secretary of the Minister. The first condition required from a person filling such a situation, is a perfect accord, a strict conformity of views, and a cordial understanding with the Minister. Suppose, for example, that M. Guizot wished to negotiate a commercial treaty with England on the basis of a cordial understanding, M. Drouin de Lhuis, an open or secret partisan of M. Thiers or of M. Billault, would give full vent to his mistrust of the foreigner, and to his prejudice against the English alliance. Parliamentary liberty and the independence of a deputy are fine terms, but the good direction of affairs and the necessities of the Government are still more important considerations."

The Revue de Paris announces that letters from M. Bruat had been received by the Minister for Foreign Affairs, in which the Governor of the Marquesas mentions his having adopted measures calculated to effect, without any unpleasant complication, the transition from the régime of "absolute possession" to that of the "protectorate." We have not heard," says that paper, "if M. Bruat mentions having completely succeeded in the accomplishment of his moderate and pacific intentions; but we apprehend that such has not been the case, for a report prevails that fresh scenes of revolt and collision occurred at Tahiti after the receipt of the despatches enjoining the immediate restoration of Queen Pomare."

The Moniteur contains an ordonnance appointing Baron de Belling Envoy Extraordinary to the King of Denmark, in the room of Count de St. Priest; and another appointing M. de Lambert Director of the Commercial Department, in the office of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in the room of M. Drouin de Lhuis.

SPAIN.

Our letters from Madrid, of the 29th ult., state that General Prim was liberated, at Cadiz, on the 24th, and was shortly expected in the capital. The Baron de Meer was also on his way thither. General Serrano, who had been placed of late in a sort of exile, was said to have been ordered to the capital; and General Jose de la Concha, Captain-General of the Basque provinces, had been likewise sent for.

The two Queens and the Infanta were present on that day at a funeral service celebrated in the Convent of Atocha, and for the repose of the soul of Donna Carlotta, wife of the Infante Don Francisco de Paula.

There was a grand review of troops on the 28th, at which the Queen was present. Her Majesty made her appearance on horseback, dressed in a blue riding-habit and round hat, with the insignia of a captain-general of the army on the sleeves. General Narvaez rode on one side of her Majesty, and General Mazarredo on the other. The Marchioness of Castelar, Marquis of Malpica, and several other members of the household, followed immediately behind the Queen, on horseback. The Queen Mother and the Infanta Louisa came after, in an open carriage, with General Butron on one side, and General Rivera on the other; a large suite of officers followed, together with several other carriages, and two squadrons of Lancers. The Queen looked animated and cheerful, but her countenance does not indicate health. She passed down the whole line, and on her return to the Prado, got into the carriage, after which the troops marched by, giving vivas by word of command as they passed in succession before the Queen.

TAHITI.

The Rev. Mr. Howe, one of the missionaries of the London Missionary Society, has just arrived in Liverpool, direct from Tahiti, which island he left on the 27th of August. Mr. Howe has given the following particulars of the present state of that and of the other islands of the Society Group:—

"The whole population of Tahiti, and the other islands claimed by the French, were in arms against them, and they were masters of nothing beyond what they occupied in Tahiti itself. They could not move a mile from Papiti without being attacked by the natives, who were determined to resist to the last. The total French force consisted of about 1000 men, and of the natives there were, either in Tahiti or the adjoining islands, from 4000 to 5000 determined men in arms, resolved to resist them to the last. Already from 200 to 250 of the French had fallen in attacking the strong position taken by the natives, of whom about 100 had also lost their lives. Queen Pomare had refused to have anything to do with the French. She had joined her subjects in one of the adjoining islands, and was determined either to live or die a Queen."

In the same vessel with Mr. Howe and his wife were Mr. and Mrs. Jesson, their three children, and Mrs. M'Kean, the widow of the late Rev. J. S. M'Kean, who was shot while standing in his own verandah, at Point Venus, during the battle fought between the French and the natives immediately before their departure. The missionaries are entrusted with letters from Queen Pomare to the Queen of Great Britain, also to the directors of the London Missionary Society, and an address to the Christian churches throughout the kingdom.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.—Sir George Clerk is appointed Master of the Mint. Lord Jocelyn will be appointed to office—we presume to the Lordship of the Admiralty, vacant by the nomination of Mr. Corry to be Secretary to that Board. Mr. Cardwell has been appointed Secretary to the Treasury in the room of SirG. Clerk.

THE FOUNTAINS IN TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.—On Monday workmen commenced the erection of the masonry in the basins of Trafalgar-square, previous to the laying down of the pipes. The blocks are of red granite, and each weighs several tons. The works are expected to be completed in about two months.

THE NEW CONSERVATIVE CLUB HOUSE.—The new conservative Club House, erected on the site of the late Thatched House Tavern, is to be opened with great ceremony on Monday, previous to which it will be inspected by Prince Albert. At the ceremony on Monday, it is understood the leading Members of her Majesty's Government, as well as a large number of the aristocracy, will be present, to partake of a splendid dejeuner, to which they have been invited. This mansion is one of the most stately and commanding that has for many years been erected in the metropolis.

THE AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION SOCIETY.—This Society had a dinner on Monday at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, at which nearly 1000 persons were present, including many members of Parliament connected with the agricultural interest. The chairman was the Duke of Richmond, and the Duke of Buckingham occupied the vice-chair. Lord Beaumont descanted upon the advantages arising from protection societies, and spoke unequivocally of the injury inflicted upon the agricultural interest, by what he termed those fatal measures, the last Corn Law, the Tariff, and the Canada Corn Bill. He declared that the Government had broken all their promises to the agriculturists, and asked derisively what had become of the 56s. a quarter which had been promised: that promise he said, like all the others, had been broken. The noble lord then urged the meeting to check any further attempt at relaxation, to exhibit their strength, and to endeavour to obtain some return for what they had suffered. The other speakers were Mr. Baker, of Writtle, Essex; Mr. Fisher Hobbs, of Mark's Hall, Essex; Mr. Buck, M.P.; Mr. W. Miles, M.P.; Mr. Newdegate, M.P.; Mr. S. Mills, of Enford, Wiltshire; Lord Malmesbury, Mr. Sotheron, M.P., Mr. Stafford O'Brien, M.P., the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Richmond, and Mr. Pusey, M.P. The speakers generally expressed strong dissatisfaction at the conduct pursued by the Government towards the agriculturists, and a determination to resist any further dimunition of agricultural protection. The assembly was altogether a very influential one.

AMERICAN HOPS.—Another attempt to take advantage of the new tariff has been made by the importation of some American hops. A quantity of thirty-eight bales, was on Monday put up for sale by auction by Messrs. Keeling and Hunt, of Monument-yard. The hops were pronounced by the trade to be of excellent quality; but the duty of £4 10s. per cwt., with the additional five per cent. and charges for freight is a prohibition to any large importation to this market, unless a scarcity should exist in the crop of English growth. The whole of those offered for sale by Keeling and Hunt will be exported.

MORTALITY IN LONDON.—The total number of deaths from all causes in the metropolis during the week ending last Saturday was 1,011—males, 507; females, 504. The deaths not caused by violence which were registered within the last thirteen weeks, with the mean temperature for the same periods, show for the most part an increase of mortality corresponding with a decrease of temperature. Thus, in the week ending the 23d of November, when the mean temperature was 44 deg. 5, the deaths not caused by violence were only 884; while in the week ending the 21st of December, when the mean temperature was 37 deg., the number of deaths, including those by violence, was 1,343. The weekly average of deaths for the last five winters has been 1039; but when the summer months are included, and the average taken for the last five years, it is reduced to 963. The total number of births in the week ending last Saturday was 1236—males, 626 females, 610.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

GAME AND GAMING.

The vexed question of poaching and preserving promises to be a popular subject with senators just now, and we shall see game occupying, during the present session, such a position in the counsels of Parliament as gaming did in the past. "The Gambling Committee of the Lords," as technical irreverence designated the body of peers who dealt with the proposition of protection for betting in connexion with the turf, pronounced against the convenience of any new measures in relation to such contracts; and there cannot be a doubt but that they arrived at a sound decision. Betting on horse-racing, in its legitimate character, was confined to wagers among the owners of horses, who backed their coursers in the spirit of honourable emulation. Presently it went out of bounds, extended over all sorts of persons and places—found for itself a ring—or preserve of legs and levanters, and what not—and became a nuisance. In this state of things the legislative assembly was required to provide a remedy for a plague which the patients had created for themselves—and very properly refused to turn St. Stephen's into a place of refuge for voluntary lunatics. They are now to be asked what they will do with the Game Laws? The inquiry is, perhaps, a more difficult one—certainly a more serious, involving, as its matter has done and may do, so much of the grave!—what then ought they to do?

The statutes relating to the preservation of game were enacted at a period when shooting was pursued as an amusement, and the wild animals were protected for the purposes of sport. Anon a strong head of game became one of the appurtenances of the gentlemen of enterprise and spirit, and a Derby-book another. Then the device of laying round was introduced, whereby wagers and stakes might be "hedged" without loss; and to it succeeded the act for legalizing the sale of game, whereby a sporting establishment could be hedged—with a profit. When wagers were considered to be sufficiently secured on the principle of their being debts of honour—and game was protected by law that it might minister to rural pursuits and healthful exercise, betting round and battueing was as little thought of, as that a race-horse should travel faster to Doncaster than he should run for the Leger. It is absurd to suppose that the institutors of the statutes for the protection of game ever intended to confer upon individuals the privilege of devastating their neighbourhoods with hordes of birds and beasts which should lay waste the hope of the harvest: they were not framed for the purpose of dealing with hares and pheasants as articles of barter and commerce. The existing movement against these laws is, no doubt, the effect of a temporary cause. The extreme pressure to which the agricultural population is now subjected, in consequence of a bad season in 1844, has given rise to some lamentable affrays between gamekeepers and poachers—which in a time of plenty might not have occurred. But the fashionable system of growing a prodigality of game is unwholesome—unsafe—and the taste it caters for wholly opposed to English habits and sympathies. Sporting is a national affair in this country: popular because it is essentially popular in its spirit. Such is not the character of the battue; it is exclusive, and therefore unsportsmanlike, and therefore unpopular. We have said that, had last autumn been more prolific, we might have been spared those rural tragedies which have so recently been enacted; perhaps it would be wise, at all events, to wait the issue of a season of fruitfulness to observe its effect. It is not, indeed, probable—constituted as the majorities in the House of Commons are—that any very decisive changes will be effected in the Game-laws. Such a step, however, whatever its wisdom or otherwise, does not appear to be called for by the occasion. Those enactments are chiefly managed by country gentlemen, the parties most interested in their wise administration. Let these interpret them rather in mercy than by the letter of justice. But, should the Legislature determine on interference, let the experiment be the repeal of the bill legalising the traffic in game.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The acceptance for the Chester Cup exceeds the most sanguine expectations, and effectually answers the cavillers against the handicap; some will say, perhaps, that the fact of all Lord George Bentinck's horses, except Pug, having been scratched, is not complimentary to those who drew up the weights; but the secret of this, we suspect, is that the noble lord was determined to punish those who had forestalled the stable—Clumsy and Nereus, had they stood, would have been prominent favourites. The betting this afternoon was brisk, if not heavy, the following horses having strong parties:—Semiseria, Cataract, Obscurity, Pug, The Era, Agriculture, and Corranna; the other horses mentioned below, were not in much demand. For the Derby, the run was in favour of Mentor, Pantasa, Iron Master, (a great "pot," and expected to be qualified), the Laird-o'-Cockpen, Miss Whip colt, and Fuzbos. The "cracks" remain as before.

DEATH OF THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM STURGES BOURNE.—We regret to record the demise of the above right hon. gentleman, who expired on Saturday last, at Testwood House, near Southampton, after an illness of several weeks. The deceased, William Sturges Bourne, was son of the Rev. John Sturges, Chancellor of Winchester. He was born in 1769, and married, 1808, Miss Bowles, daughter of Mr. Oldfield Bowles, of North Ashton, Oxon. On the death of his maternal uncle he assumed the name of "Bourne," in addition to his patronymic. He sat for a period of above thirty years in the House of Commons, having represented Hastings, Christchurch, Bandon, Ashburton, and Milbourne Port, in Parliament. On the passing of the Reform Bill he retired altogether from political affairs. The deceased was instrumental in introducing the vestry statute which bears his name—"Sturges Bourne's Act." He was Lord Warden of the New Forest, a sort of honorary situation, which he had held ever since 1827.

DEATH OF THE MARQUIS OF SLIGO.—We regret to state that accounts have been received of the death of the Marquis of Sligo. The noble earl had been in diplomatic service, and was formerly Governor of Jamaica. He was born in 1788. The deceased marquis, though professedly a Whig, had not mixed up in party matters for many years past.

THE LATE MURDER AT SALT-HILL.—Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, who has been specially retained, in conjunction with Mr. Montague Chambers, for the defence of the accused, has, it is stated, received a fee of three hundred guineas. The assizes take place on the 10th of March.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.—The usefulness of the electric telegraph was strikingly demonstrated on Tuesday afternoon. Messrs. Cooke and Wheatstone obtained a newspaper copy of the Queen's Speech, and transmitted the whole of it from Paddington to Gosport in from three to four thousand signals, in less than two hours. It was transcribed, printed, and circulated among the authorities at Gosport and Portsmouth. Had the line of communication extended to Falmouth, the transmission would have been made in precisely the same period of time.

EXTRAORDINARY OCCURRENCE ON THE SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY.—On Monday the train which leaves Nine-elms terminus for Gosport at one o'clock, had arrived within a quarter of a mile of the station at Winchester, when the engine-driver observed a man walk on to the railway, and throw himself across the rails. The action was so instantaneous, that it was impossible to stop the train in time. The train, however, did not pass over him, but the guard attached in front of the engine to clear the rails from any impediment, struck the unfortunate man a tremendous blow on the back of his neck, driving him several yards clear of the rails, and causing his immediate death. He was one of the Hants rural constabulary, and was stationed on duty in the neighbourhood of Winchester. From subsequent inquiries it appeared that on the same day the deceased had made two previous attempts to get on the line whilst the train was approaching, but was driven away by the servants of the company. On Tuesday afternoon an inquest was held on his body at the White Swan, Winchester, and the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," with a nominal deodand of 1s. on the engine. The jury were also unanimously of opinion that no blame was attributable to the company.

SUDDEN DEATH OF A JUROR.—On Wednesday night an inquest was held before Mr. Payne, at the New Inn, Old Bailey, on the body of Mr. William Hitchcock Steet, aged 45, of Titchfield-street, Oxford-street, plumber and glazier, who was seized with a sudden illness on Monday morning, while sitting as a juror at the Criminal Court, of which he died the same evening. On his being taken ill he was immediately removed to the air, and placed on a stool, when he cried out "Bleed me." But he was beyond medical aid. Verdict—"Apoplexy."

EVENING MELODIES.—NO. V.

The Child's Mystery.

Why do you wear that rose
Amidst your shining hair?
Its faded lustre throws
No hue of glory there!
Its leaves, that once were red,
Are yellow with decay:
Oh, sister, it is dead—
Do throw that rose away!

I'll bring you flowers so new,
That when this morning's dawn
First shed its pearls of dew
Those flowers were yet unborn!
I'll pluck the pets of Spring;
I'll rob the garden's pride;—
But that poor withered thing—
Do cast it quite aside!

There, let me climb your seat
And then I'll take and crush
Its petals 'neath my feet;—
Oh, sister, why that flush?
Nay, if when roses die,
You like them still to stay,
Indeed I will not try
To take that one away.

But when within our sight,
Beneath you sky of blue,
Spring rosebuds, young and bright,
And therefore most like you!
When verdure's on the tree,
And beauty on the bower,
It does seem odd to me,
You love that poor dead flower!

A LAZY FELLOW.

The laziest man in Newfoundland is John Jingles, who employs a nigger to sneeze for him, and pays the coloured gentleman a dollar a day.

POPULAR FEELING IN AMERICA.

The popular sentiment of "Git out the way, old Dan Tucker," is contrary to every requirement of hospitality, to every social and humane feeling, and to the spirit of the age in which we live.—New York Paper.

AN EXCUSABLE BLUNDER.

A clergyman, who had in the lottery of matrimony drawn a share that proved to him worse than a blank, was experiencing a severe scolding from his Xantippe, when he was called upon to unite a pair in the blessed state of wedlock. The poor priest, actuated by his own feelings and experience, rather than by a sense of his canonical duty, opened the book and began, "Man that is born of a woman hath but a short time to live, and is full of trouble," repeating a part of the burial service. The astonished bridegroom exclaimed, "Sir, sir, you mistake; I came here to be married, not buried." "Well," replied the clergyman, "if you insist on it, I am obliged to marry you; but, believe me, my friend, you had better be buried."

THE NETHERLANDS.

The population of the Netherlands was, according to the official reports, on the 1st of January, 1844, as follows:—Provinces of—Northern Brabant, 394,406 inhabitants; Gueldersland, 363,169; Southern Holland, 551,173; Northern Holland, 459,133; Zetland, 157,486; Utrecht, 151,179; Friesland, 239,673; Overyssel, 207,907; Groningen, 184,019; Dreuthe, 78,854; Limbourg, 200,573. Total inhabitants, 2,988,172.

THE POPULATION OF POLAND.

The Breslau Gazette states that the population of Poland was, in 1843, 4,700,734 souls, being an increase since 1829, of 643,802. The population, under the last census, is thus divided—4,175,598 Christians, 295 Mahometans, and 524,491 Jews. This last-named class has increased 143,349 since 1829.

A HINT ABOUT COURTSHIP.

A man, to be successful in love, should think only of his mistress and himself. Rochefoucauld observes, that lovers are never tired of each other's company, because they are always talking of themselves.

LOUIS PHILIPPE AND THE AMERICAN LADY.

At one of the late "receptions" at the Chateau of the Tuileries an unusually large number of "American citizens" was presented. With his usual tact and affability the King managed to speak with and captivate every one of the party. A fat Kentuckian lady, overpowered by the bonhommie of the adroit Sovereign, exclaimed in the overflow of her feeling, "Law, King Philippe, how you do talk English!"

THE POACHERS' HUTS.—A SONG OF THE GAME LAWS.

There are three silent cottages
Within a leafy nook;
Beyond them runs the wild high road,
Behind them trills the brook.
The trees that shade them round were once
Young beeches from yon park;
But they have grown to fold them in,
As if to keep them dark!

A sort of gloomy loneliness
Hangs round them like a shroud,
The hidden chimney sends not up
A single curling cloud,
Against the night air there doth trail
No vapour white and thin,
To tell that Life is dressing food
Or burning fire within!

There is no food, there is no fire,
To warm the living there!
But human beings nursing up
Fear, Hunger, and Despair!
And for the meat and for the coal,
Where craving Nature calls,
Guns rest against the bolted doors
And nets hang on the walls!

The lurcher dog grows stealthy-low
Upon his old hearth-throne,
The living creatures dare not howl—
Their mis'ry may but groan!
But they can out of anguish pluck
Oh! many a lawless thought,
And tempting promptings still urge on,
The spirit, till it's caught!

The old men brood, as though dark thoughts
Did the heart's current clog:
The young glance sulky bodeful looks,
At net, and gun, and dog!
Mother, we're hungered—give us food,"
Is still the children's prayer;
My babes, close by—there run and fly
The plump bird and the hare!"

The guns are in young stalwart hands!
The nets on shoulders wide!
The lurcher dog hath crouched away
From the fireless hearth-side!
Silent as thieves! the desperate group
Have gone towards the wood!
God send their path, this darksome night,
Be not a track of blood!

The inmates of those pauper huts
Wait with a wild un-rest,
Pale looks, and anxious hearts that beat
Loud in the quailing breast!
Mother and children huddle close
In all their want and woe;
While the wretched old men sit and think,
And murmur curses low!

Hush! there is at one little door
A gentle tap—no din
Of latch or lock! but a man and dog
Slink stealthily within!
The thick game spreads the floor! the dog
Is clay-beslimed and wet;
And the young man's brow is very cold,
But still is dropping sweat!

Ha! soft the coach-guard's bugle winds
Along the dark high road—
"Ho, youngster, you have brought to-night
A goodish weighty load."
Panting, the young man grasps the coin,
And away the coach has sped—
To-morrow the starved and thin within
Will have fire, and meat, and bread!

Voices and footsteps pass without—
"Quick! quick! unbar the door!
And let us lay this dying man
Upon his own home-floor!
There's been a black and bloody strife
Within the wood to-night,
So the beer crib there must be our lair,
Till we start with the morning light."

The mother tendeth her wounded boy
With a wailing wild and low,
Till death draws over his faint pale brow,
And his blood hath ceased to flow.
Gone without ever a word of God,
Ere the breath of the morning gale
Fann'd the fevered brain of his comrades twain
As they trod in chains to gaol!

* * * * *

A trial for murder is on to-day,
Done in a great Lord's wood,
Where the keeper of game at night was slain,
And the grass laved red with his blood!
A fatal ball from his trusty gun
Struck one of the poacher crew,
And but now a verdict of "Guilty—death"—
Is passed on the other two!

Without the cold unpitying gaol
The shivering culprits, hear!
As loud and slow to the crowd below
They speak these words of fear:—
"We are not hanged for villanous theft,
Nor yet for the spilling of blood—
But because of the plump and plentiful game
That was wild within the wood."

Oh no! those erring men were wrong—
They were hung for a reckless sin;
Though pity may be for the starving fate
To crime that lured them in!
But Oh! mend the cold and cruel law,
That, when hunger goads despair,
Perils in strife a human life
For the sake of bird or hare!

EFFECTS OF TRAFALGAR ON PITT.

On the receipt of the news of the memorable battle of Trafalgar (some day in November, 1805), I happened to dine with Pitt. I shall never forget the eloquent manner in which he described his conflicting feelings, when roused in the night to read Collingwood's despatches. Pitt observed that he had been called up at various hours in his eventful life, by the arrival of news of various hues; but that whether good or bad he could always lay his head on his pillow and sink into sound sleep again. On this occasion, however, the great event announced brought with it so much to weep over, as well as to rejoice at, that he could not calm his thoughts, but got up, though it was three in the morning.—Lord Fitzharris's Note-Book, 1805.

PROPERTY IN RAILWAYS.

It has been calculated that the traffic of the last six months of 1844, on the 38 principal railways in Great Britain, amounts to three millions and a quarter or more—exactly £3,264,450. This traffic has been carried on upon 1522 miles of railway, and 234 miles of branch lines, making in all 1756 miles. This revenue is £450,000 more than the corresponding half of last year, and amounts to about £4000 per mile per annum. The total sum available this half year for interest and dividends will be about £2,000,000, giving, for the value of all the important lines of the country, at 20 years' purchase, a sum of £80,000,000.

MILK AND BUTTER IN CHINA.

During his late visit to Manchester, Sir Henry Pottinger stated that in China he had never been in the habit of seeing either milk or butter, but when the young Englishmen at Chusan were determined to have milk to their tea, they set some of the Chinese to work, and for the first milk they got paid a dollar. The consequence was, that the Chinese set their wits to work, and began to keep cattle, and to produce both milk and butter: and now the civic service in China was supplied with some of the finest milk and butter that existed in the world.

JUSTICE IN AMERICA.

The New York journals record the case of a Judge who got into a squabble in a "rummery" (a low public-house) at Brooklyn, opposite the city of New York, and in the melee received a black eye, with which graceful accompaniment he was seen next day sitting on the judicial bench, sentencing to fine and imprisonment wretches brought before him for drunkenness!

WELLINGTON'S AUTOGRAPH, WRITTEN ON THE FIELD OF WATERLOO.

The stranger in passing through the M.S. room of the British Museum may have had his attention directed to an autograph suspended in a small unostentatious frame against the wall; and that autograph, if he be an Englishman, he will not readily forget. On horseback, on the field of Waterloo, in the midst of all the tumult and carnage of that terrible conflict, the steady hand of Wellington traced those characters, and his calm mind cast up the reckoning there inscribed, and disposed of the issue.

COUNTRY NEWS.

MURDER AT LEEDS.—At an early hour on Sunday morning last, Elizabeth Nicholls, a woman about 40 years of age, died in consequence of injuries inflicted by her husband, who is now in custody on the charge of having killed her. It seems that the deceased and her husband, who is a journeyman joiner, to whom she had been married for several years, and by whom she had one child did not live together on the most amicable terms, owing to her intemperate habits. On Saturday evening the husband, Joseph Nicholls, went home about half-past eleven o'clock, and not finding his wife in the house, he went out to seek for her. Having found her in a public house the worse for liquor, he commenced abusing her. However, they went home together, but quarrelled on the road, and he kicked her several times, and said he would be the death of her. Nobody interfered between the parties, as it was not supposed that anything serious would occur; but about two o'clock in the morning some of the neighbours called a police officer into Nicholls's house, and when the officer got there the poor woman was lying dead in the house, having, there is little doubt, died from injuries inflicted upon her by her husband, who was slightly in liquor at the time of the fatal occurrence.

FRIGHTFUL COAL-PIT ACCIDENT.—One of those terrific torrents of water which occasionally burst in upon the workmen employed in the coal pits, visited those employed in the mines (Hayes Wood) of William Coxeter James, Esq., near Finsbury, Somersetshire, at an early hour on Tuesday morning. The workmen and boys, to the number of nearly 100, descended the pit at four o'clock in the afternoon: after engaging in their usual vocations for upwards of an hour, an alarm was given by those at the extremity of the pit (a distance of more than a mile from the mouth) that the water was rushing in. The greatest terror now seized every breast. The apparatus for raising the coal (the only means of escape which they possessed) would not hold more than 14, and those who succeeded in reaching the mouth of the pit had to be drawn up in batches, as many as could possibly enter the box, others clinging to the sides and by the ropes. This was required to be done seven or eight times, and by the time the last portion were extricated from their perilous condition the water reached to their shoulders. Ten persons could not be found on Tuesday, and from the position which they occupied in the pit at the time of the accident, being more than a mile from the mouth, no doubt is entertained by those who know the pit, that they have met with a watery grave.

ALLEGED MURDER AT HULL.—A cabinet-maker named Thomas Mattocks, about forty years of age, living in Dagger-lane, Hull, was taken into custody on Wednesday, on suspicion of having murdered his wife, and then set fire to her remains. The poor woman was found by a policeman, about two A.M., in her husband's house, quite dead, with her clothes on fire, and her flesh roasted almost to a cinder. The prisoner made no attempt to extinguish the flames, and when the policeman was going for some water for that purpose, he attempted to make off, but was taken into custody. The prisoner was brought up before the borough magistrates, who remanded him for further examination. An inquest was held on the body, which has been adjourned.

A MOTHER CHARGED WITH BURNING HER CHILD TO DEATH.—A most barbarous and revolting murder is supposed to have been committed at a village called Lammonby, in the vicinity of Penrith, Cumberland, on the afternoon of Wednesday last. A woman named Jane Crosby, whose husband keeps a small inn at Lammonby, has been lately very much addicted to drinking, and the husband frequently reprimanded her for her misconduct. They had two daughters about the ages of nine and ten years, and the younger of these children, who was the father's favourite, frequently informed him that her mother had been intoxicated whilst he was absent. The mother consequently disliked the child, and it would appear that she determined to murder it. The particulars of the horrible crime as stated by the other child are these:—On Wednesday afternoon she undressed the child, and having first hidden the clothes in a closet in the house, made a large fire, and then took the girl by the legs, held her over the fire with her face downwards, and laid her on the top grate bar until the poor child's flesh was literally all burnt off its face, and death terminated its sufferings. She then, it appears, took the child off the fire, and called in at a neighbour's house, and stated that the child had been left in the house along with her little sister, and its clothing having caught fire, it had been burnt to death during her absence at a farm-house about two miles from Lammonby. The story was very much doubted by the neighbours, and, on looking at the remains of the poor child, the shift it had on, when found, had only been partially burned about the neck and breast, but the back part was whole. As no pieces of the burned clothes had been found about the fireplace, or in the kitchen, their suspicions became excited. The coroner was accordingly informed of the suspicions. On the inquest the circumstances were made known, and the house having been searched, the child's clothes were found wrapped together, concealed in a closet. On further inquiry, it was found that the accused had perpetrated the horrible crime in the presence of her other child, who was sitting in the kitchen at the time, and had been so frightened that she never mentioned it till questioned by the coroner and jury. The coroner adjourned the inquest until Monday next to give time to obtain some circumstantial evidence necessary to elucidate the case, and in the mean time ordered the woman to be taken into custody.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE ALLEGED CASE OF POISONING, AT UXBRIDGE.—On Thursday Thos. Francis Dickman, aged 19, was indicted for administering a quantity of oxalic acid to his wife, on the 15th of January, at Uxbridge. Prisoner and his wife had lived very unhappily together, and the wife before her marriage had a child, of which, however, the prisoner was aware. At breakfast that morning, after he left home, his wife and her sister noticed that the coffee had a peculiar appearance, and tasted sour. She drank one cup and soon after became very ill, but after taking an emetic felt better. The sugar and coffee were taken to a chemist's, who detected oxalic acid in the sugar, but, as he stated in evidence that there was only one part of it to twenty of sugar, and that though it might cause pain, so small a quantity would not prove fatal to an adult, on the suggestion of the Learned Judge, who stated that there was no evidence to show how he obtained the oxalic acid, or that he put it in the sugar, the jury returned a verdict of "Not Guilty." He was also indicted for administering oxalic acid to John Francis Dickman, his child, but there was no evidence offered in support of the charge, and the jury a second time acquitted him.

POLICE.

A BARONET'S DAUGHTER CHARGED WITH A ROBBERY AT A SHOP.

At QUEEN SQUARE, on Saturday last, Miss Elizabeth Osborn, a fashionably-attired female, of about thirty-five years of age, who gave her address Earl's-court, Brompton, and represented herself to be the daughter of Sir John Osborn, was charged with stealing a pot of potted meat from the shop of Mr. Edward Allum, oilman and Italian warehouseman, Brompton.

J. Russell, shopman to the prosecutor, stated that a little after three o'clock that afternoon, he was serving a person in his master's shop, when he was attracted by the hurried manner in which the prisoner, who was being waited upon by another person, spoke. She had been there before as a customer, and he had observed the same peculiarity of manner about her. Immediately after this he saw her take up one of the pots of meat from a little stand on the counter, and then it appeared to him that she put it under her shawl; but seeing her moving the pots about with her hand immediately afterwards, he thought that she might have returned it. A boy who was then in the shop, being served, informed him that he had seen the prisoner take the pot, and witness, on examination of the pots, missed one from the number. He then spoke to Mr. Allum, and the prisoner, having paid for a small piece of soap she had bought, left the shop. Witness followed her, and, after she had proceeded about thirty yards, asked her if she had paid for that pot of meat. At that moment she had a pot of meat in her hand, and said at first that she had purchased it at Archbutt's, and then at Gunter's. She then gave witness the pot she held in her hand, which was a pot of tongue, whilst that she had taken from prosecutor was either a pot of beef or of game. The pots in their shop had been arranged in the course of the day, and there was no tongue in the row from which she had taken the pot. The pot given to him by prisoner was wrapped in different paper to that used at his master's shop, and he asked her whether she had any objection to accompany him either to Archbutt's or Gunter's, when she replied that she had not. At that moment a Mr. Flather's porter came up, and said something about a lady who had been to their shop, and for whom he was looking. Witness and the prisoner then went towards Mr. Gunter's, and, on arriving in Sloane-street, at the very moment she was crossing a grating, prisoner dropped a pot on the grating; it broke, and some of it went through. Witness picked up all that he could, and found that it was a pot of beef, and so marked on the outside, with also the maker's initials. Witness then asked her if she had any more of them, and if so, not to drop them. Prisoner then took one from under her arm, and said she had purchased it and immediately afterwards that a lady had given it to her at Fulham; that was a pot of game. They then went to Gunter's, where witness ascertained that she had purchased one pot of meat there; but as she had the other he detained her. Prisoner then said she would pay him for all the pots, if he would let her go, when he replied that he would not for three times the value. She then said she would give him three times the value; he, however, refused to let her go, and sent for a policeman. During the time they were waiting for him prisoner amused herself by tearing the covers of a ream or half ream of note paper, which witness picked up. On the arrival of the police she was given into custody; and, on her way to the station, tore up some of the reams of paper, three or four sheets at a time. Some rice and groats were found on her person, which she said she had bought at Archbutt's. He found on part of the covers of the paper which he had picked up, "179, Sloane-street." Prisoner said she bought the tracts, four of which were also found upon her, at that address, but she did not say much about the paper. In answer to the clerk's inquiries, witness said one pot was found upon her (the one produced by her, and above alluded to,); it was either game or beef. Those potted goods were nearly all made by the same person. The pot prisoner purchased at Gunter's was tongue. The maker of Gunter's was the same who made for prosecutor.

Thomas Gosmer, a lad about fifteen or sixteen years of age, said he lived with Mr. Edward Faulkiner, 3, Edward-street, Knightsbridge. Witness was at Mr. Allum's at a little after three that afternoon (having been sent to buy some Parmesan cheese), when he saw the prisoner take a pot of meat and place it under her shawl. She took it from a row on the counter. Witness told the young man, and when she was served with the soap she went out.

Thomas Rowland, 135 B, said that he took the prisoner at Gunter's door, in Motcombe-street. Prisoner said she would pay for the pots, and then there would be nothing more for witness to do with it. She started with witness to the station, when she offered him half-a-sovereign to let her go. Witness replied that he could not, if she gave him £1000. Prisoner then said that if he would let her go she would give him her address, and he could call, and she would give him much more than she had said. She tore up some blank paper as she went along. She was searched at the station by a female, and nearly half a ream of note paper, half a pound of rice, a packet of groats, half a pound of soap, and a purse with half a sovereign and four shillings were found upon her, besides some religious tracts. The constable observed that the lady said she had bought and paid for the things found in her possession, and did not steal them.

Miss Osborn handed a note to the magistrate, observing, "You will be kind enough to look at the address on this note which I received this morning from a friend. I merely produce it to show that I am the person I represented myself to be." The lady then stated that when she came out of the prosecutor's shop, into which she went, as she had been in the habit of doing, to make a trifling purchase, the shopman followed her and asked her if she had got a pot of tongue, and not, as he had stated in his evidence, a pot of meat. She replied she had bought it at Gunter's, which was the fact. She had been in the habit of making purchases at Archbutt's, Gunter's, and other places in the neighbourhood, and had bought some of the things found upon her at these places; the rest she had brought from home with her that day, as she was about to take them somewhere. As regarded dropping the pot, she assured the magistrate it was entirely the effect of accident; and, with reference to making an offer to the shopman to pay for the pots, it was, of course, a most disagreeable affair, which she was much annoyed at. She was entirely innocent; there was nothing proved against her, as the shopman evidently did not know his own pots, they being all alike. The lady, after a slight pause, continued, and observed that she had brought the potted meats from her own house that day, and the paper she had purchased, she believed, at Murray's.

This, as also the former portion of her defence, was given in a very incoherent manner.

Mr. Burrell asked her if she had any witnesses to call.—The lady replied in the negative.

Mr. Burrell intimated that she must be remanded.—Prisoner exclaimed, "Remanded!"

Mr. Burrell repeated the observation.—Miss Osborn: I bought the things. The shopman can't prove anything against me.

Mr. Burrell: He does to a certain extent.—Prisoner: I am Miss Osborn; of course you will allow me to go home?

Mr. Burrell: I cannot; I really cannot.—Prisoner: I have had potted meat and other things at my own house for some time. My servants can prove it.

Mr. Burrell: Have you any one here who can prove where you bought them?—Prisoner: I purchased them some time ago at some of the places I have mentioned. You will, of course, Mr. Burrell, permit me to return to my family. I am Sir John Osborn's daughter. Perhaps you will come and see him in the course of a few days.

Mr. Burrell: I cannot; I must do my duty.—Prisoner: You must take me home. My father will come and take me away. He'll not allow this.

Mr. Burrell: You must be remanded on this charge.—Prisoner: If I am not to go home, Mr. Burrell, where am I to go?

Mr. Burrell: You must go to prison. I must do my duty. It is painful—most painful—but I must do my duty.—Prisoner: You must come home with me and see my father.

Mr. Burrell repeated his last observation, and the lady was removed from the dock crying, and imploring the magistrate to release her.

She was remanded until the following Thursday.

The prisoner, who was much excited, was accommodated with pen and ink, and addressed a note to Lady Osborn and to a female friend, which she requested might be immediately conveyed.

She was then removed to Tothill-fields in the prison van.

On Monday a gentleman, who said he was an old friend of the family, came to the office, and inquired whether there was any opportunity of alleviating the lady's condition?—Mr. Bond, the magistrate, observed that he was not acquainted with the regulations of the prison.

The gentleman said that if magistrates or governors of prisons were to endeavour to ameliorate the condition of a respectable person, they would be immediately assailed on all sides, for making distinctions between the rich and poor. After a slight pause, the gentleman admitted that, to a certain extent, such distinctions were improper. He deeply regretted the situation in which the lady was placed; it was a most painful one for her family. He understood that she had been found with some groats, rice, and other things upon her?—The clerk said that such was the fact.

The gentleman said he had no doubt that she had purchased those things to give to some poor family. She was in the habit of visiting the poor, and relieving them.

Lady Osborn, who is, as may be conceived, in a very distressed state, was with her daughter for some hours, at the prison.

Miss Osborn was again brought up on Thursday, but no additional fact was elicited. The witnesses who had before made depositions, repeated their evidence, and were cross-examined by Mr. Clarkson on the part of the defendant. When this was done, Mr. Clarkson begged for a remand for a week or ten days, that he might be prepared to meet the case against his client, and also asked the magistrate to admit the prisoner to bail.

Mr. Burrell said all the magistrate had to look to was the security as to the prisoner again appearing, and upon Sir John Osborn and the Hon. Edmund Byng presenting themselves, they were accepted as the lady's bail.

Her own recognizances of £500, and the recognizances of Sir John and Mr. Byng in £250 were then accepted, and Miss Osborn was remanded until this day (Saturday) week.

SPRING-HEELED JACK AGAIN.—At BRENTFORD Police-office, on Wednesday, a butcher named Richard Bradford was charged with having frightened a number of women in the neighbourhood of Hanwell and Ealing, by personating "Spring heeled Jack." He was apprehended with a gown, shawl, and other accoutrements, but as none of the parties frightened appeared, he was discharged with a reprimand.

ROBBERY OF BANK OF ENGLAND NOTES.—At HAMMERSMITH Police-office, Angus Gillies, a respectably dressed man, about 35 years of age, full six feet high, who was formerly a police constable of the A division of the Metropolitan police, and also a constable in Edinburgh, and the Glasgow constabulary, was brought up for final examination before Mr. T. Paynter, on Wednesday, on a charge of having stolen the sum of £165 in Bank of England notes, the property of Mrs. Mary Lewis. The warrant upon which the prisoner was apprehended was issued at this court by Mr. Paynter, at the beginning of December last. This case has been already reported by us in its principal features. It will be recollected that the prisoner was paying his addresses to the prosecutrix, and had been intrusted with the notes to change for her, on going with her to buy a business in the City, when he pretended to have lost them out of his pocket. He afterwards went to Inverness-shire, where he was apprehended. The notes were traced to him. He was committed for trial.

ELECTION OF SHERIFFS, AND REGAL CEREMONY OF PRICKING THE SHERIFFS' ROLL.

The appointment of a sheriff is one which involves the good ordering of a county, and relatively that of the country at large. The election is, consequently regarded with feelings of intense interest by the public, and with manifold sentiments of local attachment by the resident population of the various counties. We have, therefore, felt that the ceremonies connected with the elevation of a gentleman to the dignity of a "lord of the shire" presented eligible subjects for illustration. But before we proceed to describe the scenes shown in our engravings, it may assist in giving an intelligible view of the subject if we first describe the office itself.

The Shire-reeve or Sheriff is an officer of almost patriarchal antiquity, and known by a corresponding name in most countries in Europe. Adelung observes, that the twelve judges appointed by Odin were called Greve. Both the officer and the name have, with some variations, been retained in Germany. The Graf of the Germans is, for the most part, a title of dignity, answering to the Count of the French, and the Earl of this country; and, in some cases, it is also the title of a Prince, as the Landgraf or Markgraf. Among the Anglo-Saxons, the Gerefa, or, as he was sometimes called, the Reeve, was an officer of justice inferior in rank to the Alderman. He was a Ministerial officer, appointed to execute processes, keep the peace, and put the laws in execution. He witnessed contracts, brought offenders to justice, and delivered them to punishment; took bail of such as were to appear before the shiregemote, or county court, and presided at the hundred court or folcmote. The Shire-Gerefa, Shire-Reeve, or Sherriff, was probably distinguished by the title of the King's Gerefa, because he more immediately executed the King's precepts, and sometimes sat in the place of the Alderman in the county court. He appears, also, to have been distinguished by the title of the Heh-Gerefa, or High-Sheriff. The Gerefa who acted in the tithing was called the Tithing-Reeve; he who acted in the byrig or burgh, a Borough-Reeve; and he who acted in the town, the Tun-Gerefa. The leading duties of this officer, in this country and the United States of North America, are the same as those performed by the Anglo-Saxon Gerefa, namely, of an executive, as distinguished from those of a judicial, kind.

Our account of the elective proceedings will be necessarily somewhat retrospective. On the morrow of St. Martin, 12th Nov., a Privy Council was held in the Court of Exchequer, to receive the report of the Judges of the persons eligible in the several counties to serve the office. On that occasion the chamber, which is the second and largest of the law courts in Westminster Hall, was crowded with country visitors, and in regard of the distinguished persons engaged in the transaction of business, presented an unusually gay appearance. On the bench sat the great representatives of every branch of the civil government, each one attired in his distinctive official costume. Commencing from the right hand, the eye first caught the spare figure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, robed in a gown of figured silk, trimmed with gold; then came two or three members of the Privy Council in comparatively private dresses; and to these succeeded the Lord Chancellor, looking brim full of caution, and resolved, apparently, that the right man should serve; Lord Denman—sagacious, mild, but determined; Sir Nicholas Tindal, full of wise saws and modern instances; Baron Parke, literally as sharp as a needle; and Sir James Graham, with several of his official associates, each one seeming to be calm and collected in the greatness of his might. In front of this "bed of justice," sat the Clerk of the Privy Council, the Justices Cresswell, Rolfe, and Coleridge, Baron Gurney, Justice Patteson, Baron Alderson, and the Chief Baron; and on the left of the bench, separated from the rest by a partition, sat the recording angel of the assembly, styled the "Remembrancer." Before this dread array, the shadow of an excuse against "serving" seemed to be simply an absurd venture. Nevertheless, such things were attempted. Few of the persons selected, seemed disposed to have the greatness of office thrust upon them; but to the honour of those who were ultimately chosen, it must be acknowledged that a determination was at once expressed to uphold the dignity of the office with the accustomed attention to its duties, and with a liberal regard to its renowned hospitality. At this meeting, the Judges reported the names of three fit persons for the office of Sheriff in each county; and of these the first on the list was chosen, except in cases where good reasons for exemption were shown. Some of these were, as might be expected, sufficiently ridiculous—every one seemed to be suddenly possessed with a sense of some paralysing infirmity: young men pleaded they were too old, rich men too poor, strong men too weak, and the like. But these subterfuges were held to be merely points of routine—things of course; the right men were chosen; and then, such was the general satisfaction, that the very sick amongst them took up their beds of complaint, and walked. The list thus made was again considered at a meeting of her Majesty's Ministers held on the 29th January, at the house of Lord Wharncliffe, President of the Council, when the excuses of the parties nominated were again examined, and the names finally determined for the approval of her Majesty in Council. This important decision was pronounced on Monday afternoon, at Buckingham Palace, by her Majesty, in the presence of the principal members of the Cabinet. The mode followed by the Queen in making her decision, is the ancient and singular one, technically termed "pricking" for the right man. We have said that three "good men and true" are named for each county, one only being wanted; these names are recorded seriatim, on a long sheet of paper which is called the Sheriffs' Roll. On the back of this roll, black lines, coincident with the names on the written side, are ruled a line for a name, and in resolving the question, it is the custom of the Sovereign dealing with the matter in hand, in the manner of a lot, to prick with a pin, or other convenient sharp instrument, through any one of the three names placed against a county; and the gentleman whose name is thus pricked, is adjudged to discharge the onerous but most honourable duties of the Shrievalty.

HER MAJESTY PRICKING THE SHERIFFS' ROLL.

This ceremony of pricking the list, is one of great antiquity, and at its original institution, did, unquestionably, give the nominee the chance of a Royal ballot; but now, in these responsible days, it is usual, we believe to relieve the Sovereign of all peradventure in her choice, by placing a pencil mark against the desirable name.

We subjoin the list:—

PRIVY COUNCIL IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER,—ELECTION OF SHERIFFS.

THE FOURTEENTH OF FEBRUARY:

A GOSSIP ABOUT THE DAY,

WITH

A STORY OF A VALENTINE.

Most—nay, we may as well lump in the whole year, and say all months—have their peculiar celebrations—their features of social idiosyncrasy—their days of episode and adventure in human life, and the world still dates many of its joys and sorrows from these milestones on the road of time—these guide-posts of our journey through thorns or flowers, to, ay, and far, far beyond, the grave.

To some the months of the year are like a fair, fantastic row of beautiful country cottages, built amid fields of plenty, inhabited by happy inmates, and with sunshine gleaming upon every window, and leaving brightness on the threshold of every door of the twelve. Others take them as so many cells of a workhouse or a prison, where happiness cannot come. But the large majority make an April of the entire time, and blend smiles and tears, cloud and sunshine, in the changing rainbow that spans their year of life.

Still, we live on, and know every month by its characteristics; and the leading records and landmarks of our Old English Almanacks do not pass away any more than the signs of the Zodiac vanish from the heavens.

Par exemple. March is still the month of early storms, and will carry the tempest upon its wings, social as well as meteorological—in spite of that amiable lady, Lady Day, whose only consolation to families is that in that quarter there is the less difficulty in raising the wind.

April, again, has provided society with a fancy for increasing the number of its fools—a measure which, periodically as it is carried, has always appeared to us to be totally unnecessary as the world is constituted.

Fools I vow,
Fools enow!

But to be an April-fool seems to be the acmé of that kind of distinction.

And society still has its puerile whim,
To ride on a rainbow, and slide down its rim!

May dawns upon us with a better pleasantry and begins to bring us flowers. In old times too it made our villagers happy—there were rural queens crowned, and we beat Lord Dudley Stuart hollow in our sympathy for the Poles—the English Poles—the Maypoles! Now in order that life may never be without its contrasts, we have dedicated that month of brightness to the sweeps, and its visions of beauty are peopled with dancing shovels and Jacks in the Green!

June is a sort of month of glory for us every way. The victories of Howe and Wellington blend with its warm and kindling breath. June is a great star in England's memory.

July is more for France—there the Gallic cock crows for three days over its Revolution, and a nation dates its liberty from the burning skies, and the red blood that ran in the streets of Paris! The grapes ripen fast too then—and the juice gets hot and rich, and has a tickling under its fruity skin to be squeezed by some embracing angel of a vintner, who will turn it into lafitte, chateau margaux, and champagne. On second thoughts then, July is as good for England as for France—for, manes of Bacchus! how should we ever get on without our wine? Any adventure must be pleasant that dates itself from the turning of the first dozen of claret into a bottle-guard of marines, and on parade—under the table!

August—the berry-brown month and the beginning ot harvest!—The wheat ripened! Ha! and this is a great month for horses, and from it they date their corn.

September! Well, mankind put on their sporting jackets, and boys that have grown out of stripling-ship look to fire their first shot in life. The birds that went up in spring now come down—the game of existence is more murdered than played—and even in the cities men walk with partridge canes!

October—ale, all ale!

November—fog, all fog—and Guys in every guise!

December—Christmas Day.

January—New Year's Day and Twelfth Night! These two months, the kings of the old and new—these are the very fathers of the families, the gods of the domestic Olympus, which is not exactly situated on high, like Jupiter's—but in the parlour and around the hearth.—It never mounts beyond the drawing-room, and doesn't scruple to descend to the kitchen fire.

For all this we believe that there are more data of human happiness and adventure to be gathered out of February than any other month, for

FEBRUARY IS THE MONTH OF VALENTINES!

The birds are spared by juvenile humanity—the cry of the rustic is no longer "What a many nestes!" and the love-doves are allowed to pair. Now is there beautiful marriage in the temple of Nature—and by the bright birth of spring the children of that wedding will be the heavenly spirits of the groves and skies! Whatever happiness the year brings us, the young birds harbinger in with song. The lark sings it at the gate of heaven—ay! and at the listening human heart that hears it from the earth. Nature may be said to revel then in the inexpressible joyousness of her own happy voice. There is much in the influence of birds upon the elevation or depression of the spirits of men; but more, far more, upon those of woman. Beranger cheers a friend going into exile with the promise of return; and he catches a simile, and a sweet one, even from the tuneless swallow that makes us dull when it leaves our homesteads, and glads us when it comes again.

The birds that winter puts to flight
Will all return in spring!

Continual imagery of the most lovely nature sparkles in the verses of our sweetest domestic poets, like gold upon the wings of the humming-bird; and even the departure of a fair and heavenly human spirit has made its flight towards the angels with the lark! Harvey thus paints the spring-death of a grief-struck maiden.

The lark is up, and in his flight upon his morning way,
But she shall be before him yet amid the purer day;
And half-way up at Heaven's gate from earth men heard him sing,
But Inez pass'd him in his flight, and with a lighter wing!

Coleridge has most honoured the nightingale; but still have birds and love been ever associated in the gentler thoughts of our kind. Even but a moment past we had stolen of our muse a BIRD SONG.

The bird that I cherished
Has dropt on its wing,
And the spirit has perished
That warmed it to sing;
And the light merry warble
That woe would assuage,
Has fled with that spirit
Away from its cage!

Hope, bird of my bosom,
That solaced my care,
In my heart of affection
Sang merrily there;
It is hushed—Hope is dying
Joy liveth not long;
Now my sad heart is sighing
For bird and for song!

And so—from this involuntary and natural association of imagery in the human mind—the metaphysical analogy which bore its link of beauty from the lovers of birds to the affections of our common family, the types of innocence and happiness which they shadowed forth to our purer thoughts and fancies—from these sprung Valentines. The young and fair, the brave and beautiful, were to date their loves from the loves of the feathered choristers, and the happiness of thousands of human beings was to begin with its memory from the wooing of a bird.

Valentines have lost much of their influence. They neither do the serious nor the merry mischief which they used. They once had a twofold character—half dangerous, half playful—now they winged the arrows of Cupid, now they revelled in the frolics of Puck. There was a sort of fantastic euphuism in some Valentines; they would smack of the grotesqueness of Elizabethan dandyism, and partake of the sly respect and prim mannerism of an ancient gallantry. But these were the Valentines of neutrality, which neither meant passion nor malice; they were the compliments which a young man would pay to girls of his acquaintance for whom he cared nothing.

The real strength of the Old English Valentine lay, as we said before, in two descriptions. One was the larking Valentine, which entered into the humour of the common and middle classes. Mistress Page and Mistress Ford would have sent such an one to Falstaff. The Merry Wives! the saucy chuckling Falstaff! Fun and mischief were its elements. Look! Gil Blas has copied one, instead of a sermon, for the Archbishop of Granada to preach on the next high-day: and Dulicea has sent one by Sancho Panza—a yard measure in a windmill—to Don Quixote! But to come to more modern times, and to stick to our own country, where, with all deference to Le Sage and Cervantes, we still feel most at home; to plunge, we say, into our English present, and—if this last thought be not official sacrilege—to imagine Sir James Graham opening Valentines in St. Martin's le Grand. What a source of agitation have we here!

A Comic Valentine for Sir James himself. Ode to a basin of workhouse broth, with fancy portrait of a French sigh, and the motto of "Soup here;" verses on boar hunting, to Brougham, with the question of "Why shouldn't one bore hunt another?—Cobden's petition to Peel to forbid sliding, and crimp all the skates—device, a bundle of foreign corn, and Peel boxing the ears! Again, poetry to the lessee of Vauxhall Gardens, with two portraits, one of the confidential friend of Don Carlos, and another of Brougham's place at Cannes—title, "The New Vauxhall, and the Modern Ranelagh!" Then, perhaps, a note and picture for Gibbs—a wall and a brook—the ledger on the wall, like Humpty Dumpty, getting a great fall into the brook, and the water running after it!—and so on.

But in the family of social life the Valentine Comic makes the sport—so as are the squibs and crackers in November, are the Valentines in February great guns for the toyshop! There you see them in every form of the amatory burlesque—in every phase of personality and caricature; and friends and acquaintances, and pretty men and ugly women, and people one has a spite against, and people one has a joke against, get letters such as never came before.

On St. Valentine's Day all the postmen get a pound of glaze made into soup, in the morning, to enable them to support the weight of the mischief they have to carry during the day. They form the real Metropolitan Delivery Company—those penny postmen—after all!

But we come now to the last description of Valentine, the real honest fervent missive of love, which often took this timid form of expression, this anonymous declaration of tenderness, which for the kingdom of sweet-heart-dom it dared not have spoken out until it had made soundings and discovered by the effect of the Valentine how the deep and dwelling fondness was likely to be received. Often, too, would meek and modest maidens make playful confession in these sweet epistles, and in after hours the rustic swains of our villages, were sure to trace the truth in the hearts and eyes of the blushing writers. These Valentines were really the innocent love-links of the humbler classes, and while they would infuse anxiety, and thought, and affection, and curiosity, and sometimes disappointment into a thousand minds—they often carried balm to a wounded heart, blessings to a happy spirit, and woke the first blush of felicities that were to crown a life!

One little incident—a single feature of which has been beautifully described by our Artist in his illustration of this rambling paper, may serve to disclose a glimpse of the happiness that has been sometimes heralded in by a Valentine.

* * * * * *

There had been a storm in the Channel on the night of the 13th of February, and vessels were lying at anchor in the Downs on the morning following—their captains and crews surveying the contingencies of damage that might have befallen them from the storm, and how many of them could go on or must put back to refit or repair. Some had shattered masts and rent sails—"shivered timbers," and torn canvass, and not a few were swinging upon one cable, the other having been snapped in the gale. Several boats were putting off for the coast shore, either for pilotage, or the opportunity of sending word of their want to the nearest harbour, so that the fresh tackle might be ready when the ship got round; others on the pretext of business, but with reasons that had truly more to do with their affections than their ships. Out of one of these boats a handsome young sailor landed upon the sands and bounded over the nearest cliff, which he descended on the other side, and making towards a copse of beautiful shrubbery, passed within it towards one of those lovely districts of scenery which fringe the coast of Kent—hidden only from the Channel's world of waters by the intervening woods and foliage screening the sea from sight, and giving an inland character to the rural landscape. Yet could the inmates of the pretty, straggling village, which the young sailor now saw beyond him, hear the far-sounding waters in the time of storm; and the voice of the wreck, and the booming signal of danger would make itself headed through the tempest in those peaceful homes.

The sailor threaded the copse, and was soon on the outskirts of the village—he crossed a stile—looked down a green meadow towards the garden gate of a rustic cottage beyond—saw a fair anxious girl fly from the window and bound along the flower-fringed path—and before he could reach the gate Blanche Woodham was in the arms of her lover. Poor girl, all her heart was with the being on whom she rested then, and her young and warm affections were fervently and honestly returned. But she was sad. Like the other girls of the village she had not been skipping about her cottage on the hoity-toity look out for a Valentine, nor had she ever opened one of the four or five which so innocent and beautiful a creature was certain to receive from the love-lavish admirers of the hamlet and its vicinity; but she had come forth to a heavy duty—the sadness of a "sweet sorrow"—the parting from her brave bel[illegible]d. Charley Russit went to meet her with his heart full—but made short w[illegible] of his parting with Blanche. He pressed her warmly to his heart—covered her sweet brow and tearful eyes with kisses—and, finding his own blinding his sight, put into her hands, as he clasped them over it, a small cased bible, saying—"Keep it for my sake, Blanche, and God bless you."—Then plunging from her and rushing across the meadow—not daring to look behind him—he was soon upon the cliff, and in the boat, and on the billow, and again on board the white-winged vessel that was to fly with him to the other end of the earth!

* * * * * *

One year had elapsed since the departure of young sailor Russit, and the fourteenth of February had come round again. The morning rose through a half frosty dawn, clear, cold, and bitter, and with that placid calm in the icy atmosphere which so often succeeds a winter storm. There had been a tempest, and poor Blanche had passed a night of terror from the oppressive visions which the storm had scattered through her sleep.

The inmates of the cottage were all astir; they are up with the birds on St. Valentine's Day, those rustic villagers; work and health are their portion—no town hours for them.

But Blanche took a whim into her head—a fitful fancy—that wore, withal, a half-superstitious piety. She had never opened the pocket-bible given her by her lover, when they had parted that day year! It was a perfect bijou of a book; so handsomely bound—so carefully encased in its new morocco cover: she had held it as a relic not to be touched till they should be again together; it should be as good when he came home as when he went away—she had been, or tried to be so—and the sacred treasure should be opened—her heart had whispered in its happiness—when they went to church! Besides, the large home-bible had a large full type, and she could read that more easily, and then no questions would be asked, and no idle curiosity teazing her about dear Charles's present.

VALENTINE'S DAY.—DRAWN BY PHIZ.

But this morning, after the dreadful storm and a dreadful dream,—though her prayer had lulled her fear a little—she felt an irrepressible desire to read a chapter of consolation out of her lover's bible; so after she had arranged a few of her earliest homely duties, she stole back to her little chamber, unlocked her little drawer of treasures, took forth the precious volume, and drawing it from its case, opened the leaves, and found ..... A VALENTINE!

She uttered a cry of joy, and in her innocent confidence rushed down stairs to let all know that she had got a Valentine from Charles! Oh, it was a good omen.

Now behold the pretty Blanche in the village cottage. What a sensation has she not already roused in that humble dwelling. They are all around her, and even the dumb animals wonder what magic is in that letter. Look at the face of beaming affection of the man who helps to hold the letter, and helps to read it, too, as he half quizzes the young creature's interest and delight. Look at the young sister behind her, entering into her joy with a sort of shy wide-awakishness, as much as to say, "I know all about it—my turn next!" Look at the tinier girl in front, with the full stare of curiosity, only rivalled by the knowing little terrier, who cocks his ears and harks! The very magpie listens upon its perch; the very hound is attentive; as for the old Dame Woodham, she is betrayed out of her household vigilance, and lets the cat—sly puss!—get at the cream-dish, while she bends her gaze on Blanche. The gun in the corner is half inclined to go off with curiosity; and the clock looks as if it dare not disturb the Valentine by striking until it is read.

Well, and now it is read what is it? A bible was an odd case for so frivolous a thing as a Valentine! But this Valentine was not frivolous—though Blanche was a year after date in the getting of it.

It was a small note, with a rudely drawn landscape—a rough, spirited, sailor-like sketch of the village and the village church, and underneath it was written, in a hand frank and open as the heart of the writer:—

"DEAREST BLANCHE,

"This is Valentine's Day that we part on. When next I come here over the sea, the first spot I seek will be this village—the next, if you will bless me, that church; and after we have come from it, wedded and happy, I hope the comfort and guide of our lives may be the scriptural wisdom that is in the holy book, in which, dearest Blanche, I now place

"MY VALENTINE."

Well, this was read, and before either the dogs or the gun, or even the little child, knew what it was about, the clock struck for very joy, and with its last tingle a young sailor burst into the cottage, and caught Blanche in his arms.

A beautiful vessel had been half wrecked in the over-night's tempest, and now lay anchored in the downs—crew and cargo safe, but still a sad spectacle of havoc. With the first brush of daylight, however, after the storm was weathered, Charley Russit had pushed ashore, climbed the cliff, cleared the meadow, and in the cottage of Dame Woodham, now claimed

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

IMPARTIAL OPINION.—In our country, many a man owes his tolerated reception to the previous fame of his sire, but the good people of St. Petersburgh, it appears, are not influenced by any such respect. A son of Tamburini has recently had the mortification of being hissed off the stage in the presence of his father.

MISS LOUISA BASSANO.—This young lady, a pupil of our Royal Academy, has made a most decided hit in the part of Cenerentola, at the theatre La Fenice, Venice. The Venetians form a very critical audience, but, nevertheless, our fair countrywoman came off with flying colours. She has a most beautiful contr'alto voice.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1845.

THE Parliamentary Session was opened with the usual formalities on Tuesday last, rather more than the ordinary interest having been raised by the rumoured probability of the young Prince of Wales being present. This proved to be unfounded, but the scene was a pleasing one, nevertheless. The interior of the House of Peers was never more brilliant with female rank and beauty; on every side were waving plumes, that seem to have a sort of pride and loftiness in the midst of their graceful flexibility—and wreaths of flowers, that have more of the pretty and gentle—and bands and sparkling jewels—all speaking of rank and wealth, and lending splendour to loveliness. The Peers' benches were occupied by a whole host of fair invaders, who also filled every corner of every gallery; wherever the eye turned it fell on a mass of gay dresses and fine forms. As nearly every place was full an hour before the Queen arrived, the time was wiled away in animated conversation; and the murmur of soft voices rose on all sides, discussing the merits, and the demerits too, perhaps, of the dress and deportment of the last comers, the volume of sound increasing perceptibly on the appearance of a more than usually splendid uniform, or costume that presented anything particularly remarkable. An Indian Prince or dignitary of some kind or other was thus honoured with the special notice of everybody on account of his splendid tunic of silver tissue and satin scarf. So close were the Peers and Judges packed together in the centre of the House, that it was one solid mass of scarlet and white. The new Judge, Mr. Baron Platt, was distinguishable at once by the lustrous purity of his ermine. Not that there can be said to be a spot or stain on that of his learned brethren of the Judicial Bench; but there was a freshness and unworn appearance about his robes that marked him out as the last creation. The corps diplomatique abounded in orders, moustachios, and uniforms, as usual. The Duke of Wellington was in the body of the House for a few minutes before the arrival of the Queen, conversing with the Peers around him. His ducal robes do not improve his appearance; the full drapery takes off from his height, and he seems to stoop more under them than in his old familiar tweed wrapper, or plain blue frock. When he re-appeared, bearing the Sword of State before her Majesty, we thought his step was less firm and his walk more feeble than usual, but it might be the pressure of the crowd through which he had to move. Lyndhurst was there, looking as cheerful and active as ever, and wearing his Chancellor's robes more carelessly than he did his barrister's gown; he goes through all ceremonials with extreme nonchalance and a careless ease that is rather amusing. From the smiles that break forth, and the laughter not seldom heard ringing in his vicinity, we should imagine that his lordship's conversation is less dry and more amusing than a page of Sugden, on Powers, among which there is not a chapter on the power of making a joke, though it is one which Lord Lyndhurst is exceedingly fond, and capable too, of exercising. Brougham we did not see, and, therefore, presume he must have been absent, for his face is not one to escape notice even in a crowd. Campbell was there holding much talk with the Judges; peers of less note were scattered among the mass. But all questions of who is that? and where is he? were stayed at once on the entrance of her Majesty, who looked remarkably well, and discharged her royal duty with very graceful dignity.

THE opening debate on the Queen's Speech this session was more than usually animated and interesting. The topics introduced into it by allusion, opened a wide field; there were the visits of Foreign Monarchs, the improved state of trade, the Income Tax (which is to be continued), the Tahiti quarrel happily accommodated, Irish Education, the Bequests Bill, the health of towns, the increase in the Naval force; in all this there was enough for a month's debate, at least, did not custom confine the discussion to generalities, and reserve argument till each specific subject is introduced to be affirmed or negatived.

The most remarkable feature of the debate was the explanation given by Mr. Gladstone of the cause of his retirement from office. It was scarcely expected by the House, but the right hon. gentleman felt bound, as soon as possible, to set at rest all doubts and rumours on the subject. He rose early in the evening, and the fact of one who was last seen and heard from the Treasury Bench, speaking from the lower end of the House, at a distance from that envied locality, had about it something strange and novel. The members on both sides listened with marked attention, for Mr. Gladstone is respected for his talents and character by those who are opposed to his opinions. He explained the scruple of conscience that has produced his self-exile from office. It does not spring from any difference on commercial legislation, nor from any contemplated measure affecting the English or Irish Church, but from a repugnance to support as a Minister an extension of the grant for the purpose of educating a Roman Catholic priesthood, about to be proposed by Sir R. Peel. He cannot reconcile a support of such a grant with the principles laid down in his work on the connexion of the Church with the State. We cannot ourselves see that this principle can be more violated by an increase of the grant than by the vote that has been passed annually for so many years, and to which Mr. Gladstone has been, as a Member of the Government, a consenting party. A principle opposed to it would be as much violated by giving one pound for such a purpose, as by bestowing thousands. Sir R Peel asserts, and truly, that the grant is a matter of contract in which Parliament is legally bound as one of the conditions of the Act of Union, the grant itself being a legacy from the Irish Parliament, by whom it was first bestowed; and that Parliament was exclusively Protestant, no Catholic being allowed to sit in it; how an increase in the amount of that sum could raise a question of principle we cannot clearly perceive; that it should do so in the mind of a statesman, who must provide for the exigencies of reality, is still more strange. But it is the peculiar bent of Mr. Gladstone's mind to refine on every question into subtlety, and to draw distinctions that, to every one but himself, are invisible. We have heard him do this on commercial questions, till he became obscure with that darkness, which Milton describes as springing from "excess of light." How much more likely this is to happen on a matter involving points of theology, is easy to conceive. As a sense of vision too keen would destroy much of the pleasure of life, by rendering natural objects painfully repulsive, so may the mind refine upon the complex questions presented to the political ruler, till the course of action necessary to avert an evil may become impossible. Men of this class of mind are given, like Hamlet, to "thinking too precisely of the event," and thus their—

> Native hue of resolution
> Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought,
> And enterprises of great pith and moment,
> In this respect their currents turn awry
> And lose the name of action.

But, in addition to this, Mr. Gladstone suffers under the greatest calamity that can befal a statesman—the misfortune of having written a book; the abiding quality of the litera scripta is proverbial; there it is, however the writer may change, even though from error to truth, constantly quotable against him, by those who have an object in reminding others of the discrepancy between his present acts and his past opinions. Several of our statesmen have suffered from this cause; a passage from one of the works of Lord J. Russell, referring to the Wesleyan Methodists, circulated at a critical juncture, was one of the principal causes of his damaging defeat in the election for South Devon. Sir J. Graham's "Corn and Currency" has been an exhaustless magazine in the hands of his opponents, to whom he himself furnished their most effective weapons of attack. True, he bears the pitiless peltings he receives with it with exemplary fortitude, answering only by a sarcastic smile to the frequent quotations from the unlucky work. But Mr. Gladstone has not the official stoicism of the Home Secretary, and does not wish to expose himself, for the sake of office, to the taunts that might possibly be thrown out against him for having, in his writings, been a champion of principles utterly opposed to Romanism, and by his official acts, a party to an increase of the means and efficacy of a College for the Roman Catholic priesthood. The retirement of Mr. Gladstone is a conscientious one; it is to be regretted, for the sake of the public service; but the motive that led to it can take nothing from the general estimation with which he is regarded.

DEATH OF THE DUCHESS OF NASSAU.—A letter from Frankfort of the 29th ult. announces the death of the Duchess of Nassau, daughter of the Grand Duke Michael. On the 27th her Imperial Highness was delivered of a female child, still-born, and early the next morning the duchess expired under a severe attack of spasms at the heart. Her Imperial Highness was born on the 26th of May, 1826, and was consequently in her 19th year. On the 31st January, 1844, she married his Royal Highness the Reigning Duke of Nassau. The deceased duchess was a beautiful woman. She had a fair complexion, fine blue eyes, and was, altogether, a picture of youthful health and loveliness before her illness.

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES OF THE WEEK.

The war of Party has commenced, and here we are once more in the heart of Parliamentary struggle. Go it, Government; go it, Opposition! Defend—deprecate—shout—cheer—laugh—chuckle! Keep your bear-garden alive! Well, but this is not a respectful way to speak of a Parliament; this Legislature of ours is no Yankee Congress—no house of uproar and spittoons; it is a gentlemanly national muster of the representatives of the people. So be it then, you shall have it your own way, reader, and at once we put on for you the armour of decorum.

'Way there—way there, my masters, for those cream-coloured steeds! Check not the road of Royalty through that beautiful park. Feast your eyes if you will upon that grand pageantry, and your hearts upon the smiling face of your Queen; but press not too rudely around her as she goes with her own gentle air of native dignity to open another session of the Imperial Legislature of Great Britain! She is upon a lofty mission, O People! and delay her not; but greet her with your well-wishes, your blessings, and your cheers! May it turn out, moreover, that she be travelling on the high road towards your happiness—that there may be justice and wisdom in the councils which she goes to begin.

It will happen that your rushing millions turn out to get a holiday-gaping at the Royal progress to St. Stephen; the sight is a joyous one, and well equipped in bravery; and they like to know, besides, that the Sovereign takes personal interest in the councils of the nation. On the other hand, the graver politicians and the "country" busy themselves with the Speech. The Speech—the Speech—their kingdom for the Speech! And how it flies on broad wings of paper platitude—a thousand times faster than even its utterance, from point to point, city to city, and port to port. Business commences with it at once, and now it is adieu to the Queen, and begin with the Government.

We suppose we must find room in our ramblings for a

LAY OF THE SEEECH.

My Lords and Gentlemen,
To-day
I'm able with a spirit gay
The country to congratulate
Upon its most improving state;
Commerce and trade reviving, and Friend John Bull singing "Happy Land."

My Lords, the powers abroad that be,
Are full of amiability;
And source of pleasant feeling is it
When Kings return a Lady's visit;
So Russian Czar and French Philippe
Have proved to me their friendship deep.
Of such pure kindness I'm a lover,
And much rejoice that they came over!

Gentlemen of the Commons,
Here,
I've something for your private ear;
You can't but hear it with delight,
The Estimates are ready—quite!

My Lords and Gentlemen,
I joy
That Irish peace has less alloy;
That Bill Bequests and Land Commission
Foretel it an improved condition!

The theme of Scotch and Irish barley!
Washing for people of all ranks,
And then the Income Tax! if true
That it brings so much revenue,
Perhaps you'll—while the humour's in you—
See if it hadn't best continue!

Should you on this deliberate more,
Still give at least the State galore
Of money to preclude uneasiness,
And carry on the nation's business!

And now, not having more commands,
I leave the matter in your hands,
Hoping you'll do your very best
To make my treasured people blest.

We need not follow out the stunning descriptions which the reporters in the House of Lords have given of the brilliant and imposing ceremony of the Opening of the Session by the Sovereign; it is enough to say, that on this occasion it was "lustred in deeper splendour" than ever; and for the incident of the delivery of the Royal Speech, we know how gracious, emphatic, and full of eloquent expression that has ever been—but for the substance, if you have it not reader in those slipshod verses, at all events they are its echo, and when you have satisfied your imagination with the magnificence by which the inaugural ovation was surrounded, you can bethink yourself of its one pleasant intimation about the Income Tax, and set too to calculate what amount you have to pay!

Well, speech in fist, the politicianers got to work at once. And now the voting the Address business is over.

In the Commons it was a dull affair enough. There was the Gladstone Explanation—how and why and after what lingering dalliance he left the Cabinet of Peel—then Peel himself feeling, if anything, in a deeper affliction than Mr. Glad-stone.

> Yes, Gladstone was—alas! ochone!—
> Truly a very precious stone,
> A perfect jewel cleanly set
> Full in my shining cabinet.
> Now gone while I'm lamenting, for he—
> Is *Glad*stone still? No! very sorry!

The Premier, too, was very affectionately eulogistic in the Charteris panegyric, whereat Duncombe thinks that the Charter is, perhaps, not so far off, after all. He also adds, that Mr. Cardwell's accession to the Treasury is of good omen for Ministers, inasmuch as a Curd well placed and played is very nearly sure to win.

Lord John Russell was pretty violent, and here and there smart; and Palmerston, upon the Tahiti question, rated the English Ministry as soundly as ever did Monsieur Thiers—but for precisely a reverse reason! Wonderful are the disparities of politicians!

The Irish members eschew St. Stephen's—with the exception of Bellew, who does not think it wise—and Wyse, who does not think it prudent—and Sheil, who wants to throw open Trinity College! For all this, there is a good deal promised to the Emerald Isle; and even Conciliation Hall was not proverbially so called from its resistance to all kinds of conciliation—the concessions might be taken in good part. At all events, there is to be lots of education.

Peel is coming out with an early budget, which will be something to think about directly.—Wakley says in the name of the people that if Peel does not take off the taxes he had better take off himself. He is girding his loins, too, for a wrestle with Sir James Graham, about the medical, and Hume is sorry to have so often to ask the House not to stultify itself. Such is the humour of Hume.

In Spain Narvaez has quarrelled with the Queen Mother—and open rupture, violence, and the language of Billingsgate, have been bandied between the brutal Minister and the passionate Royalty of Madrid. There will be more blood-spilling there.—America is very busy after Oregon and Texas—"Don't she wish she may get 'em."—Some chivalrous writer in the Times, has been immortalizing the amiability of Otho, in Greece.

There have been some dreadful failures in our emigration system, and the agricultural protection people have had a great spread with a Buckingham and a Richmond in the field—not the Field of the Cloth of Gold—but the field of the cloth of damask on the dining tables of Freemasons' Hall. There was an immense muster—and nothing was said by the orators particularly flattering to the Corn-law League. By the same token the League have never bestowed any very fulsome adulation upon agricultural protection.

The theatres have been sparkling somewhat—the Queen having honoured the Haymarket—the Strand burlesqued Covent Garden—and the Danaïdes made their appearance as the dancing husband killers of a ballet at Drury-lane. There has been some stir, also, in the gaols—particularly the inmates of the debtors' prisons have been greatly alarmed by the appearance of the Comet of Arrest, described by Hind as not having been described before.

Au reste (not arrest, this time), there is very little going on. The Session, the Session, is the cry, and something good may yet be got out of it, if party will consent to merge its spirit a little in measures for the national benefit. Our neighbours in France, meanwhile, are setting no very vigorous legislatorial examples—and the Deputies are rather going towards dissolution than betraying symptoms of industrious vitality. Their onslaughts upon Ministers will pretty certainly end in suicide, which is an uncomfortable alternative, even for a Parliament.

By the way, it is on Valentine's day that the Premier comes out with his scheme of finance. As he has selected the period for the billing of the birds, we hope he may weigh his propositions Coo-ly, and, like them, exhibit the wisdom of a Nest-or.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

RETURN OF THE COURT FROM WINDSOR.—Monday, the Queen and Prince Albert returned to Buckingham Palace from Windsor. In the afternoon her Majesty held a Privy Council, at which the Hon. Sidney Herbert was sworn in, and took his place at the Board. Mr. Gladstone had an audience of the Queen on his resignation of office. On Tuesday, the Queen went in state to the House of Lords, to open the session of Parliament with a speech from the throne. In the evening, her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the Haymarket Theatre with their presence. Her Majesty held a Privy Council on Wednesday, at which Sir George Clerk was sworn of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, and took his place at the Board. The Right Honourable Bart. was declared by the Queen in Council to be Vice President of the Board of Trade. The Right Honourable Baronet also kissed hands on being appointed Master of the Mint. The Royal children, with the exception of the Prince of Wales, are at Brighton, and her Majesty and Prince Albert intended to join them there yesterday (Friday).

WINDSOR, Thurday Evening.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, accompanied by the Countess of Wratislaw, and attended by Lady Fanny Howard, left Frogmore House, this morning, in a close carriage and four for town. Her Royal Highness, after visiting her Majesty and the Prince Consort, at Buckingham Palace, and her Royal Highness the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mechlenburg Strelitz, at Cambridge House, returned to Frogmore this afternoon. Sir George and Lady Cowper, and their youthful family had the honour of dining with the Royal Duchess this evening. Her Royal Highness is not expected to visit Brighton during the sojourn of the Court at the Pavilion, where her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert are expected to arrive to-morow afternoon, leaving Buckingham Palace immediately after an early luncheon for the New Cross Station, and proceeding thence by a special train to Brighton.

ROYAL VISIT TO WARWICK CASTLE.—We believe we are correct in stating that it is the intention of her Majesty and the Prince Consort to honour the Earl and Countess of Warwick with a visit at Warwick Castle during the ensuing Easter recess.

ANNIVERSARY OF HER MAJESTY'S MARRIAGE.—The sixth anniversary of the marriage of her Majesty, on Monday next, will be celebrated by public dinners at Windsor, Egham, &c.; and a ball in honour of the event will take place at the latter town.

THE EARL OF MORNINGTON.—The answer to the latest inquiries was, that his lordship continued in the same weak state.

Sir Robert Peel entered his fifty-eighth year on Wednesday.

DEATH OF LADY MARY BAGOT.—We regret to announce the demise o Lady Mary Bagot, eldest daughter of the Earl and Countess of Mornington, and widow of the late Hon. Sir Charles Bagot, the late Governor-General of Canada. The deceased lady was born 5th February, 1786, and married 22nd July, 1806, the Right Hon. Sir Charles Bagot, second son of the late Lord Bagot, by whom her ladyship had ten children, seven of whom are living.

DEATH OF THE DOWAGER COUNTESS OF ALDBOROUGH.—Intelligence has been received from Paris of the death of the Dowager Countess of Aldborough, at her residence in that capital, at an advanced age. The deceased had for the last five years permanently resided at Paris.

DEATH OF MISS KNATCHBULL.—We regret to announce that Sir Edward Knatchbull's daughter, whose illness has of late prevented the right hon. baronet from attending to public business, died on Sunday last, at Merstham Hatch. She was in her 21st year.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

THE OXFORD CONVOCATION.—Three distinct votes will be submitted to Convocation on Feb. 13th: 1, the Condemnation of Tract XC.; 2, of Mr. Ward's Propositions; 3, Mr. Ward's Degradation.

The Rev. Sydney Smith has been exceedingly unwell, but now his recovery is gradually progressing.

We regret to hear that the Bishop of Ely is seriously indisposed.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

ILL-TREATMENT OF A CHILD.—In the BAIL COURT, on Tuesday, an indictment was tried, the Queen v. Pelham, which charged the defendant, Mrs. Harriett Eleanor Pelham, with being an evil disposed person, and intending to injure Brent Spencer, her illegitimate son, by confining him in a dark room, and neglecting to provide him with necessary meat, drink, &c. The facts of the case were given recently in our police report. The present prosecution was instituted by the parish officers of St. Luke's, Chelsea. The defendant resided in Princes-street, Chelsea, and was between fifty and sixty years of age, and had two children, her conduct towards the eldest of whom formed the ground of the present inquiry. His name was Brent Spencer, and he was an illegitimate son of the defendant, by the late General Sir Brent Spencer. Brent Spencer was between thirty and forty years of age. In the course of last year some noises were heard in the defendant's house, which attracted the attention of her neighbours, who proceeded to the magistrate at Queen-square Police-office, and having stated all they knew on the subject, solicited the interference of the police, which was allowed. Some policemen went to the defendant's house, and there they found Brent Spencer in a state of the utmost filth; his beard had been growing for years, he was covered with vermin, and had only a dirty shirt on.—The jury returned a verdict of Guilty on those counts only of the indictment which charged the defendant with having neglected to provide for the proper comfort, &c., of the lunatic.

THE ALLEGED FRAUD BY MESSRS. SMITH, THE DISTILLERS.—The same Court was occupied on Thursday with the trial at bar of the case of the Attorney-General against the firm of Smith and Co., distillers, Whitechapel-road, for the recovery of £309,000 penalties. The Solicitor-General opened he case at length, but it is needless to repeat his statement, as we have already given the particulars of the alleged fraud upon the Excise. The cause was expected to last three days, but it came to a sudden close on Friday. At the sitting of the Court, the Solicitor-General stated, that in consequence of an informality in the writ, he could proceed no further in the case. It had arisen through the error of a clerk in the Remembrancer's Office, which he had fallen into through its being the first case of the kind he had had under the new act. Indeed, it was his opinion that the Court throughout had been sitting without proper authority, but under all the circumstances the cause would be at present withdrawn.

IRELAND.

VISIT OF THE QUEEN TO IRELAND.—The Dublin Mercantile Advertiser states, on "the very best authority, that the Queen and her illustrious consort have determined upon visiting Ireland next summer; and that great political changes are in contemplation for Ireland."

The Earl of Lucan is to succeed the Marquis of Sligo as Lord Lieutenant of the county of Mayo.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The weekly meeting on Monday presented some matters worth notice. The attendance was by no means numerous. Mr. Neill Daunt having been called to the chair, Mr. O'Connell made a long speech. He said he had to bring before the association a subject of the deepest importance to the country. It was the report of the committee to which the subject of the attendance of the Irish members in Parliament was referred for inquiry. He assured the meeting the report was unanimously adopted. It was in the form of resolutions, which were as follow:—"That however desirable it may be that a discussion should take place in the House of Commons, with a view to expose the injustice of the proceedings connected with the late state trials, this association is so deeply impressed with a sense of the hopelessness of obtaining redress for the wrongs of Ireland from the Imperial Parliament that we cannot recommend that the Irish members should be called upon to attend such discussion. That the attendance of the Irish Repeal members in the Conciliation Hall would be most conducive to the great object of the association, the restoration of our domestic legislature." This report, he continued, would be submitted to the association for adoption by Mr. O'Brien, a man to whom Ireland owed more than any other living. (This sentiment excited loud cheers, which were prolonged by the women in the Associates' gallery.) After some further compliments to Mr. O'Brien, Mr. O'Connell said, his first question was, "What good would they get for Ireland by going to England? (A Voice: 'Nothing.') Yes, we shall get exactly that. He was convinced of it. England was listening to them to-day. Scotland was listening to them to day. The civilised European world was listening to them; and what they were saying to-day would be heard with a shout of applause in the many republics of America. (Cheers.) The question was, could England do anything for us? The question was, would England do anything for us? What chance was there that the present Government or Parliament would redress their grievances? Not the least. The English papers had said, 'O'Connell declares the English will do no good for Ireland;' and they added, 'Why does he not come and try?' I'll," exclaimed he, "go no more." (Great cheers.)—The resolutions were agreed to.—The rent for the week amounted to £387 3s. 7d.

ANOTHER BARBAROUS MURDER IN IRELAND.—There has been another ferocious murder in Ireland, the details of which are furnished in these terms by the Leitrim Gazette. "Never (says that paper) have we had to record the circumstances of a deed of blood more horrifying than that which we are now about to place before our readers. A more desperate and cold-blooded piece of butchery has not stained deeper the annals of crime in the county of Leitrim since the murder of the lamented Mr. West. The victim in the present instance was Mr. M'Leod, resident magistrate, a most esteemed and highly respected magistrate, who had been ordered from Enniskillen to Ballinamore, in consequence of the numerous outrages committed in the neighbourhood of the latter place, and in the hope that his usual energy and firmness would aid considerably in the measures adopted for the suppression of crime. On Wednesday week Mr. M'Leod dined at the residence of Mr. Percy, of Garradise, near Ballinamore, where he remained until ten o'clock that night, when he ordered out his jaunting-car, for the purpose of returning to Ballinamore. He had reached the porter's lodge at the end of the avenue, when his servant got off the car for the purpose of opening the gate, and while in the act of doing so a shot was fired immediately behind him, and then followed a rustling in the shrubbery, at the side of the avenue, as that of some person retiring from the place. The gatekeeper, who had been in bed, then rushed out, and on going up to the car found the unfortunate gentleman sitting in a reclining position and quite insensible; he then accompanied the servant back to Mr. Percy's, and when arrived there it was ascertained that he was quite dead, a musket ball having entered his left side, passed through the heart and lodged in his back, so that death must have been instantaneous. Several persons have been arrested, but nothing has transpired to insure a conviction. Mr. M'Leod held the rank of Captain in the 27th Regiment, and for his signal services during the late war was noticed by the Government, and appointed an officer of police." A reward of £100 has been offered by the Government for the discovery of the perpetrators of the murder. The following more immediate cause for this assassination has been given by another paper:—"Captain M'Leod attended the petty sessions on Wednesday. Some tenants of Mr. Percy, of Garradise, near Ballinamore, a magistrate, were charged with ribbonism. The other magistrates on the bench were disposed to allow the accused to give bail, but Captain M'Leod opposed this course, and bail was refused."

MYSTERIOUS AND FATAL OCCURRENCE AT DONNYBROOK.—On Sunday last, the policeman on duty in the neighbourhood of Donnybrook discovered that one of the houses on Flora-villa-row, a retired spot on the bank of the river Dadder, and within a short distance of the fair green of the village, had been burned down on the previous night. The cottage was rented by an English gentleman, named Orson, who had been for many years in the East India Company's service; the other inmates consisting of his wife, two children (aged respectively one and three years), and a female attendant. On breaking open the hall-door the house was found to have been reduced to a mere shell, the inside of which was half-filled with a heap of smouldering rubbish, the roof and floors having fallen in. A written paper was found nailed to the back of the door, and uninjured by the fire, containing a statement to the effect that the place would remain a monument of the cruelty of the landlord. The police forthwith informed that gentleman of the occurrence, and ascertained from him that Captain Orson was considerably in arrear for rent, and for some time past had been holding adverse possession of the premises, the usual legal process having been resorted to for the purpose of dislodging him. Workmen were employed to clear away the rubbish, and beneath it were discovered burned to cinders the remains of four persons, supposed to be those of Orson, his wife, and two children. Various rumours were current upon the subject. On the one hand it was said that the unfortunate occupant had committed the treble crime of arson, murder, and suicide; whilst others believed that the occurrence was accidental. [We have since received an account of the inquest. The evidence did not at all confirm the supposition that Captain Orson had set the house on fire, and the jury therefore returned a verdict to the effect that the deceased was burned to death by reason of his house having accidentally taken fire. It was not considered necessary to hold an inquest on the remains of the wife and children.]

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE MURDER AT BETHNAL-GREEN.—On Monday morning the inquiry touching the death of Emma Whiter was resumed at the London Hospital, before Mr. Baker, the coroner for the eastern division of Middlesex.—Henry Surritch, a retired licensed victualler, deposed that on the 25th of January last he was at the bar of the Rising Sun public-house, at a quarter to one in the day. He saw James Tapping, with a pistol in his hand. Witness's notice was drawn to the pistol by the report of a percussion cap which Tapping snapped on the lock. The pistol resembled the one produced. Witness was at the Rising Sun between twelve and one o'clock, on the Tuesday morning last. He saw Tapping walk hastily out of the tap-room and call for some brandy at the bar, which he drank, and then re-entered the tap-room. His sister came in immediately after and fainted on the floor. Witness could not say what was the cause of it. Tapping soon after left the house in company with several persons. Shortly after he had left witness went also, and proceeded towards his own house. On approaching the Salmon and Ball public-house he met Tapping in company with Richard Bunn. They appeared to be going towards the prisoner's (Tapping's) house. They did not make any observation to witness. They were coming from the Salmon and Ball.—A witness, named Thomas Capes, deposed to some quarrelling between the prisoner and the deceased on a former occasion.—William Whiter a brother of the deceased, keeps a beershop in Brick-lane. On Monday night last, at a quarter to ten, deceased came into his parlour, and Tapping shortly after went into the tap-room. They had no communication while in his house. At twelve o'clock they both walked out together, and shook hands with witness before leaving. William Cumming stated, that he was the house-surgeon of the London Hospital, and was called to see the deceased at five minutes past one on the morning of Tuesday last. She was quite dead, and had apparently been so for about an hour. The body was still warm. The witness handed in a written statement, from which it appeared that on examining the body he found no marks or bruises as if a struggle had taken place. There was a quantity of blood on her dress, and a black spot, four inches in diameter, on the left side of the neck, which appeared to have been burnt, and smelt strongly of gunpowder. There was a hole in the centre about the size of a small marble. He made a post mortem examination about 37 hours after the deceased was brought into the hospital. The result of that examination was that he found the wound in the neck commenced about an inch and a half under the left side of the jaw and took a direction upwards and backwards. There were two balls in the wound, one of which had shattered one of the vertebræ, and the second had lodged in the lower part of another. A large wound was made on the external carotid artery by the passage of the balls, and many small vessels were divided. Either the injury to the spine, or that to the carotid artery was sufficient to cause death in a few minutes. The Coroner having summed up, the Jury deliberated for about a quarter of an hour and then returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder against James Tapping." On Tuesday, James Tapping was finally examined before the magistrates at the Worship-street police office, and, after a good deal of the evidence given at the coroner's inquest had been recapitulated and some little additional evidence given, he was fully committed for trial. In the course of the examination, a sister of his was present, and added to the excitement by going off into a violent hysterical fit. She gave her brother an excellent character, said he had been the sole support of two orphan sisters, and that she did not know what the family would do now that it was bereaved of him.

THE MURDER AND SUICIDE AT SHOREDITCH. — On Saturday afternoon an inquest was held before Mr. Baker, at the Blue Last, Curtain-road, Shoreditch, on the body of Joseph Barry and his wife, Mary Priscilla Barry, who were found dead in their beds on the previous morning, at their residence, 4, Luke-street, St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, as stated in our paper last week. The evidence given did not throw any light upon the motives for the commission of the double crime. Barry was believed to be in good circumstances, but he had been a good deal worried by a particular and difficult kind of work he had had to do. He had for some days complained of violent pains in his head. The surgeon examined stated his opinion to be the same as the policeman stated in his evidence, as to Mr. Barry having cut the throat of his wife while he was out of bed, and then gone into bed and cut his own. The jury returned a verdict to the effect "That the deceased, Joseph Barry, cut his wife's throat, being in an unsound state of mind at the time, and afterwards committed suicide by cutting his own throat."

THE EXPLOSION ON THE MANCHESTER AND LEEDS RAILWAY.—A long inquiry into the cause of this explosion has taken place before the coroner. The evidence went to prove beyond a doubt that the explosion took place on account of undue pressure of steam. Mr. Bury, the engine-builder, stated that the appearance of the boiler showed that there was a sufficiency of water in it at the time of the explosion; for some of the tubes were injured. As the boiler had been worked for four years, at a pressure of 60lbs. to the square inch, that showed it was capable of bearing such a pressure. It was not at all improbable that the engineer, if he found that he was short of steam, might have screwed the valve tighter, so as to prevent the steam blowing off. If the valves had been free, the explosion could not have taken place. In the course of the inquiry it was suggested that as it was usual for the engineman to open the valves at night to let off the steam, he might have screwed them down too tight in the morning when he came to his labour. One of the jury said that this was the best explanation which he had heard of the cause of the accident. The jury ultimately returned the following verdict:—"That from the evidence brought before us we have reason to suppose that the ordinary valve had been closed to facilitate the pressure of the steam, and that from some unknown cause the lock-up valve was impeded in its working. That it is the opinion of the jury that there was a flaw in the copper-plate in the upper part of the fire-box, arising from the contraction and expansion of the metal in its ordinary working, which led, under accumulated pressure, to the catastrophe, by which Wm. Stones, George Mills, and Wm. Allcock met their deaths. From these circumstances the jury lay a deodand on the engine of FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS." It is stated that the proceedings will be brought under the notice of the Court of Queen's Bench.

HEREFORD GRAND ANNUAL STEEPLE CHASE, Thursday.—Handicap of 25 sovs. each, with 100 added. Mr. W. Jenkins' Lycurgus beat Mr. T. Oliver's Vanguard, and 12 others.

CORONER FOR BERKSHIRE.—Mr. Rupert Clarke, of Reading, was, on Monday, elected Coroner for Berks, in the room of the late Mr. May.

THE ALLEGED MURDER AT RUISLIP.—At the Central Criminal Court this day (Saturday), Charles Lamb was indicted for the murder of John Brill, in the parish of Ruislip, near Uxbridge, in the year 1837. We recently gave an account of the circumstances under which this murder was committed. The evidence did not sustain the charge, and the prisoner was acquitted.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Evening.

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA.

We have received letters and papers from Bombay to the 1st Jan., and from China to the 19th Nov., brought by the Overland Mail. Subjoined is a summary of the most interesting events since the last arrival. The campaign in the Southern Mahratta country is supposed to be nearly over—five forts, two of them of very great strength, have been captured since the 1st of December. Some 7000 troops continue quartered in the country. Colonel Ovans, who had been appointed to succeed Col. Outram as political agent, and had been a captive in the hands of the enemy, returned to his friends in safety. Colonel Hickes, of the 2d Grenadiers, was killed by a cannon shot on November 29, while directing operations against the fort of Punalla, afterwards breached and taken by storm on the 2nd December. The troubles of the Sawunt Warree country still continue, and nearly 3000 troops are employed in keeping the insurgents from devastating the country. In Scinde everything keeps quiet, and though disease is decreasing, there are still nearly 3000 in hospital. Her Majesty's 78th has lost in all about 200 men, women, and children, within these three months, and there are scarcely a dozen men in the regiment who have not been in hospital. Sir C. Napier was by last accounts at Larkhana, proposing to make a sweep across the country as far as Dadur, at the foot of the Bolan Pass, his chief object being the total destruction of the town of Poolajee. The place is believed already to have fallen into the hands of Nusser Khan of Kelat, who holds it till we arrive or give the order for its destruction.—The result of Col. Moseley's trial has been published, together with that officer's defence of his conduct. He has been sentenced to be cashiered from the service. The troubles of the Punjaub are for the present hushed. The only intelligence of importance received during the past month from Affghanistan refers to a fearful pestilence said to be raging in Cabul. Throughout India generally peace prevails. The Governor General is strenuously promoting the cause of native education and general enlightenment, and working out plain common sense practical improvements in all directions.

CHINA.

We have news of the 19th November, from China. The new Governor seems to be getting himself very needlessly into trouble. Some of his recent ordinances have been remonstrated against, and seem in the last degree inexpedient. The news of the death of the Emperor is not confirmed. The Chinese people are generally tranquil, trade continuing dull. The cold season in Western India continues healthy and agreeable, though there are some fears of drought, the fall of the two past rainy seasons having been defective.

The treaty of Commerce which was negociated between France and China, was signed on the 24th of October at Whampoa, on board the Archimedes.

NEW PROJECTED RAILWAYS.

(From the London Gazette, of last night.)

Railway Department, Board of Trade, Whitehall, Feb. 7.

Notice is hereby given, that the Board constituted by the Minute of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, for the transaction of railway business, having had under consideration the following schemes, for extending railway communication in South Wales and Herefordshire, viz.:—The South Wales; the Monmouth and Hereford (Great Western); the Newport and Pontypool; the Gloucester and Dean Forest; have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the South Wales Railway; Monmouth and Hereford (Great Western); Newport and Pontypool; and against the Gloucester and Dean Forest Railway; and the Board having further had under consideration the following schemes, for extending railway communication to Shrewsbury, viz:—The Shrewsbury, Wolverhampton, Dudley, and Birmingham Railway; the Shrewsbury and Wolverhampton (Grand Junction); the Shrewsbury and Stafford; have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the Shrewsbury, Wolverhampton, Dudley, and Birmingham; and against the Shrewsbury and Wolverhampton (Grand Junction); Shrewsbury and Stafford; and the Board having further had under consideration the Waterford and Kilkenny Railway scheme, have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the said scheme.

HER MAJESTY'S ARRIVAL AT BRIGHTON.—The Queen and Prince Albert arrived at Brighton yesterday afternoon. The special train, consisting of four first-class carriages, attached to a very powerful engine (No. 85), driven by Mr. B. Cubitt, left the New-Cross station at fourteen minutes to four o'clock, and reached Brighton, without having made a single stoppage, at four minutes to five o'clock. The distance (48 miles) was, therefore, gone over in one hour and ten minutes. A very splendid crimson tent was erected at the Brighton terminus. Her Majesty was greeted with loud cheers on alighting in the tent, where she remained about two minutes, and then stepped into the carriage waiting to convey her to the Palace. The carriage went at a walking pace through the crowds which thronged the streets, and the most enthusiastic cheering greeted the Royal cortège on its way to the Palace, which she reached precisely at five o'clock.

THE QUEEN'S REPLY TO THE ADDRESS FROM THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—The House of Lords having adjourned, her Majesty's reply to the Address cannot be communicated till Monday. We are, however, enabled to furnish a copy of it. The answer is in somewhat different terms to that given to the House of Commons, and is as follows:—"My Lords,—This renewed assurance of your loyalty and dutiful attachment is received by me with sincere satisfaction. I rely with confidence on your cordial support in my endeavours to promote the happiness and contentment of my subjects."

The Marquis of Lansdowne left town yesterday morning for Bowood. The marriage of Lady Louisa Fitzmaurice and the Hon. James Kenneth Howard is definitively arranged to take place on Monday next.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—Letters were received at the residence of Sir William Follett, in Park-street, yesterday morning, stating that the Attorney-General, Lady Follett and family, intended to sail from Naples on the 28th of last month, and that they might be expected to arrive in England the beginning of next week. Sir William has derived the greatest benefit from his tour, and is now in the enjoyment of good health.

We hear from an official source that Lord Jocelyn is not to have an appointment at the Admiralty as was reported; but the office to which his lordship has been appointed is that of Secretary to the Board of Control, which will not require the vacation of his seat, so that there will not be a new election for Lynn.

Sir Edward Knatchbull, it is said, will be raised to the English peerage.

REPRESENTATION OF BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.—Mr. Towers, of Iver, intends to offer himself for the county of Bucks, in the room of Mr. Scott Murray, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

SOUTH WILTSHIRE ELECTION.—It is supposed that the Hon. Sidney Herbert will be re-elected without opposition.

STAMFORD ELECTION.—The election for Stamford is to take place on Monday next. No new candidate is announced, and, we believe, Sir George Clerk will be re-elected without opposition.

DR. WOLFF.—Letters from Erzeroom, dated Jan. 3, state that Dr. Wolff had reached that city. He was expected almost daily at Constantinople.

IMPROVEMENTS IN WESTMINSTER.—Yesterday a numerous meeting of the inhabitants of Westminster was held in the Mechanics' Institution, Smith-street, for the purpose of considering the best means of improving those parts of Westminster contiguous to the Palace, the Abbey, Houses of Parliament, &c. Captain Rous, M.P., presided. It appears that the principal feature of the proposed improvements is the construction of a road leading from the Abbey to Pimlico, and forming a connection thereby with Grosvenor-place, Belgrave-square, &c. According to Mr. R. Wason's plan the new road is proposed to commence in the Broad Sanctuary, next to the Abbey, but according to another at Tothill-street. A very lengthened discussion on the respective merits of both plans ensued. Resolutions were ultimately agreed to, recommending the improvement in the district, but requesting the Government to withhold preference to any plans submitted, until their merits were tested by a committee of the inhabitants of the parishes.

DESTRUCTION OF THE PORTLAND VASE AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—Yesterday afternoon an Irish maniac named William Lloyd wantonly broke the celebrated Portland vase, deposited in 1810 at the Museum, by the Duke of Portland. Several persons were in the apartment at the time, and were of course much alarmed lest they should be accused of the offence, but the mischievous Goth at once admitted that he had done the mischief. The loss to the Museum and to the world generally it is impossible to supply. The vase was valued at £1000 by the authorities of the establishment, but of course this sum is merely nominal. It was found about the middle of the 16th century about two miles and a half from Rome, in the road leading from Frascati. The prisoner was examined at Bow-street yesterday on the charge. Mr. Hawkins, one of the officers at the Museum, deposed to having heard the smash, and inquired of the visitors the cause. The defendant at once said, "I did it." without assigning any reason, and was thereupon given into custody. The prisoner said nothing in his defence, and was remanded for a week. A woman with whom the defendant lodged, said he had represented himself as a scene-painter at one of the theatres.

LOSS OF FOUR LIVES ON THE RIVER.—On Thursday, a sailing boat, the property of Mr. Byfo.d, of Barking, was upset in a squall between Woolwich and the latter town. It had a carg. of fish, and the owner of them, as well as three sons of Mr. Byford, sunk with the vessel and were drowned. A man named Leach, a waterman of London, who was on the fore part of the vessel, had the presence of mind to throw off his jacket, and kept swimming about for the space of 20 minutes, when he was rescued by a sailing-vessel. The name of the owner of the fish is at present unknown.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

On Tuesday Parliament was opened by her Majesty in State. Apart from the intrinsic and vast importance of this royal ceremony, the great constitutional features of the pageant possess the most impressive interest. The sceptre, even in woman's gentle hand, is a potent engine. Next on the proud parade are the peers, the peerage of England. Of them we shall borrow the language of the Swedish Ambassador, Count Björnstjerna, "Every page of the history of the world shows that those states which are destitute of the aristocratic element (understood in its nobler sense, namely, as open to every kind of merit, and not exclusive, like the Roman or Venetian Patriciate) have soon degenerated either to the despotism of an individual, or to the still more dangerous despotism of polyarchy." What a commentary on this fine passage were the men who stood around the Queen on her throne last Tuesday. An aristocracy "open to every kind of merit!" There were Wellington and Lyndhurst, Denman, Pollock, Charles Grant, Canning (of illustrious name), and a hundred others, raised from the ranks of the people to be the props of the State, the glories and the safeguards of the land.

And last of the three estates—the mingled democracy of England—wielding a command which, even for good and common weal, requires the regulated prerogative of the Crown, and the prescribed check of the peers, to adjust the balance, and keep it in right order.

It was a superlative sight to see these political elements mingled together as they are on such an event; but not less gratifying to witness the "turn out" of an active and intelligent population; to gaze, to comment on, to blame, or to admire everything presented to their view.

Leaving these desultory observations, let us come to the real business of Tuesday. The fact of the Prince of Wales remaining in town, while his Royal sisters had been sent to Brighton, caused a greatly increased excitement on Monday; as there were many, even amongst those who should have known better, who anticipated that it was her Majesty's intention to take her Royal son with her to open the Parliament. This report, circulated by the daily papers, tended materially to increase the attendance at the House of Lords, as well as making a large difference in the multitudes who assembled along the line of the procession.

The doors of the Parliament were opened to a crowd of persons who had obtained tickets of admission at twelve o'clock, and from that time till nearly two, the influx of visitors was unceasing. The house presented a gay and animated appearance from the picturesque mingling of the various costumes worn by the peers, peeresses, bishops, judges, ambassadors, foreigners, ladies, &c.

About half-past one o'clock, the procession at Buckingham Palace began to form, and shortly after, her Majesty and Prince Albert descended the Grand Staircase, and were conducted to the State Carriage by the Earl Delawarr, the Lord Chamberlain of the Household, whose official duties have a temporary cessation, as soon as her Majesty is seated—the department over which his lordship presides not being acknowledged in her Majesty's Palace at Westminster. The Queen was dressed in white satin, and wore her splendid diamond circlet, her state robe being borne by the Pages of Honour. Prince Albert was habited as a Field Marshal, and wore the Collars of the Garter and Golden Fleece. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were accompanied in the State Carriage by the Countess of Gainsborough, Lady in Waiting; and the Earl of Jersey, Master of the Horse. As the procession started, the Guard of Honour, the Grenadiers, commanded by Colonel Wood, and the band of the regiment on duty on the Palace lawn, received her Majesty and her illustrious Consort with the usual military honours.

The order of the procession was as follows:—

A carriage drawn by six bays, conveying Sir Noel Harris, Mr. Des Voeux, and another Gentleman Usher, the Exon in Waiting, and Mr. Wilson, Page of Honour.

A carriage drawn by six bays, conveying Captain F. Hugh Seymour, Groom of the Robes; Colonel Reid, Silver Stick; Captain the Hon. Arthur Duncombe, R.N., Groom in Waiting; Sir George Anson, G.C.B., Groom in Waiting to the Prince; and Mr. Wortley, Page of Honour.

A carriage drawn by six bays, conveying the Comptroller of the Household, the Clerk Marshal, Colonel Buckley, Equerry in Waiting, and Colonel Wylde, Equerry in Waiting to the Prince.

A carriage, drawn by six bays, conveying the Captain of the Yeomen, the Marquis of Ormonde, Lord in Waiting, the Treasurer of the Household, and Lord George Lennox, Lord in Waiting to the Prince.

A carriage, drawn by six black horses, conveying the Viscountess Canning, Lady in Waiting, the Lord Steward, the Marquis of Londonderry, G.C.B., Gold Stick, and the Groom of the Stole to Prince Albert.

A detachment of the Life Guards.

The Queen's Marshalmen and Footmen in State Liveries, and a detachment of the Yeomen Guard.

The State Coach, drawn by eight cream-coloured horses.

At a quarter past two o'clock, the report of cannon announced the approach of her Majesty, and the great officers of State left the house to assume their badges of office, and to prepare to take their assigned places in the royal entrée, where, by direction of the Earl Marshal, through the Garter King of Arms, the Great Officers of State and others assembled at the foot of the staircase, in order to receive her and proceeded to the library of the House of Lords, which, together with the librarian's room, had been elegantly fitted up as a robing and private withdrawing room for her Majesty. In the former of these noble apartments the ceremony of investing the Queen with the imperial mantle took place. Previously to her Majesty's arrival, the crown and state regalia, which had been brought from the Tower by Sir William Martens, the Deputy Chamberlain, were placed on a table in the centre of the room, and had a most imposing appearance. In front of this table her Majesty, standing beneath a lofty crimson canopy, and surrounded by her great Ministers of State, was pleased to signify that the houses should forthwith be assembled, and to express her readiness to meet them in Parliament. Being then robed in the mantle of supreme authority, her Majesty, preceded by the Duke of Beaufort, bearing the Crown on a rich cushion; the Marquis of Winchester, carrying the Cap of Maintenance;* the Duke of Wellington, the Sword of State; and the great servants of the Household, their huge maces of stewardly office; advanced through the second corridor to the House of Peers. Her Majesty's passage was guarded by a double row of House Guards in court costume; and the rear of her stately retinue was closed by two strong parties of beef-eaters, and men at arms, who, during the Queen's stay in the robing-room, had guarded that apartment. The procession, in passing this corridor, had a highly picturesque effect—Mr. Soane's ornamental groupings and coloured skylights being seen to great advantage in connection with such gorgeous elements.

A flourish of trumpets announced the Royal approach, and her Majesty entered, with Prince Albert, and took her seat on the throne, the Prince being seated on her left, the chair on her right, destined for the Prince of Wales remaining vacant.

The Queen being seated on the throne the Lord President stood on the steps of the throne, on the right, and the Lord Privy Seal on the left of her Majesty, the Lord Chancellor behind the Prince of Wales's chair. The Earl Marshal and the Lord bearing the Cap of Maintenance, stood on the right hand of her Majesty; the Lord Great Chamberlain—whose duties were undertaken by Sir Augustus Clifford, in consequence, we regret to say, of extreme indisposition rendering it impossible for Lord Willoughby de Eresby to come to town to be present at the ceremony—took his place on the steps of the throne towards the left hand of her Majesty, to receive the Royal commands; and the Duke of Wellington bearing the Sword of State stood on the left hand of her Majesty.

The Groom of the Stole and the Lord in Waiting to Prince Albert stood near the chair of his Royal Highness, and the other officers of her Majesty's household and of the household of Prince Albert arranged themselves on each side of the steps of the throne, in the rear of the Great Officers of State.

After her Majesty had ascended the throne, and ordered the Peers, who received her standing, to be seated, the Commons were summoned to attend at the bar and hear the Royal Speech.

Within a few minutes they appeared. The picture of the House at this moment was singularly interesting, and such as no other kingdom could present. In front of her Majesty sat the Judges of the land, dressed in their scarlet robes, and huge fur tippets, decorated with the massive gold chains of judicial office. On the right of the House, and near the throne, stood the corps diplomatique, the assembled representatives of nearly every civilized state on earth, forming a gorgeously-attired company, in which the Austrian, by his heraldic bearing, hussar-like uniform, and stiff white feather—the Turk, by his Fez, small stature, neat and delicate features—the Frenchman, by his smart attire and gay address—the South American, by his light blue draperies, bushy moustachios, and endless decorations—as well as others, by similarly striking national characteristics, might be readily distinguished. In front of them sat the Bishops, dressed in their scarlet robes, as temporal peers, and their hoods of white fur, to denote their ecclesiastical character. On the left, disposed in a compact mass, sat the ladies of the Ambassadors, a perfect galaxy of national beauty, the country of each of the fair visitants being distinctly traceable in their several physiognomies. Beyond these, arranged on the two sides of the house, appeared a multitudinous mass of peeresses, presenting a perfect sea of plumes, glittering with brilliants, varied only in its beauteous aspect by the occasional figure of a solitary peer. Still further in the distance appeared the doughty Commons of England, headed by their Speaker, robed in his massive gown of silk and golden work, and half smothered in his enormous wig; and above all these, in the gallery, an admiring host of the commonalty, proud of their constitutional representatives, and waiting in breathless anxiety for the first accents of her Majesty's voice.

The Lord Chancellor having presented the Royal Speech to the Queen, with the formality pictured in the engraving, her Majesty read it throughout with the most perfect intonation and distinctness. It was as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I rejoice that I am enabled, on again meeting you in Parliament, to congratulate you on the improved condition of the country.

"Increased activity pervades almost every branch of manufacture. Trade and commerce have been extended at home and abroad, and among all classes of my people there is generally prevalent a spirit of loyalty and cheerful obedience to the law.

"I continue to receive from all Foreign Powers and States assurances of their friendly disposition.

"I have had much satisfaction in receiving at my Court the Sovereigns who, in the course of the last year, visited this country.

"The journey of the Emperor of Russia, undertaken at a great sacrifice of private convenience, was a proof of the friendship of his Imperial Majesty most acceptable to my feelings.

"The opportunity of personal intercourse thus afforded to me may, I hope, be the means of still further improving those amicable relations which have long existed between Great Britain and Russia.

"The visit of the King of the French was rendered especially welcome to me, inasmuch as it had been preceded by discussions which might have impaired the good understanding happily established between the two countries.

"I regard the maintenance of this good understanding as essential to the best interests of both, and I rejoice to witness that the sentiments so cordially expressed by all classes of my subjects on the occasion of his Majesty's visit were entirely in unison with my own.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The estimates for the ensuing year have been prepared, and will forthwith be laid before you.

"The progress of steam-navigation and the demands for protection to the extended commerce of the country will occasion an increase in the estimates connected with the naval service.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have observed with sincere satisfaction that the improvement which is manifest in other parts of the country has extended to Ireland.

"The political agitation and excitement which I have had heretofore occasion to lament, appear to have gradually abated, and as a natural result, private capital has been more freely applied to useful public enterprises undertaken through the friendly co-operation of individuals interested in the welfare of Ireland.

"I have carried into effect, in the spirit in which it was conceived, the Act for the more effectual application of Charitable Donations and Bequests.

"I recommend to your favourable consideration the policy of improving and extending the opportunities for academical education in Ireland.

"The report of the commission appointed to inquire into the law and practice in respect to the occupation of land is nearly prepared, and shall be communicated to you immediately after its presentation.

"The state of the law in regard to the privileges of the Bank of Ireland, and to other banking establishments in that country and in Scotland, will no doubt occupy your attention.

"The health of the inhabitants of large towns and populous districts in this part of the United Kingdom has been the subject of recent inquiry before a commission, the report of which shall be immediately laid before you.

"It will be highly gratifying to me if the information and suggestions contained in that Report shall enable you to devise the means of promoting the health and comfort of the poorer classes of my subjects.

"I congratulate you on the success of the measures, which, three years since, were adopted by Parliament for the purpose of supplying the deficiency in the public revenue, and arresting the accumulation of debt in the time of peace.

"The act which was passed at that time for imposing a tax upon income will shortly expire.

"It will be for you in your wisdom to determine whether it may not be expedient to continue its operation for a further period, and thus to obtain the means of adequately providing for the public service, and at the same time of making a reduction in other taxation.

"Whatever may be the result of your deliberations in this respect, I feel assured that it will be your determination to maintain an amount of revenue amply sufficient to meet the necessary expenditure of the country, and firmly to uphold that public credit, which is indispensable to the national welfare.

"The prospect of continued peace, and the general state of domestic prosperity and tranquillity afford a favourable opportunity for the consideration of the important matters to which I have directed your attention, and I commit them to your deliberation, with the earnest prayer that you may be enabled, under the superintending care and protection of Divine Providence, to strengthen the feelings of mutual confidence and good-will between different classes of my subjects, and to improve the condition of my people."

After the delivery of her Most Gracious Majesty's Speech, the Queen and Prince Albert retired from the chamber in the same order as they had entered. As they passed through the streets and park, on their way back to Buckingham Palace, they were saluted with the same loyal greeting as they had previously received.

The state procession returned in the same order to the Palace at five minutes past three o'clock, the Lord Chamberlain and the Vice Chamberlain receiving her Majesty and the Prince at the grand entrance. Our engraving on the front page represents the scene of her Majesty's Departure. The gateway forms the grand entrance to the house, built by Mr. Soane, for George IV.

Thus closed a pageant, in which we have omitted no important circumstance, except, perhaps, that previously to the opening of the house, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, the old ceremony of searching the vaults for delinquents of the Guy Fawkes order took place, but with no graver issue than the discovery that lanterns, which were used for the first time, are less choking than the old smoky, but picturesque flambeaux, which were formerly employed.

Our Illustrations are authentic embodiments of the great events we have attempted to describe; for, thanks to the courtesy of the Lord Great Chamberlain, we were enabled to make drawings on the spot, and are thus in a position to give a picturesque and literary history of the opening of the present Session of Parliament by her Majesty Queen Victoria.

It may interest country readers to know, that the House of Lords and its offices are open to the public on every Wednesday and Friday.

* The Cap of Maintenance is a state cap, typical of Royal authority, which is always borne before the Sovereign on solemn occasions. It was first used by Henry VIII., who received it from Pope Julius II., as a present for writing against Luther. The Cap now in use is of crimson velvet, with a deep band of ermine, and a tassel of gold.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

After the delivery of the Queen's Speech, the house adjourned and met again at half-past four o'clock.

The Earl of Ellenborough was introduced by Earl Amherst and Earl Powis, and took his seat on the earls' bench. The noble earl also subscribed the roll of Peers.

THE ADDRESS.—The Queen's Speech having been read by the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis CAMDEN moved the usual Address, in answer to it. The noble marquis reiterated most of the topics to which the speech referred.—Lord GLENLYON seconded the Address. The noble lord, who was attired in full Highland costume, read his speech, and seemed sometimes embarrassed to make out the writing. Like the noble mover, Lord Glenlyon only touched upon the points noticed in her Majesty's speech.—The Marquis of NORMANBY alluded to the state of Ireland, and protested against that part of the speech of his noble friend who seconded the address, in which he construed the universal respect and loyalty which her Majesty so well deserved, and which she so generally received, as a proof of an increased and increasing respect for her Majesty's Ministers. He should have thought that his noble friend would have known that there was a clan like devotion and loyalty which was independent of any consideration of Ministerial measures. The noble marquis then expressed a hope that some measures would be introduced for Ireland to which he could give his consent. He admitted that there was less agitation in Ireland, but still fearful crimes were committed.—The Duke of RICHMOND complained that nothing was said in the speech about agriculture, although the agriculturists were in a state of great distress. If the Income-tax should be re-enacted, he trusted that it would be in an amended form as regarded the agriculturists. At present the farmer was called upon to pay it on the value of his land, although no tradesman was obliged to pay it except on his profits. That should be altered in justice to the industrious body which it affected. He hoped that due attention would be given by her Majesty's Government to the agricultural distress of the country.—Lord WHARNCLIFFE explained that the reason why agricultur was left out of the Royal speech was because it was not in a flourishing condition.—Lord BROUGHAM expressed his congratulations at the flourishing state of the finances, and proceeded to say that the late visit of the King of the French had produced a most salutary effect, both here and in France. It promoted and increased an improved feeling in the French people towards this country; and those difficulties which had been happily overcome, as well as those which remained to be overcome, had been overcome by that means, without a sacrifice of interest or honour—without concession, or the shadow of concession, on the one part or on the other. (Hear.) Neither was there any alliance between this country and France, or any yielding of France to England or England to France, in the matter; but, upon perfectly equal terms—terms of perfect, absolute, and unbroken equality—without alliance and without ill-will, with a perfect friendship, but without sacrifice, and without a shadow of concession being asked by the one side or given by the other, by reason chiefly of that reception were those difficulties concluded.—After brief speeches from the Earl of HARDWICKE and the Earl of MALMESBURY, the Marquis of LANSDOWNE referred to the decision of the House of Lords in the O'Connell case, and expressed his opinion that the improved state of things in Ireland was to be attributed to the care and diligence and respect which their lordships had shown for the feelings, and interests, and constitutional rights of that people. The Marquis of Lansdowne adverted to the difficulties which had arisen with France, and said that it was from the want of due explanation in the first instance, that questions, small and insignificant in themselves, gradually magnified themselves in importance, till they threatened permanently to involve the interests of all Europe.—The Earl of ABERDEEN assured the house that in the representations which it was his duty to make to the French Government, he would have been ashamed to ask any thing which he would not, in a similar situation, have been fully prepared to grant. On this principle they had acted, and in proof of this system of explanation, and of good understanding between the two countries, the present happy result of the discussion bore ample witness. (Hear, hear.)

Some conversation took place between the Lord Chancellor, Lord Campbell, and Lord Brougham, on the subject of the bill for abolition of arrest passed last Session, and upon other legal measures. Lord Brougham took the opportunity of saying that the £20 clause, about which there had been such an outcry against him, was added in committee and was not introduced by him. But most blessed effects had proceeded from the clause, as appeared, for instance, in Captain Williams's report on prisons. This report was a splendid panegyric on the law; it showed that it had not only worked admirably in cleansing the gaols of unfortunate debtors, but that in no instance had it diminished credit, where credit ought to be given, in wholesome course of business.

The Address was then agreed to unanimously, and a committee appointed to carry it up to her Majesty. The house adjourned at eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The House met for business at four o'clock.

THE ADDRESS.—Mr. CHARTERIS moved the address in answer to her Majesty's speech. The seconder was Mr. T. BARING. The speeches of both the members referred so exclusively to the points of her Majesty's speech, that it is not necessary to follow them.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL concurred in the congratulations of the speech in some points, but did not think Ministers had any right to take credit for their negotiations with France. The noble lord adverted to all the circumstances connected with the arrest of Mr. Pritchard, and referring to the correspondence between M. de Jarnac, M. Guizot, and the Earl of Aberdeen, said, it appeared to him, that, in the first place, this Government was disposed to make demands on which it did not afterwards insist, and, that on the other hand, the French Government refused at first to enter at all into the discussion. That, because of the excitement, because, in fact, there were reasons for reparation, therefore they need not enter at all into the discussion. He confessed he could not see the moderation of this Government. He believed that the two Governments of France and England were both too much influenced by the pressure from without, and that the understanding between them was not cordial and complete. The cloud which menaced the duration of peace had, however, blown away, and he now trusted that Ministers on both sides of the channel would feel that it was for the interest of their respective nations and for the peace of the world, that they should remain united, and that they should not suffer their subordinate officers at a distance of three or four thousand leagues to disturb their common tranquillity. The present state of Spain had been produced by the cordial understanding between England and France, two of the most free nations of the earth; and that was a result which no man could be proud of. Whilst he hoped that that cordial understanding would yet ripen into friendship, he hoped that it would in future be employed in the promotion of commerce, in the propagation of intelligence, in the increase of freedom, in the destruction of slavery, and not for the substitution of a tyrannical Government for mild and constitutional sway. Lord John Russell next condemned the proceedings which had taken place in regard to Ireland, and referred to the secession of Mr. Gladstone. He also adverted to the agricultural question, and gave his opinion that protection was the bane of agriculture, rather than its support.—Mr. MILES, in reference to this opinion, asked how it was, if the noble lord thought so, he had himself proposed a fixed duty upon corn? (Hear.) Had the noble lord found it convenient to alter his views and to ally himself to the League? (Hear, hear.) From the noble lord's own statement it would appear as though a sudden conversion had come upon him, and he had determined to follow out the principles of that body.—Mr. GLADSTONE explained the motives which had induced him to resign. He spoke in terms of great friendship and respect for his colleagues, and explicitly stated that he did not resign from any difference of opinion with them on general subjects, but intimated that his reason was because he thought their proposed measures as to Maynooth College did not agree with his own. He believed the spirit of their measure with respect to the endowment of the College of Maynooth differed much from the spirit of that which he had deliberately recommended. His uniform conviction was, that though he was not to fetter his judgment by reference to abstract theory, yet that it was due to the public to place himself in a position to form an honest and an unsuspected judgment. He had, therefore, taken a course which had caused him much pain, and which had separated him from men with whom he had acted in public life, and of whom he was bound to say he continued to regard them with unaltered sentiments of public regard and private attachment. (Hear.)—Sir R. PEEL fully confirmed Mr. Gladstone's statement, and spoke of that right hon. gentleman in most complimentary and friendly terms, expressing his personal esteem for him, and admiration of his talents. The right hon. baronet, after explaining these points, said, "I refer to these substantial facts in answer to the small insinuations of the noble lord." Sir R. Peel then adverted to the speech of Lord J. Russell, which he characterised as one of the most bitter party speeches which could be well imagined. The right hon. baronet defended the course of the Government in regard to the negotiations with France. He had never (he said) asked more of the French Government than that which he ultimately got—a fair and reasonable reparation. He should have felt that he was pursuing a course inconsistent with good policy if he had asked for a reparation humiliating to France. He denied that Government had complimented itself at the close of last session on account of its wisdom. All that had been stated was, that the differences had been adjusted by the justice and moderation of the respective Governments of the two countries. He rejoiced in the good understanding which now existed between the two countries, as there must from their proximity to each other be a good understanding, or something differing little from downright hostility between them. There was not one reparation made by France to us which he would not have made to France himself if the circumstances had been reversed. (Hear.) Sir R. Peel thus disposed of the accusation made against France of truckling to this country:—"The French Government has been charged with a dishonourable subserviency to England and to English interests. I do not believe, however, that the eminent men of France can entertain any such opinion. Look at the French Chambers and see what is there passing—not in detail, but at the general tone of language and feeling which there prevails. I do not believe, however, that men so distinguished as Dupin, Molé, and De Tocqueville, eminent alike as an orator, a writer, and politician, can seriously believe that the French Government have dishonoured France. But these charges will be brought against the one and the other." In the concluding portion of his speech, Sir R. Peel made an important disclosure of his intentions in regard to financial matters. He said:—"I am aware that the general practice has been to defer the financial statement until April or May. That course would have dictated that I should state nothing until at any rate the estimate had been proposed; but I thought it better, when allusion had once been made to the continuance of the Income-tax, when so important and so serious a question had once been mooted, I thought it better not to observe the course of former precedent, but at once to place a general outline of our financial scheme before the House and the country. (Loud cheers.) It will be seen that measures affecting several important branches of commerce will be introduced, and so I thought this the wisest course—though subject to some inconvenience, and opposed to the rule of ordinary practice. The next week shall not elapse without the statement to which I have alluded (Hear, hear.) The house will then have the opportunity of determining whether under us the condition of the country has deteriorated, or whether we continue to possess that confidence, without which we could not usefully conduct its affairs, and without which—the noble lord will pardon me for saying—no Government ought to remain in office." (Loud cheers.)—Mr. VILLIERS contended that the present prosperity of the country was owing to the relaxation of the protective system.

In reply to some remarks from Mr. SHEIL, Sir JAMES GRAHAM said it was the determination of the Government to propose an Irish Registration Bill this session. The Maynooth question and the Academical Education Bill would precede it.

Lord PALMERSTON referred at some length to the questions mooted between this country and France. In reference to the right of search his lordship said he was afraid that out of complaisance to the present Ministers of France, her Majesty's Government were about to sacrifice the great principles of a measure for which the British Parliament had always evinced the warmest interest.

The Address was unanimously carried, and the house adjourned at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

THE SESSIONAL ORDERS.—A desultory conversation arose respecting the accustomed Sessional Orders, some of which were postponed. In the course of the discussion Mr. T. DUNCOMBE renewed a notice which he had given last session of Parliament, of his intention to move for a select committee to inquire whether, in any counties or boroughs empowered under the Reform Act to send members to the House of Commons, such members were returned through the illegal or unconstitutional interference of members of the House of Peers. The hon. gentleman said he would undertake to prove that three-fourths of the temporal Peers and two-thirds of the Bishops were guilty of an infringement of the privileges of the House of Commons.

RAILWAY BILLS.—On the standing order which limits the presentation of petitions for private Bills to twenty one days from the first Friday after the meeting of Parliament, Lord HOWICK suggested that Railway Bills should be excepted from the rule, and that twenty-one days from the presentation of the report of the Board of Trade should be allowed to the promoters of every scheme so reported on to make up their minds whether to proceed with the Bill or not.—Sir R. PEEL said he would consider the proposition.—Lord HOWICK then alluded to the fact, that business to a great extent, and with immense profit, had been done in certain railways labouring under great depression in the market, and which, a few hours afterwards, had been favourably reported on; and said that such intended favourable reports must, somehow or other, have been known to the parties so speculating.—Mr. V. SMITH asked whether or not the Government intended to stand by the reports of the railway department of the Board of Trade. (Hear, hear.) Was that house to be placed in the position of deciding upon railway schemes, with the weight of Government thrown in one way or the other?—Sir R. PEEL said he conceived that such reports could never be regarded in any other light than firstly, as an elucidation of the facts of the case; and secondly as a recommendation founded on such elucidation. (Hear, hear.) Now, in his (Sir R. Peel's) opinion, the weight that ought to be attached to the decisions of the Board would very much depend on the clearness and the strength of the reasons given by that Board for such decisions. (Hear, hear.) He did not think that ever it was intended that the reference to the Board of Trade should go beyond this. (Hear, hear.) He should greatly deplore and deprecate any course which should involve the Government, as a Government, in matters of private bills or the commercial speculations of associated parties. (Cheers.) Neutrality was the best course—one most acceptable to the people, and most consonant to the character of the Administration of this country, from whatever party formed.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.—In answer to a question from Mr. Rice upon the subject of a recently published report respecting Harbours of Refuge, Sir R. PEEL expressed his regret that a document which had been confidentially prepared for the Government alone should have been published to the world. He had not the slightest idea through what channel these documents were obtained, but somehow or other the newspapers continually managed to get hold of them. (A laugh.) As the report of the harbours of refuge had been published, he had of course no objection to comply with the request of the hon. member for Dover, and to lay it upon the table. The report had occupied the most serious attention of her Majesty's Ministers. To the opinions of the very distinguished officers who had formed that commission great weight would naturally be attached. At the same time, he (Sir R. Peel) felt that the cost of carrying out their recommendations would be very great indeed. Take, for instance, the case of Dover alone, there would be a sum required of not less than £2,500,000. Now, with respect to one of the ports mentioned by the commissioners—he meant Holyhead—the recommendations made by them would be at once carried into effect, for the importance of the intercourse between Ireland and this country required that this should be the case (Hear, hear.) But upon the other recommendations of the report, Government had not yet come to any decision.

THE ADDRESS.—POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.—Mr. CHARTERIS brought up the report of the Address to her Majesty. On the question that it be read a second time, Mr. HUME regretted that, though her Majesty in the Address was congratulated on the prosperity of the finances, there was no mention of any relief for the people, either in the shape of reduced taxation or in the diminution of duties imposed upon articles of primary necessity essential to the support and employment of the lower classes. He trusted that he should yet find Ministers combining economy and retrenchment with those principles of free trade which some hon. gentlemen thought ruinous to the country, but which he believed to be absolutely necessary for its welfare and for the development of its resources.—Mr. WILLIAMS insisted on the necessity of retrenchment, and said the state of the country was not so satisfactory as to warrant the congratulations in the Speech.—Mr. S. CRAWFORD regretted that the Speech did not contain a promise that a measure should be immediately introduced into Parliament founded on the recommendations of the Commission on the Tenure of Land in Ireland. He never knew the state of Ireland so lawless as it was at present; and it would be impossible to improve it till some law were passed regulating the condition of landlord and tenant.—Mr. WAKLEY said he imagined, from the terms of the Speech, that it was now decided to continue the Income-tax. That was an obnoxious tax to the people of England; but if a sliding scale were applied to it, the feelings of the country would be much modified respecting it; especially, should it be accompanied by a reduction of the duties levied on articles of necessary consumption. He then proceeded to complain of the great distress now prevailing among the unskilled labourers; he hoped that, when Sir James Graham brought in his new bill of settlement, he would move for a committee to inquire into their condition, which was most deplorably wretched. He regretted that there was no intimation of the intentions of the Government with respect to the New Poor-law. That law was still unsettled, and, as it now stood, could not be maintained much longer in this country. Mr. Wakley then censured the determination of the Irish members not to attend this session in their places in Parliament. The Irish members made great complaints against English members for not attending to the grievances of their country—perhaps justly; but he had never seen any of them bring forward a series of measures which he would propose for the relief of Ireland, even in a native Parliament on College-green. In pursuing such a negative course of action, they were neither acting justly by English members, nor wisely by themselves.—The report was then agreed to, and the house adjourned at eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their lordships met at twelve o'clock.

The LORD CHANCELLOR appeared at the table, and announced that her Majesty had appointed half-past two to receive the Address, at Buckingham Palace.

At a quarter before two, the Lord Chancellor, accompanied by the Marquis Camden and Lord Glenlyon, the mover and seconder of the Address, the Duke of St. Albans, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Earl of Ellenborough, Earl Nelson, Lord Colchester, Lord Hawarden, Lord Redesdale, and other noble peers, proceeded with the Address to the Palace.—The house will not meet again till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker, in his state carriage, accompanied by a number of the members of this house, also waited upon her Majesty with the Address agreed to on Wednesday evening. Many of the members were dressed in uniform.

At the meeting of the house in the afternoon, the SPEAKER stated that her Majesty had been graciously pleased to return the following answer to the Address:—

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—

"I return you my warmest thanks for your loyal and dutiful address.

"I rely with confidence and satisfaction on the result of your deliberations, and I trust they will tend to promote the prosperity of all classes of my people."

In answer to a question from Mr. F. Baring, Sir J. GRAHAM said he did not intend to introduce the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill this session.

Mr. Ewart put some questions respecting the hostilities between Monte Video and Buenos Ayres, in answer to which, Sir R. PEEL said that when the proposal for interference was made to France, that Government at once hearkened to the call, and joined in their efforts. He trusted that, with the concurrence of Brazil, the three Governments, by acting in complete concert, would make such representations to the belligerent parties as would terminate these disastrous events.

RAILWAYS.—Lord G. SOMERSET moved for leave to bring in the six following Bills:—the Companies Clauses Consolidation Bill; the Lands Clauses Consolidation Bill; the Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill; the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Bill; the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Bill; the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Bill; the object of the Government in introducing bills was to embody the statutes which already existed in one uniform act. A long discussion ensued, in the course of which Sir R. PEEL said he had that day had an interview with his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade, and he thought it would not be desirable to postpone the presentation of those reports that related to railways that might be considered to belong so a particular class, as immediately bearing on other railways, till the whole of the reports should be ready. His right hon. friend would be prepared in the course of next week to take one particular class of railways—say the Kentish lines—and present, during the week, the report on that class and proceed with various others.—Col. SIBTHORP asked if any of the four or five gentlemen composing the Commission were connected, directly or indirectly, with any of those railroads which had been brought under their consideration?—Lord G. SOMERSET said, all he knew from the communications which had been given was that parties always expressed themselves satisfied with the fairness and intelligence with which the cases that came before the Committee had been discussed.—Mr. WAKLEY said, it was stated generally and openly by parties acquainted with railway subjects that there must have been private information in the market, or parties could not have made such enormous sums of money within a few weeks. (Hear, hear.) It was clear that certain parties in the City who were engaged in the sale of railway shares happened to be right in their speculations, and were not wrong in any one instance for several weeks; and one gentleman made £40,000 by the sale of shares in a single day, the shares having gone from a small premium to a premium of £9 10s. or £10 in the course of a few hours.—After some conversation on this subject, leave was given to bring in the bills.

LAW OF SETTLEMENT.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM said that he would, on next Tuesday, move for leave to bring in a Bill for the purpose of consolidating the law of settlement in England.

IRISH CONSTABULARY.—Lord CLEMENTS moved for some returns connected with the Irish Constabulary force, which were granted. A return of the number of Railway Companies which have complied with the act of last session for regulating the conveyance of passengers in third-class carriages, was moved for by Mr. WALLACE.

THE CORN LAWS.—A warm discussion was raised in the latter part of the sitting, in consequence of a remark made by Mr. COBDEN, of the absence of any allusion to the Corn Laws in the Royal Speech. The leaders of the League in the house, and the chiefs of the agricultural interest, nearly all engaged in the debate.——Mr. BRIGHT made a speech that was denounced by Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN as "bullying" in its tone, and said that if he thought to set the tenants of England against their landlords by such vituperation, he was much mistaken.—Mr. Cobden and the hon. member for Manchester were complimented by the Ministerial side for the temper and moderation they displayed.—Mr. Villiers and Mr. Bankes also spoke.—Sir. R. PEEL, in a brief address, said he would not be provoked on such an occasion as the present into a discussion of the Corn laws.

The house then adjourned at a quarter to nine.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.—After the presentation of various petitions, Sir R. PEEL said he was of opinion that it would be expedient to appoint a select committee to consider the best mode of conducting private business, as there were so many railway bills before the house. He, therefore, requested Mr. Wallace to postpone his proposed motion on the subject, which that hon. gent. consented to do.

GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—INCOME-TAX.—Sir R. PEEL subsequently rose and said, Sir, it may be convenient for me now to state the course which I intend to pursue on Friday next. I believe it will be competent for me, without moving for a Committee of Ways and Means, to take the course of moving a resolution to continue for a further period the laws which impose a tax on income. But as that is not the usual course of late years, I propose, on Wednesday, to adopt the following proceeding, viz., to move for a Committee of Ways and Means, and then in the Committee of Ways and Means on Friday next, I shall propose a resolution to the effect, that the laws which impose a tax on income in Great Britain, and the law which imposes an additional stamp duty in Ireland, should be continued for a further limited period.—Mr. HUME: Will the right honourable gentleman explain to the house what are the taxes he intends to remit?—Sir ROBERT PEEL: I propose on Friday to enter into a general review of the subject, when I will state what course I intend to take, but I cannot enter into any explanation now. I will give the fullest statement on Friday next with respect to the nature of the proposals her Majesty's Government intend to adopt.

The house resolved into a Committee of Supply, when a desultory conversation arose respecting the financial condition of the country.

When the house resumed, Mr. MANNERS SUTTON moved that a select committee be re-appointed to inquire into the administration of the law for the relief of the poor in the unions formed under the Act 22 Geo. III., c. 3, s. 83, and to report to the house their opinion whether it was expedient that the said union should be maintained.—Agreed to.

NEW WRIT.—On the motion of Mr. YOUNG a new writ was ordered to be issued for the election of a member for the county of Buckingham, in the room of Mr. Charles Scott Murray, who, since his election, had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

The house then agreed to several resolutions regulating the periods for reading railway bills, and, at six o'clock, adjourned till Monday.

MISCELLANEOUS BUSINESS.

NEW MEMBERS.—On Tuesday Mr. Somes, member for Dartmouth, and Mr. Clifton, for North Lancashire, took the oaths and their seats.

NEW WRITS.—The SPEAKER informed the house that he had, during the recess, issued a new writ for the election of a new member for the borough of Dartmouth, in the room of Sir John Seale, deceased.——New writs were ordered for the election of members for the following places:—For the southern division of Wiltshire, in the room of Mr. William Sidney Herbert, who had accepted the office of her Majesty's Secretary at War; for the borough of Buckingham, in the room of Sir Thomas Fremantle, who had accepted the office of Chief Secretary of Ireland; for the borough of Stamford, in the room of Sir George Clerk, who had accepted the office of Master of the Mint.——A new writ was ordered for the election of a knight for the county of Tipperary, in the room of the Hon. Robert Otway Cave, deceased.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS.—Lord ASHLEY: to move on Tuesday, Feb. 18, for leave to bring in a bill to regulate the hours of labour in factories.—Mr. YOUNG gave notice, on the part of Sir R. Peel, that it was his intention to make his financial statement to the house on Friday, 14th February.

PETITION AGAINST THE RETURN FOR DARTMOUTH.—A petition was presented complaining of the last return for the borough of Dartmouth.

MEDICAL REFORM BILL.—In answer to Mr. Wakley, Sir J. GRAHAM stated that he should introduce the Medical Reform Bill next Tuesday week.

LAW OF DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.—In answer to Mr. Hume, Sir. J. GRAHAM said, that considering the immense change recently made in the law of debtor and creditor, and that the power of imprisonment for debts under £20 was abolished, he could not undertake, in the present session, to propose any new measure. It would be expedient, he thought, to give a certain time during which the recent change in the law should be tested by experience.

LORD STANLEY.—We regret to state that Lord Stanley is suffering from so severe an attack of gout in the knee, that his lordship is not able to leave his bedroom without assistance.

Upwards of 250 houses were last week burnt down in the village of Luc (Switzerland). The clergyman's residence and the town hall were also reduced to ashes. The total damage from the fire is estimated at 100,000f. Provisions and necessaries have been sent in by the surrounding villages to the sufferers.

The department at the Post-office where letters used to be opened, has been abolished, the Government probably not desiring a repetition of the excitement which was created last session upon the subject.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT-GARDEN.

On Monday night last a monster Concert was announced at this theatre, which proved to be for the benefit of Mr. Alcroft, who for the last eight years has been giving annual entertainments of a similar nature to his friends and the public. The house was crowded to excess; the bill of fare was lengthy to excess, and the good humour of the audience was excessive also.

The Concert commenced with the Overture to "La Gazza Ladra," which was but indifferently played by an inefficient band, placed in the usual theatrical orchestra. In the front of the stage were placed four piano-fortes, and behind them rose a gallery of huge dimensions, which we at first mistook for the choral department of a performance not promised in the programme. The vocalists were Madame Albertazzi, Mrs. Shaw, the Misses Smith, Miss Steele, Miss S. Novello, Miss Rainforth, Miss Hawes, and Madame F. Lablache; Messrs. Brizzi, C. and H. Braham, A. Giubilei, Handel Gear, W. H. Seguin. Signor F. Lablache, and Mr. H. Russell.

The instrumental department was graced by the presence of four fair pianistes, Madame Dulcken, her sister, Mdlle. David, Miss C. Orger, and, that more than pianiste, Miss Bendixen. We had several other treats from many old favourites. Signor Negri conducted, and Mr. Thirlwall led the orchestral band.

Mr. Hackett, the American actor, made his first appearance this season on Tuesday, at this theatre, as Sir John Falstaff, in the first part of "King Henry the Fourth." The performance was not one to be commended; and as it has not yet been repeated, we shall say no more. Mr. Betty's Hotspur was equally ineffective. Upon the whole, we do not think the production of the play will do much for the management. "Antigone" continues to be received with the greatest applause.

SADLER'S WELLS.

The production of the five act play of "Honesty" at Covent Garden last week—which has however since departed quietly from the bills of immortality, the lessee having found, for once, that "Honesty" was not the best policy—was followed up, on Thursday, by the bringing out of another five act drama at Sadler's Wells, written by Mr. Serle, and called "The Priest's Daughter," which promises to enjoy a longer existence. The scene is laid in Normandy, and the time chosen is the close of the eleventh century, when France was one vast field of feudal warfare and rapacity. Madeline (Mrs. Warner) is an orphan residing with a poor woman, Sybella (Mrs. H. Marston). During one of the skirmishes she is protected from the insults of some soldiers by Count Robert (Mr. H. Marston), whom she has previously seen and admired; although she is conscious that disparity of rank must be an obstacle to their union. Sybella is desirous that Madeline should wed her son, Luitprand (Mr. John Webster.) The affections of the girl are, however, fixed upon Count Robert; and Sybella prevails upon Ambroise Mr. Phelps), the curé of St. Valerie, to use his influence with her. In a dilemma from the arguments on both sides, and yet determined not to wed Luitprand, she allows herself to be protected by Count Robert, and flies to his chateau. Ambroise, who is in reality the father of Madeline, although, as a priest, he dare not confess it openly, follows her to the castle, and endeavours to persuade her to return. She refuses, and he then goes back to the town, and tries to excite the people to take part with him against the Count. This they refuse to do, on the ground that Madeline has not that claim upon their assistance which she would be entitled to were she the daughter, wife, or sister of any of them. Ambroise then determines that she shall marry Luitprand, and to this effect introduces him into the castle, where, by confessing to Madeline that he Ambroise) is her father, he prevails on her to wed the young man. He is about to perform the ceremony, when they are interrupted by Count Robert, who immediately accuses her of infidelity, and threatens to treat her in future as the mere fallen creature of his wishes. In the meantime the people have attacked the castle, and are repulsed, some of the ringleaders being taken prisoners. They are brought before Count Robert, and he offers to pardon them if Madeline will give him a kiss as a ransom for each, before them. She refuses, and the Count determines to behead them. Ambroise in the meantime poisons a goblet of wine, which the Count is about to drink from, when Madeline, yielding to her love for him, dashes it from his hand. This reassures the Count of her love for him, and he determines to make her his wife. Ambroise had, however, been a prey to such despair at finding the plan for poisoning the Count defeated, that he swallows some deadly potion himself, and dies at the conclusion of the piece.

It will be seen from the foregoing synopsis that there is considerable interest in the plot, although it may be objected to that it is of that kind which is rather suited to a melo-drama than a five-act play. But the situations are powerful: and the language bears evidence of great poetic feeling. It is also vigorous, and carefully written.

Of the acting generally we can speak in terms of the highest commendation. The principal part was that of Madeline, and Mrs. Warner acquitted herself in it most ably. Mr. Phelps was equally effective as the Priest, although an imitation of Macready sometimes came a little too forcibly to mar the general excellence of the performance. The remaining principal characters were well sustained by Mr. J. Webster, Mrs. and Mr. H. Marston. The latter gentleman does not lack energy nor perception, but there is occasionally a hardness in his style which is somewhat unpleasant.

There was considerable applause at the end of the play, and Mr. Serle was called before the curtain to acknowledge the cheers of the audience. He spoke most highly of the efforts of Mrs. Warner and Mr. Phelps to restore a taste for the legitimate drama, which remarks were responded to in a similar spirit. Indeed, as we have several times had the pleasure of stating, nothing can be more deserving of support than the very creditable manner in which this theatre has been conducted from the commencement of its present management.

LYCEUM.

Those who can imagine Keeley, as Mr. Boodle, travelling on the banks of the Danube, for an English sauce and pickle establishment—winning a château on the river in a lottery, and being compelled to pass one night in its ruined hall to establish his claim to it, amidst imaginary ghosts and wolves, and real fleas and gipsies, can conceive how comically he enacted the part, in an agreeable drama produced here on Monday night, and called "Taking Possession." The story which serves to introduce him in these predicaments, is to this effect. Karl (Mr. Craven), a young peasant, betrothed to Meta (Miss Arden), has purchased a ticket in a lottery—one of those grand affairs of which we sometimes receive a prospectus by the post, forwarded by unknown bankers in places a great way off. An old uncle (Mr. Meadows) places the ticket in the salt-box for security, and he takes it out again by mistake to wrap some salt in that he gives a gipsy, Balthazar (Mr. Wigan), to eat with his meat. Balthazar sells the ticket to Mr. Boodle, and presently afterwards it turns up a prize—a castle on the Danube, which he starts per steamer to take possession of. In the meantime, Karl has discovered his loss, and as Balthazar was, in some measure, the cause of his misfortune, he determines to make reparation. Accordingly, he disguises himself as a German Student, and accompanies Boodle to his new residence, a dilapidated château, just better than a complete ruin. Here, with the assistance of his wife, Corra (Mrs. Wigan), he contrives to make Boodle so wretchedly frightened and uncomfortable, that he is at last happy, upon any terms, to give up all right to the property. It is accordingly restored to Karl, and the various parties find everything terminate satisfactorily.

We have said that Keeley was enormously funny as the traveller for the pickle warehouse. His terror and utter misery in the dreary moonlit chamber, where he must pass the night, was capitally portrayed; contrasting richly with his swagger at first arriving amidst his tenantry—the "tenantry" being Balthazar's gipsies, who have lived a long time for nothing in the Castle, and whose ideas of paying rent are somewhat vague and unsatisfactory. Mr. Wigan's Balthazar was admirably dressed—so also was his German Student. He appears constantly to study the most effective manner in which he can supplant the old conventional theatrical modes of costume; and his impersonation of foreigners generally, especially scamps, is unequalled. Mrs. Wigan was also effective as Corra, reminding us of her old gipsy character in the "Beulah Spa." Mr. Meadows was droll enough as the old Seneschal, who, after the loss of the ticket, harps perpetually on one idea—that he put it in the salt-box.

There was considerable applause at the fall of the curtain, mingled with some disapprobation.

The principal fault of the piece was its construction, for the dialogue was sprightly and full of humour; but the plot was not sufficiently strong to keep up the interest of the audience through two acts. It is always a dangerous experiment to drop a curtain in the middle of a laugh, except at some exciting point of expectancy. The farces of "The Marriage Certificate," and "A Model of a Wife" followed, and the programme concluded with "Valentine and Orson," which appears destined to survive all the other Christmas pieces.

FRENCH PLAYS.

M. Lafont and Mdlle. Nathalie continue to be great favourites at the St. James's Theatre; indeed, as their engagement is drawing to a close, the desire to witness their performance increases, and Mr. Mitchell has announced that the theatre will be open every evening next week.

A very entertaining vaudeville, entitled "Un Spectacle à la Cour," was performed on Monday, the plot of which turns upon an incident in the life of Gretry, the composer, who, being in the country for study and seclusion, takes some lessons for his amusement, in music, from a provincial professor. The great composer, however, appears so stupid, that he is handed over to the care of the daughter. She learns so much from Gretry, that she is enabled eventually to take the place of the prima donna at a very short notice in one of his operas, the principal singer having eloped that evening. She sings before the court, and succeeds so well, that a rich present is made her, which enables her to marry a rustic lover, who had been terribly jealous hitherto. The part of the girl Colombe was rendered exceedingly effective by Mdlle. Nathalie, and a favourite of several seasons. M. Leonard played admirably, with a fund of humour, in the character of the lover. The drama of "Catherine, ou la Croix d'Or," was performed the same evening, M. Lafont appearing as the sergeant, Austerlitz, and Mdlle. Nathalie as Catherine. This piece was formerly translated and played at the Haymarket, under the name of "The Maid of Croissy," when, if we mistake not, Mr. Webster and Mrs. Walter Lacy filled the chief rôles.

The houses have been excellently well attended by the chief part of the fashionable world now in London; indeed, there is every reason to believe that the lessee will make this the most lucrative, as well as the most attractive season he has yet had. Independently of the excellence of the chief performers, the merit of the stock company, and arrangements generally, appear to give universal satisfaction.

PRINCESS'

A pleasant farce called "The Brigadier" has been several times performed at this theatre. We believe there is a French piece, called "Chamberan," to which it bears some analogy. Mr. Wallack plays the principal character, Bras-de fer, admirably: in fact, the part is one of those so peculiarly suited to his style. Mr. Maddox has been to Paris in the hope of engaging the thirty-six wonderful children, who are now creating such excitement by their dancing, at the Academie Royale. He has not, however, succeeded: we understand that Mr. Lumley has secured their services during the ensuing Opera season, although the lessee of the Princess' offered them £250 a week for two months.

Mdlle. Nau will return to this house; and we hear that Mr. Forrest and Miss Cushman are amongst the latest engagements.

STRAND.

A laughable burlesque upon "Antigone" has been produced at this theatre, and with the most complete success. It is written by Mr. E. L. Blanchard, who has been very happy in seizing the best points in the original, capable of being turned into fun. The scene is a parody on the old Greek theatre, in the shape of the outside of Richardson's show. Mr. G. Wild is the devoted Antigone, and Mr. Hall the Creon of the piece; and the latter gentleman introduces some excellent imitations of O'Connell, Charles Kean, and others. Mr. R. Romer is ludicrously droll as the conductor of the orchestra: perhaps it is not going too far to say, that he is the great feature of the burlesque.

The concluding tableau, in which the various characters crouch under umbrellas, to avoid the vengeance of the gods, in the shape of a shower of rain, was hailed with shouts of laughter—we mean no pun.

The burlesque kept the audience, which was a very full one, in high good humour from its commencement until the fall of the curtain, and was loudly applauded throughout. It is full of puns and smart things; and will, doubtless, prove a hit for the management. Since Monday it has been repeated every night, with results equally satisfactory to the treasury, the author, the actors, and the audience.

OLYMPIC.

During the week, the opera of "The Maid of Judah" has been performed at this theatre, the character of Rebecca being played by Miss Alicia Nunn, a lady well known in the musical circles. She was supported by Mr. Binge as Ivanhoe, and a Mr. Fedor as Cedric; and a Signor Hermaine conducted. This cast does not exhibit great operatic strength, nor can we say that the opera was well performed; but it was evident that all engaged were trying to do their best, except one of the dramatis personæ, who might at all events have committed the words of his part to memory, instead of trusting entirely to the prompter.

"A. B."—We are all liable to mistakes. Problem No 235, in the "Chess Player's Chronicle," we cannot correct, there being some piece or pieces omitted.

A game kindly presented to us by a German player will be given next week.

The two periodicals just received, are excellent numbers. The "Chess Players' Chronicle" for February, contains the most difficult four-move problem we have ever seen. The games are very instructive—in this department, our magazine is far superior to "Le Palamede." "Le Palamede" in its matter is interesting, but the new diagrams introduced in the body of the work are absolutely frightful.

We have to thank a valued correspondent for satisfactorily proving to us that our statement respecting the comparative merits of English and Parisian chess club players, was erroneous. Not being sufficiently acquainted with the strength of the players in Le Cercle des Echecs we applied to a friend of ours who had tried his skill in both clubs, and who perhaps gave too partial an opinion. We had no idea, until the receipt of F. D's. letter, that our countrymen were numerically so strong in the art of "Chesse play."

The members of the Bristol Chess Club have recently subscribed a purse, for the purpose of presenting Mr. Staunton a splendid set of chess men.

The annual dinner of the Liverpool Chess Club took place on the 14th of January.

BADMINTON HOUSE, AND THE LAWN, ON SATURDAY MORNING, FEB. 1.

FESTIVITIES AT BADMINTON.

This magnificent seat of the ducal family of Beaufort has just been the scene of great rejoicing, consequent on the Marquis of Worcester attaining his majority on Saturday last.

Badminton House, it may be requisite to inform some of our readers, is situated near the Wiltshire border of Gloucestershire, 24 miles south-west of the city of Gloucester, equidistant (15 miles) from Bath and Bristol, and about 5½ miles east by north from Chipping Sodbury. The entire pile was erected in 1682, on a very extensive scale, for the family residence of the Dukes of Beaufort. It is built on the French model: the principal front is shown in one of our illustrations: it consists of a noble centre, ornamented with columns, and crowned with two cupolas; the wings are likewise embellished with pilasters, paneling, and urns, and terminate with two noble gateways. The offices are very extensive: the stabling is, perhaps, unrivalled in this country, the Duke of Beaufort's stud numbering nearly 150 first-rate hunters and carriage horses; and the domain comprises one of the noblest deer parks in England, being nearly 9 miles in circumference.

The festivities may be said to have commenced in the neighbourhood of Badminton, on Thursday, such was the enthusiasm of the tenantry, and indeed, of the inhabitants, generally, of the surrounding districts, by whom the Duke of Beaufort is universally beloved.

But for the recent demise of Lady Anne Culling Smith, and the serious indisposition of the Earl of Mornington, the festivities would have been kept up without intermission during the whole week, with the usual accompaniments of illuminations and fireworks. These latter were necessarily dispensed with under the circumstances; but, by the liberality of the Duke, the poorer dependents on his Grace's princely domain, (for whom such amusements are generally contrived) were provided with a very excellent substitute, in an abundance of good fare, which was distributed with unsparing hand to all applicants during two days. The carcases of no less than six oxen were given away, besides an immense quantity of other viands, and twenty hogsheads of strong ale.

The distinguished visitors had mostly assembled by Thursday. At eight o'clock in the evening, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge arrived from Belvoir Castle.

The Duke of Beaufort received his illustrious guest in the entrance-hall of the mansion, and led the way to the drawing-room, where his Royal Highness was introduced to the distinguished circle there assembled.

Dinner was served at half-past eight o'clock in the Great Hall, a superb apartment, which was brilliantly illuminated for the occasion. Among its more striking ornaments is a most elaborate piece of Grecian sculpture, in the form of a sarcophagus, cut from one entire block of marble, on the sides of which is represented, in alto relievo, a grand bacchanalian procession. This magnificent work of art, which is in a high state of preservation, was dug out of some ruins at Rome, and presented to the third Duke of Beaufort by Cardinal Alberoni. The walls are hung with antique sporting pictures, and the hall was otherwise decorated with a choice collection of plants.

The following is a list of the thirty-five guests who sat down to the sumptuous banquet:—

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, Earl Howe, Viscount Curzon and Lady Georgiana Curzon, the Earl and Countess of Jersey and Lady Clementina Villiers, Earl Bathurst, Viscount and Viscountess Barrington and the Hon. Mr. Barrington, the Hon. Miss Barrington, Viscount Cantalupe, Lord Alvanley, Sir William and Lady Georgiana Codrington, Lady Harriet Mitchell and Miss Mitchell, Count Anthony Esterhazy, Count Kinski, Mr. and Mrs. John Stanley, Mr. Walter Long, M.P., Mr. Long, jun., Mr. Lovel, Mr. Bagot, Mr. Warburton, Dr. Quin; and Captain Mildmay, in attendance on the Duke of Cambridge.

The family circle included the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, the Marquis of Worcester and the Ladies Blanche and Rose Somerset. The Duke of Cambridge occupied the centre of the table, having the Duchess of Beaufort and the Countess of Jersey respectively upon his right and left; in their turn supported by the Marquis of Normanby and Earl Bathurst. The Duke of Beaufort faced the illustrious Prince, having the Marchioness of Normanby and Viscountess Barrington upon his right and left hand.

The banquet was of the most sumptuous description, and the table was almost covered with gold and silver plate.

During dinner, the band of the Gloucestershire Yeomanry Cavalry, who are in the private service of his Grace, were stationed in an adjoining apartment, and played a variety of favourite music.

The ladies retired at half-past nine o'clock, and were subsequently joined by the gentlemen in the drawing-room, where tea and coffee were served.

There was an evening performance of music, and the festivities of the day closed with a dance.

On Friday morning, the Duke of Cambridge, attended by Capt. Mildmay, and accompanied by the Marquis of Worcester, the Earl of Jersey, Viscount Barrington, Count Esterhazy, Viscount Curzon, the Hon. Mr. Barrington, and Mr. Walter Long, M.P., left the mansion on a shooting excursion. The party proceeded to the Swan Grove cover, a favourite and extensive preserve upon the outskirts of the park, where about 300 head of game were killed.

The Duke of Beaufort was obliged to attend a magistrates' meeting at Cross Hands, in the neighbourhood, but his Grace returned to Badminton early in the afternoon.

At four o'clock, the carcass of an ox, trussed and spitted, and gaily decorated with blue ribbons, was conveyed (on a sledge drawn by three oxen through the village of Badminton, to the mansion and thence to Cherry Tree Bottom, a convenient locality in the park, where it had been arranged to roast the carcass entire.

the distinguished guests came out to the lawn to view the procession, which was accompanied by a great number of the villagers.—This spirited scene of old English festivity is shown in one of our Engravings.

At a quarter-past four o'clock, the tenantry of the Duke of Beaufort, to the number of two hundred, sat down to dinner in the servants' hall, a fine old baronial apartment in the south-west wing of the mansion. The walls of this room are hung round with upwards of sixty heads of the red deer which abound at Badminton, with the antlers entire. Festoons of evergreens were suspended on the walls, in every variety of form and direction, and at either end of the room were exhibited transparencies—the one representing the Beaufort arms, and the words "Hail! welcome guests," and the other bearing the following inscription —"Feb. 1, 1845. Many happy returns of the day to the Most Noble the Marquis of Worcester." There were besides an infinity of banners and flags, bearing appropriate devices and inscriptions.

Mr. Wedge, the noble Duke's land steward, presided; and grace was said by the Duke's domestic chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Buckley, rector of Badminton.

The bill of fare is a fine specimen of English living:—it includes a baron of beef, weighing 300lbs.; 6 haunches of venison; 6 necks of venison; 2 fillets of veal; 2 loins of veal; 4 hams; 2 rounds of beef; 6 dishes of boiled fowls; 6 dishes of roast fowls; 40 pheasants; 20 hares; 4 boiled legs of mutton; 4 roast saddles of mutton; and 6 venison pies; 20 jellies, 16 apple tarts; 18 plum puddings; 65 dishes of dessert.

To this excellent fare, it need scarcely be added, the guests did ample justice.

Within a very short period after the return of the shooting party, nearly the whole of the distinguished company in the mansion, left the drawing-room and proceeded to the hall, where the tenantry were seated. The Duke of Cambridge led in the Duchess of Beaufort; the Duke of Beaufort followed with the Marchioness of Normanby; and then came the Marquis of Worcester, leading Lady Georgiana Curzon, the other guests following in succession. At the entrance of the party, every man rose from table simultaneously, and the next instant the vaulted roof of the fine old hall reverberated with cheers of affectionate welcome.

The distinguished company having more than once made the circuit of the hall, retired; and, shortly afterwards, a banquet was served on the same scale of princely magnificence as on the previous day. Covers were laid for forty-two, the additions being Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, Lord Glamis, Lords Alfred and George Paget, Sir W. Massey Stanley, the Hon. W. L. Bathurst, and Mr. Granville Somerset.

After the ladies had retired to the drawing-room, the Duke of Beaufort and the Marquis of Worcester, accompanied by Earl Bathurst, the Earl of Jersey, and Sir W. Codrington, Lord A. Paget, and severa other noblemen paid a second visit to the hall in which the tenantry were dining, and were received with enthusiastic applause. Mr. Niblett, of Bristol, who was among the guests, then proposed the health of the Duke of Beaufort, which was drunk with all the honours, and responded to by his Grace with great kind-heartedness. Mr. Niblett then gave the health of the Marquis of Worcester, which was received with nine times nine rounds of applause, and the well-known "View halloo" of the Beaufort hunt. One of our illustrations represents this animated scene. The Marquis of Worcester appropriately returned thanks, expressing a hope that he should meet those present "at home and in the field for many years to come."

After the health of Sir W. Codrington had been drunk, the distinguished party withdrew from the hall; but, in a few moments, returned, accompanied by the Duke of Cambridge, who was received with three distinct rounds of applause. His Royal Highness then proposed the healths of the Duke of Beaufort and the Marquis of Worcester, which were again drunk with enthusiasm. The noble marquis was about to reply, when Mr. Niblett, addressing Sir W. Codrington, said, the company would feel highly honoured if his Royal Highness would condescend to remain in the hall while a song, composed in honour of the occasion, was sung by a gentleman present. His Royal Highness, in the kindest manner, at once acquiesced, and having seated himself at the foot of one of the tables, the following song was sung by Mr. Turnham, the chef de cuisine in the Duke of Beaufort's household.

DINNER TO THE TENANTRY.—DRINKING THE HEALTH OF THE MARQUIS OF WORCESTER.

Air.—The Fine Old English Gentleman.

Now rally round me, jovial friends, with merry hearts and ree,
A song in honour of the day we'll sing with social glee;
Fill high your flowing bumpers, boys, and shout with three times three,
To Worcester's Noble Marquis' health! and the majority
Of this young English Nobleman,—All of the Beaufort line!

For now shall grateful hearts rejoice while mirth and pleasure reign,
And joy's full chorus shall resound through woodland, hill, and plain
While Badminton's proud halls shall loud re-echo round the strain,
Of welcome to the Noble Heir of its wide-spread domain:—
This fine young English Nobleman,—All of the Beaufort line

Far as the princely sway from Severn's Banks to Wye,
On every jocund breeze that blows, the joyful news shall fly;
Old Ragland shall repeat the theme and Stoke's Manor reply,
While Troy shall be again besieged, but with a host who cry—
All Hail! to our young Nobleman,—Pride of the Beaufort line

The Home of his Forefathers! may he its fame increase,
Sustain, like them, the glories of his Plantagenet Race!
His bright ancestor'l Coronet, may he long live to grace,
And still may History's faithful page long find an honour'd place—
For this fine young English Nobleman,—All of the Beaufort line

Firm as the Oak whose roots have spread the soil long ages through,
A true-born Somerset he'll prove, the same high path pursue;
Unsullied by his banner bright, unchanged its loyal hue,
For well we know the Colours staunch, are of the right "True Blue."
Borne by this fine young Nobleman,—All of the Beaufort line!

While thus we greet the gallant Son upon his natal day,
Forget we not his Princely Sire! our dutious love to pay;
That Heaven may still watch over him, each honest heart will pray,
And Badminton may long be bless'd with the paternal sway,—
Of this fine illustrious Nobleman,—All of the Beaufort line!

His stately Halls were welcome smiles on Peasant and on Peer,
Whose Lawn supplies old English Sport, his larder good old Cheer;
Long o'er his hospitable gates, his Scutcheon proud may rear,
And there his ancient Motto stand,—"He scorns all change and fear,"—
Does this fine old English Nobleman,—All of the Beaufort line!

God bless our gracious Duchess! who extends her bounties wide,
Queen of this festive realm, may she in splendour long preside;
While her Son proves like his noble Sire, may she live to see with pride,
Each Daughter grace her own proud home, the lovely blooming Bride,—
Of some good young English Nobleman,—Worthy the Beaufort line!

In Doddington's romantic bowers, dispensing gay delight,
Dwells One, who, with her happy Lord, may lasting love unite;
Likewise the beauteous Baroness, just led by Hymen's light
To shed o'er fair Italia her British lustre bright:—
Both high-born, gifted Daughters,—All of the Beaufort line

Now let the flowing glass go round—away dull sorrow drive—
May peace and plenty bless the land, may Agriculture thrive;
And in each happy heart this day may memory keep alive,
When with old ale brew'd in '24, we drank in '45!
Health to Worcester's Noble Marquis,—Pride of the Beaufort line!

The song was loudly applauded; and at its close, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence proposed the health of the composer and singer, which was drunk with three times three.

The Duke of Cambridge then proposed the health of the Duchess of Beaufort, which was drunk with enthusiasm; and the health of the Earl of Bathurst, proposed by the Chairman, having been responded to, the Duke of Cambridge, and the other noble and distinguished guests, left the hall and rejoined the ladies in the drawing-room, where dancing was kept up with great spirit until an advanced hour in the morning.

The clock chimed the hour of twelve, when the bells of the neat little church adjoining the mansion struck up a merry peal, and the health of the Marquis of Worcester was proposed, and drunk by the company with all possible enthusiasm.

Meanwhile, the ox, which had been drawn in procession through the village and domain to the spot in the park where it had been arranged to roast it entire, was put down at ten o'clock at night; and the fire, though two miles distant from the mansion, was distinctly visible from the windows of the north front.

It had been arranged that a "lawn-meet" of the Beaufort Hunt should take place on Saturday morning, but the continued frost rendered this impossible.

At an early hour, the band of the Gloucestershire Yeomanry Cavalry played a serenade under the Marquis of Worcester's window, and afterwards took up their stations on the lawn in front of the great hall, where they continued to perform for some time.

In the surrounding villages, the day was to be kept as a general holiday, in honour of the noble marquis; every shop was closed, the humbler inhabitants of the district for miles around decked out in holiday clothes; and many of them wearing true blue rosettes, flocked into Badminton at an early hour, and took up their stations in the park, near the mansion.

Breakfast was served in the great hall; open house was kept in the servants' hall, where cold meat, bread, and beer were indiscriminately supplied to all comers; and from three to four hundred persons were frequently in the house at one time.

The "roasting ox" was, of course, a great feature of attraction to many, and during the whole morning there was a continuous stream of persons passing to and fro along the avenue leading from the mansion to Cherry Tree Bottom, where the roasting took place. A great many gentlemen on horseback, and a continuous string of carriages poured in, embracing every variety of equipage, from the dashing four-horse drag and aristocratic tandem to the humble vehicle of Farmer Giles.

At twelve o'clock, the company from the mansion proceeded in four carriages, on horseback, and on foot, to witness the distribution of the roasted ox. The spot was approached by a rustic arch of evergreens, within which a space was railed off by hurdles. Along the summit of a massive wall, within which the fire (now smouldering in ashes) had been enclosed, were ranged a number of rustic figures, in every variety of costume and attitude, and who watched with apparent eager anxiety the movements of an individual bearing a massive weapon shaped somewhat like a carving-knife, but rather larger than the sword of a Life Guardsman! One of our illustrations shows this scene.

The carriages having arrived at the spot, drew up in line, in order to afford their occupants an opportunity of viewing the ox. The word was given, and in a very few minutes nothing remained but the mere skeleton of the animal.

The crowd at this time assembled must have numbered at least 5000 persons, many of them having travelled from Bath and Bristol, respectively fifteen miles distant from Badminton. The distribution of the food was not so systematic as could be wished; and the pressure of the crowd became so great, that the meat and loaves (3000 in number) were, at length, thrown among the people.

The Duke of Cambridge and the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, with the other distinguished individuals, remained on the ground witnessing the distribution for more than an hour, during which period they were loudly and repeatedly cheered, the Marquis of Worcester coming in for a full share of the popular enthusiasm.

The outdoor revelry was kept up, without intermission, during the whole afternoon, and until midnight.

A grand banquet to 74 guests took place in the great hall of the mansion. The greater part of the company wore the Beaufort Hunt uniform—a blue coat and white waistcoat, elaborately embroidered with gold lace. Earl Howe, and some few other noblemen, wore the Belvoir Hunt uniform, viz.—scarlet coats with white facings. The Duke of Beaufort, and all the members of his Grace's family, were attired in mourning.

At the close of the banquet, the Duke of Cambridge proposed the toast of the day—the health of the Marquis of Worcester, and in the cheering, his Royal Highness acted as fugleman. The Marquis returned thanks, and the healths of the Duke of Beaufort, and the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge were drunk. "Success to the Beaufort Hunt" was then toasted with enthusiasm, and followed by the band playing "A southerly wind and a cloudy sky," in the chorus of which all the gentlemen joined.

The party soon after left the hall for the drawing-room, where dancing was kept up until shortly before midnight, Mr. Blagrove presiding at the pianoforte, accompanied by Mr. Redl, band-master of the Royal Gloucestershire Yeomanry Cavalry, on the cornet; the latter gentleman, likewise, on each evening, performed a solo on the tenor valve ophicleide, accompanied by Mr. Blagrove on the pianoforte; and Mr. Redl composed for the occasion a new Polka.

The Marquis of Worcester danced with Lady Georgiana Curzon several times during the evening, and took the hand of Lady Clementina Villiers in one quadrille.

In consequence of the approaching Sabbath, the guests retired before twelve o'clock.

The Duke of Cambridge left Badminton on Sunday afternoon, and most of the guests took their departure on Monday.

We should add a word of commendation for Mr. Wood, house-steward to the Duke of Beaufort, by whose excellent tact and judgment not only were the noble guests within the mansion entertained in that princely style for which his Grace's establishment is proverbial, but the humbler visitors were, at the same time, amply provided for.

A few minor celebrations of this most interesting event remain to be noticed.

Among the participators in the general festivity were the pupils educated in the Duchess of Beaufort's schools, in Badminton, and two or three of the adjacent villages. An ample supply of roast beef and plum-pudding, with a glass of wine, was given to each child, besides a gratuity in money, and at Badminton the school-room was fitted up for their amusement.

The festivities were not confined to Gloucestershire: at Monmouth an ox was roasted whole, in Agincourt-square, after having been paraded through the principal streets of the town to Troy House, the Duke of Beaufort's seat in that locality; and the poorer classes were regaled with old ale in honour of the occasion.

At Swansea and Crickhowell, there were similar demonstrations of affectionate attachment towards the noble duke and his family.

The length to which this notice has been extended, prevents our insertion of the programme of the musical performances at Badminton, obligingly forwarded by a Correspondent.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Accounts have been received from Vienna, dated 24th ult., stating that his Serene Highness the Duke Ferdinand of Saxe Coburg, who had partially recovered from his recent attack of illness, had experienced a relapse, which leaves now but faint hopes of his recovery.

A fishing bank of great extent has been recently resorted to by the fishermen, at a distance of about eighty miles to the east of Scarborough, where large quantities of fish, particularly soles of superior size and excellence, are now regularly taken, and fish have consequently been very cheap and abundant in the Yorkshire markets.

Letters from Berne state that the Government of Lucerne intend to recall home the Swiss regiment in the service of Naples, and that negociations are even commenced on the subject.

The Hanoverian Gazette states that the number of persons who attend Divine worship in the English private chapel in the King's palace is so increased of late that there is seldom sufficient room for the English community. The palace authorities have, consequently, issued a notification that all persons who are not Englishmen and who are desirous of frequenting the palace chapel must apply to the Court chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Wilkinson, who will grant permission, as long as there is sufficient accommodation.

A letter from Posen, dated Jan. 24, says "An extraordinary sensation, attended with the most sincere and universal sorrow, has been caused by the suicide of Count Edward Raczinsky. It seems that he has of late frequently said to his friends, that he was no longer suited to live with this generation, which desired to overthrow everything, and that this would lead to a state of things which he would not like to witness. Whether bodily suffering or disgust with life is not known."

Letters from St. Petersburgh, dated the 23rd ult., state that the Empress of Russia intends to repair to Germany in the course of the ensuing spring, for the benefit of her Imperial Majesty's health. The Emperor has named Councillor Krekmer as Russian Consul in London, in lieu of Chevalier Benkhausen, lately deceased.

We learn from Venice that the Duke de Bordeaux is now there and in perfect health.

The Aberdeen papers mention that John Gladstone, Esq., of Fasque, has become the proprietor of the estate of Phesdo and Pitnamoon, at the price of £32,000. This beautiful property lies nearly adjacent to Fasque.

The Moniteur Parisien says:—"The last accounts that we have received from the province of Oran announce that everything is tranquil. The Arabs are everywhere engaged in cultivation, which shows that there is no serious alarm as to the result of the intrigues of Abd-el-Kader in Morocco."

The King of Bavaria has written a letter to the Bishop of Wurzburg, in answer to his address of congratulation to his Majesty on the return of a new year, in which we remark the following tolerant passage:—"My wish is, that all exaggeration, in whatever relates to the church, may be avoided. Exaggeration produces an effect diametrically opposite to that which is intended, and only places weapons in the hands of adversaries."

Accounts from Florence state that the inhabitants of that city had been greatly alarmed in the night of the 20th ult., from the Arno rising again to a fearful height. Fortunately the rain, which fell all that day, ceased and the river soon sunk to its ordinary level. The preparatory steps for the formation of a railroad to connect Vienna with the road between Florence and Leghorn are in a great state of forwardness.

A dreadful affair occurred at Orleans last week. A carpenter, named Sesson, who had been discharged from a lunatic asylum as cured, in a sudden return of his malady, rose in the night, stabbed himself with a knife, and then plunged it repeatedly in the bodies of his two children, inflicting upon one, an infant only one year old, 22 wounds, and on the other, who was four years old, 15 wounds. The children died immediately; but the unfortunate father survived two days, and recovered his reason just before he expired.

RAILWAYS AND THE BOARD OF TRADE.

(From Tuesday Night's Gazette.)

Railway Department, Board of Trade, Whitehall, Feb. 4, 1845.

Notice is hereby given that the Board constituted by the Minute of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, of the 24th of August, 1844, for the transaction of railway business, having had under consideration the following schemes, for extending railway communication in the Worcester and Wolverhampton District, and in the district intermediate between the London and Birmingham and Great Western Railways, viz.:—

The Birmingham and Gloucester—Wolverhampton Line,
The Birmingham and Gloucester—Deviation Line,
The London, Worcester, Rugby, and Oxford Railway, with an extension from Worcester to Dudley (narrow gauge),
The Oxford and Rugby (wide gauge),
The Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton (wide gauge), have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the Birmingham and Gloucester—Deviation Line,

The London, Worcester, Rugby, and Oxford Railway, with an extension from Worcester to Dudley (narrow gauge);

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Although the supply of English wheat on sale to-day was not to say extensive, it was by far more than equal to the wants of the dealers. The demand for all descriptions was, therefore, very dull, and Monday's quotations were not supported. So little was doing in foreign wheat that the rates were almost nominal. The supply of barley was extensive. The best parcels supported previous rates; but other kinds might have been purchased on easier terms. The same may be said of malt. Oats, beans, and peas had a downward tendency, with a heavy inquiry.

ARRIVALS.—English wheat, 4560; barley, 5570; oats, 5850 quarters. Irish: wheat, —; barley, —; oats, 4210 quarters. Foreign: wheat, —; barley, 1730; oats, 320 quarters. Flour, 4220 sacks; malt, 7820 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 48s; ditto, white, 46s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 30s to 36s; grinding barley, 27s to 30s; distilling, 26s to 30s; malting ditto, 33s to 35s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 58s to 63s; brown ditto, 56s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 59s to 60s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s, potatoe ditto, 23s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s to 22s; ditto, white, 21s to 23s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 38s to 40s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 36s to 36s; white, 33s to 35s; boilers, 36s to 38s, per quarter. Town made flour, 42s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lb. Foreign.—Fine wheat, —s to —s; Dantzig, red, 38s to 43s; white, 50s to 54s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s to 24s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 16s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, American, 19s to —; Baltic, 18s to —, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—With the exception of linseed, as well as cakes—commanding a steady sale, at full prices—the seed trade is heavy, and previous rates are with difficulty supported.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d½ to 6d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 5d; barley, 33s 10d; oats, 21s 6d; rye, 31s 3d; beans, 35s 8d; peas, 35s 4d.

Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 45s 7d; barley, 34s 3d; oats, 21s 5d; rye, 32s 1d; beans, 25s 8d; peas, 35s 9d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 4s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 7s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—During the whole of the week there has been a decided improvement in the demand for all descriptions of tea, the quotations of which have, in some instances, an upward tendency. The stock, in London, is now 29,960,000 lbs, against 26,374,000 ditto, about the same time in 1844.

Sugar.—In West India and Mauritius sugars exceedingly little business has been transacted since our last, at barely previous rates; but Bengal has commanded rather more attention, notwithstanding the heavy stocks in warehouse.

Coffee.—This market continues in a very sluggish state, yet prices remain much about the same. Small parcels of good ordinary Ceylon have sold at 51s to 51s 6d per cwt. The stocks still continue larger, especially of Ceylon.

Rice.—This article is in slow request, yet holders will not accept lower rates.

Oils.—Linseed oil is in good request at full prices. In other kinds, only a moderate business is doing.

Provisions.—For Irish butter there is a slight improvement in the demand, yet prices are somewhat lower. Carlows, landed, have sold at 94s to 98s; Clonmel, 92s to 98s; Cork, 92s to 96s; Limerick, 90s to 94s; and Dublin, 86s to 94s per cwt. Foreign butter moves off slowly—fine stubble Kiel 104s to 108s; and the best Friesland, 96s to 100s per cwt. The market for bacon is heavy. Waterford, landed, has been taken at 40s to 43s; heavy, 38s to 41s; Limericks sizeable, 40s to 42s; and heavy, 38s to 40s per cwt. Lard is dull, but not cheaper. Waterford bladdered, 60s to 63s; Belfast, 60s to 61s; kegs, 52s to 54s; and firkins, 50s to 51s per cwt. All other kinds of provisions are very dull.

Tallow.—Russian is steady. P. Y. C. on the spot at 39s 6d to 39s 9d; and for delivery, 39s 3d to 39s 6d. Town tallow is in good supply, and lower in price. Sales are making at 40s 6d to 41s per cwt net cash.

Potatoes.—From their abundance potatoes have become heavy, yet the quotations still rule from 60s to 80s per ton.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 15s; useful ditto, £4 16s to £5 4s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6. Oat straw, £1 14s to £1 16s; wheat straw, £1 16s to £1 18s per load.

Hops (Friday).—The supply of hops on offer here is, as might be expected, very limited; yet the demand is in a sluggish state, though prices are supported in every instance. Sussex pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £7 8s to £8 4s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s. East Kent, £8 0s to £9 10s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 12s; Mid Kent bags, £7 15s to £8 15s; East Kent ditto, £11 0s to £12 0s.

Coals (Friday).—Braddle's West Hartley, 17s; Chester Main, 16s 6d; East Tanfield, 15s 6d; West Hylam, 17s; Northumberland, 18s; Stewart's, 20s 6d; Lambton, 20s 9d per ton

Smithfield (Friday).—In to-day's market the supply of beasts was, the time of year considered, only moderate, though of fair average quality. Although the trade was somewhat better than on Monday, we can notice no improvement in the quotations. There were on sale 40 beasts and 60 sheep from Rotterdam, together with 100 Scots from Scotland. The numbers of sheep were small, hence the mutton trade was steady, at full prices. Calves were in limited supply, and active request, at the late improved currencies. The pork trade was firm, at previous rates. Milch cows sold heavily, at from £16 to £19 each.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime large oxen, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 0d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 4s 4d to 5s 0d; prime small ditto, 5s 2d to 5s 8d; large hogs, 3s 4d to 4s 0d; neat small porkers, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; sucking calves, 18s 0d to 32s 0d; and quarter old store pigs, 16s 0d to 20s 0d each. Beasts, 432; cows, 149; sheep, 3100; calves, 160; pigs, 364.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday.)—We had a steady demand for most kind of meat at full prices:—Per 8lbs. by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d; inferior mutton, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d veal, 4s 4d to 5s 6d; small pork, 4s 4d to 4s 6d.

ROBERT HERBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Business, although limited in the English house at the commencement of the week, was sufficient to maintain prices; Consols supporting the trifling advance of the previous Saturday. But on Tuesday the broker for the Court of Chancery effected some heavy sales, on account of capital deposited in the name of the Accountant-General, to await the decision of the Court upon some Railway disputes, which, together with the Queen's Speech, and the change in the Cabinet, depressed Consols to 99⅞ to 100. This feeling was rather strengthened on Wednesday, a further decline taking place, and although a slight rally was made at the close of the week, still considerable depression continues, particularly when the present state of the market is contrasted with its former firmness, and upward tendency. Bank Stock maintains the value quoted last week, closing at 213½ to 215. New Three and-a-Quarter per Cents. have receded to 103⅜; Exchequer Bills are 62 to 64, India Stock, 283½; India Bonds, 77; and Three per Cents. Reduced 100⅜.

The Foreign Market has not been remarkable for activity during the week, although some business has been doing in the low-priced Securities. Peruvian on Monday made a slight advance, quoting 32 to 33; and Columbian, on Tuesday, improved to 14¼ to ⅜. This appears rather unaccountable when so few days have elapsed since Lord Aberdeen's refusal to interfere further on behalf of the bondholders. The present excitement in the Railway Market, and the growing taste for time bargains, is, however, likely to beget a spirit of speculation in such low-priced Securities, upon which a very small rise realized produces a large profit upon the trifling capital embarked. This is the most probable reason for both the rises alluded to, as the position of the bondholders has not improved in any way to justify the advanced quotation. Portuguese is a shade flatter from some extensive sales; but Spanish maintains its price with tolerable firmness. It is said that an attempt to make some arrangement about the Passive Stock is in progress, and certainly it is time that both Active and Passive should be made the subject of some financial arrangement. The closing price for the Actives is 28. Three per-Cents., 40¾; Portuguese is 59. The Market was affected towards the close of the week by the state of the English Securities; and Mexican, which had been tolerably firm, receded to 35⅜ to 36¼, at which price it closes. Dutch Two-and-a half-per-Cents. are 63½; Four per Cent. Certificates, 98⅜. Italian is 101½; and Peruvian has declined 31½.

The Railway Market has been again a scene of extraordinary exitement, and prices generally are firmly maintained. Some slight suspicion is, however, abroad that the knowledge of the lines recommended by the Board of Trade finds its way into the market before the announcement in the Gazette. For instance, the Churnet Valley line made a rapid advance towards the close of business on Friday last, some hours before the Gazette appeared. Rugby's, again, on Tuesday, quoted a considerable rise, and were duly gazetted in the evening. If this be the result of chance, it must at least be admitted the coincidence of rising first, and afterwards being approved of, is not a little remarkable. Cambridge and Lincoln, with London and York, have been in good demand. Rugby's, on the contrary, became flat after the appearance of the approval of the line by the Board of Trade, no doubt from extensive realising. Eastern Counties have declared a dividend at the rate of £2 14s. per annum, but the price of the shares has not advanced. Blackwalls have been in demand, advancing to 8¼. The market, upon the whole, does not close so briskly as last week. The following are the last prices:—Bristol and Exeter, 78½; Bristol and Gloucester, 52½; Cambridge and Lincoln, 4; Churnet Valley, 8¾; Direct Northern, 2¼; Dublin and Galway, 2⅜; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 64½; Great Western, 178; London and Blackwall, 7⅞ to 8⅛; London and Brighton, 56¼; Greenwich, 11⅜; South Western, 79; New ditto, 13¼; Croydon, 18⅜; Eastern Counties, 18¾; Glasgow and Dumfries, 25s. 6d.; Birmingham (Stock), 240; Lincoln and Sheffield, 33s. to 35s.; Manchester and Leeds (half shares), 51; Rugby, 4⅜; Shrewsbury, Wolverhampton, &c., 6½; Trent Valley, 12½; Yarmouth and Norwich, 29; Boulogne and Amiens, 5⅜; Great Northern of France, 5⅞; Lyons and Avignon, 2⅝; Orleans and Bordeaux, 7½ (ex. Toulouse); Paris and Rouen, 42⅜; Paris and Strasbourg, 3; Rouen and Havre, 30.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The English funds were rather firmer yesterday, Consols closing at 99⅞. The Foreign Market was very dull, without any material variation. The Dutch Government have issued a notice that the holders of undrawn Five per Cent. Stock, by presenting it before the 26th inst., will be paid off on the 1st of March. The Share Market has been very animated. Brightons have been better upon the result of the meeting, and close at 55¾.

Just Published, Demy 4to., neatly bound in cloth, with Engravings and Diagrams, price 6s.,

THE HAND-BOOK TO THE PIANOFORTE, comprising an easy Rudimental Introduction to the Study of that Instrument and Music in General; the Art of Fingering, according to the Modes of the best Masters, exemplified in various Exercises, Scales, &c., in all the Major and Minor Keys; and interspersed by Relaxations from Study, consisting of Popular Melodies and Romances, and Selections from Pianoforte Compositions of some of the most celebrated Masters. Also, a Short and Easy Introduction to Harmony or Counterpoint, and a New Vocabulary of Terms. By J. AUGUSTINE WADE, Author of "The Dwellings of Fancy," "Songs of the Flowers," "The Two Houses of Grenada," an Opera; "The Prophecy," an Oratorio, &c. &c.

"From the first 'example' to the last 'exercise' everything is brought before the learner in the clearest manner, and the means of conquering each new difficulty as it arises literally placed at his fingers' ends. Indeed, after carefully digesting some sixty pages, and mastering the 'digital' and other exercises here given, he need not fear the thickest army of semi-demi-semis, or the most whimsically-noted passage of the most gifted manipulator of the key-board. The work comprises, in addition, a brief and excellent treatise on the elements of harmony, developing the laws of composition in a simple and sound manner; and we altogether warmly recommend the book to public favour." Literary Gazette, October 19.

"The book now before us is the most admirable instance we have ever met with of a man acknowledged as a poet and composer condescending to construct a threshold to harmony. Mr. Wade has written the best first-book we ever read."—Sunday Times.

"This is one of the best works of musical instruction which has been brought under our notice; the author unites an earnest love of music with sound knowledge of the art, and has, therefore, given a life and animation to his lessons, which relieve the dry and technical details of teaching."—The League, October 12.

"An ingenious and tasteful work, comprehending a large amount of information in a comparatively small space. The volume seems to us calculated to be very useful; and it is certainly ORNAMENTAL also, being handsomely printed and bound, and embellished with a striking portrait of the celebrated pianist, Franz Liszt."—Watchman, October 9.

"We regard it, on the whole, as very able and useful, and recommend it to the attention of students of the Pianoforte."—John Bull, October 19.

THE BEST ALMANACK FOR 1845.
Now Publishing, 64 pages, handsome quarto, gilt edges (no Advertisements), with EIGHTY ENGRAVINGS!
Price One Shilling, the

ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK, and PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1845.

It contains a greater variety of Information and seasonable entertainment than is to be found in any other Almanack. The Wrapper is beautifully printed in colours; and the artistical execution of the entire Almanack entitles it to a place upon every drawing-room table in the empire.

The Press is universal in praise of this beautiful Almanack.

EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.

"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the Calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post Nov. 20.

"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries; and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 15

"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets, as they will be visible in the ensuing year are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.

"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 17.

"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical observations, and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this 'Illustrated Almanack' is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy. Era, Nov. 24.

"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the foolish almanacks of times that are passing away—and, we may add, one of the most successful. It is filled with illustrations, some of which, representing the signs of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardener's Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper"—Gardeners' Chronicle.

"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. The illustrations are very beautiful. Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy, and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

Sold by all respectable druggists, in 1s. and 2s. packets, also in tin cases, 7s. 6d. each; and as a caution against fraudulent imitations, please to observe none are genuine unless signed "Jas. Hards," and manufactured at the Royal Victoria Mill, Dartford, Kent.

CLOSE OF HOLIDAYS.—Now that the season of annual festivity is about to terminate, and the respective boarding-schools be re-instated by the busy throng of youthful aspirants, the personal comfort and attractions of whom become naturally an object with friends and relatives of great solicitude, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for accelerating the growth, and for preserving and beautifying the Hair; ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for preserving the Skin and Complexion, and removing Cutaneous Eruptions; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, for beautifying the Teeth, and preserving the Gums, are universally considered indispensable in the requisite accompaniments of the decorative repository. The august patronage conceded by all the Sovereigns of Europe to these creative renovating specifics, and confirmation, by experience, of their infallible efficacy, have characterized them with perfection, and given them a celebrity unparalleled.

CAUTION.—Beware of SPURIOUS IMITATIONS under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty). See that the word "ROWLAND'S" is on the Wrapper of each article. For the protection of the public from fraud and imposition, the Hon. Commissioners of Stamps have directed the Proprietors' Signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus—"A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden;" which is affixed on the KALYDOR and ODONTO. Sold by the Proprietors, and by Chemists and Perfumers.—. All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

PARR'S LIFE PILLS.—The extraordinary success of this medicine is the wonder of the age; it has been tried by hundreds of thousands as an aperient, and has in every instance done good; it has never in the slightest degree impaired the most delicate constitution. Tens of thousands have testified that perseverance in the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS will completely cure any disease, and are living witnesses of the benefit received from this invaluable medicine.—Sheets of testimonials and the "Life and Times of Old Parr," may be had, gratis, of every respectable Medicine Vendor throughout the Kingdom.

Beware of spurious imitations of the above medicine. None are genuine unless the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS" are in WHITE LETTERS ON A RED GROUND, engraved on the Government Stamp, pasted round each box; also the fac-simile of the signature of the Proprietors, "T. ROBERTS and Co." London, on the directions.

Sold in boxes at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and family packets at 11s., by Edwards, 67, St. Paul's; Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard, London; Mottershead and Co., Manchester; and J. and R. Raimes and Co., Edinburgh; Mitchell, Glasgow; and by all respectable Druggists and Patent Medicine Retailers throughout the Kingdom.—Directions are given with each box.

SELF-MEASUREMENT — GREAT ACCOMMODATION.

No longer let those who are dwellers afar,
Themselves from the Warehouse or MOSES debar.
By adopting our plan, which has never a failure,
Every gentleman now may become his own tailor.

E. MOSES and SON are desirous of directing especial attention to their plan of "Self-Measurement." The extreme simplicity, and the minute exactness, of this admirable plan, are such as cannot fail to answer the purpose designed. No failure in point of fit can arise from its use; or, should anything of the kind occur, the proprietors will hold themselves responsible. Thousands are thus enabled to avail themselves of the choice Clothing of MOSES and SON, without any inconvenience arising from distance, &c. A book, with a wood cut and full directions, may be obtained on application (gratis), and free of postage. Residents in the country cannot do better than avail themselves of so favourable an opportunity of purchasing at the greatest Tailoring Establishment in the Kingdom.

A new work, entitled "The Commercial Phenomenon," with full directions for Self-Measurement, on application, will be forwarded, post-free.

RUINS OF GREYFRIARS CHURCH, EDINBURGH.

were—actually refused to live in it: thus setting an example to future Churchmen, which it appears from modern church history has not been very generally followed. The house was surrounded by an extensive garden, which, in 1561, was converted into a cemetery: thus, the history of the Church commences where most other histories end—in the graveyard.

From the time the Greyfriars' garden was devoted to the dead, it was gradually filled with illustrious names; hence a clever antiquarian writer, with more patriotism than vraisemblance, has designated the Greyfriars' Church the Westminster Abbey of Scotland. One of the earliest burials was that of George Buchanan, the scholar; George Heriot, father of the famous Goldsmith, was, in 1610, also interred here, in a handsome tomb; the more celebrated son having been buried in London. Twelve years after the elder Heriot was carried to his last home, the history of the church itself commences, for in 1622 it was completed. This, it will be remembered, was the period when Episcopacy was in the ascendant, and James VI. of Scotland, and I. of England, was acknowledged as "the onlie supreme Governor of this realme, as weel in all spirituall or ecclesiasticall things or causes, as temporall." This doctrine, so hateful to the general body of Presbyterians, constantly met with opposition to the extent of tumult; and we learn from the historian Baillie, that on a certain Sunday morning, "when the Bishop of Argyle, in the Greyfriars, began to officiate, incontinent the serving maids began such a tumult as was never heard of in our nation since the Reformation." Nor was the rebellion of kitchen maids a mere passing ebullition; the feeling grew so strong against prelacy, that the year after the Government were fain to make a compromise, by executing the solemn "league and covenant." This was done in the Greyfriars' Church, of which Alexander Henderson, the leader of the spiritual or Presbyterian party, was already minister, &c.

It is a singular fact that the church was burnt down on the eve of the two-hundred and sixth anniversary of Henderson's induction. He died in 1646, and his tomb stands near the gate which leads to Heriot's Hospital.

"As the hour drew near," says Hetherington, in his graphic narrative, "the people from all quarters flocked to the spot, and before the Commissioner appeared, the church and church-yard were densely filled with the gravest, the wisest, and the best of Scotland's pious sons and daughters." After a prayer from Henderson, "Johnston of Warriston unrolled the vast sheet of parchment, and in a clear and steady voice, read the Covenant aloud. He finished and stood silent. A solemn stillness followed, deep, unbroken, sacred. Men felt the near presence of that dread Majesty to whom they were about to vow allegiance, and bowed their souls before Him in the breathless awe of silent adoration. * * Again a deep and solemn pause ensued; not the pause of irresolution, but of modest diffidence, each thinking every other more worthy than himself to place the first name upon this sacred bond. An aged nobleman, the venerable Earl of Sutherland, at last stepped slowly and reverentially forward, and, with throbbing heart and trembling hand, subscribed Scotland's covenant with God. All hesitation in a moment disappeared. Name followed name in swift succession, till all within the church had given their signatures. It was then removed into the church-yard, and spread out on a level grave-stone, to obtain the subscriptions of the assembled multitude. Here the scene became, if possible, still more impressive. The intense emotions of many became irrepressible. Some wept aloud,—some burst into a shout of exultation,—some, after their names, added the words, till death,—and some, opening a vein, subscribed with their own blood. As the space became filled, they wrote their names in a contracted form, limiting them at last to the initials, till not a spot remained on which another letter could be subscribed."

The later memorabilia of this edifice may be shortly summed up. The citizens of Edinburgh seem always to have been pressed for room; they packed two or three congregations under one roof; they built their dwelling-houses one story above another to a height which makes a stranger giddy to behold; and finally, perceiving there was a profitless waste of room in the steeple of the Greyfriars Church, they converted it into a magazine for gunpowder! Accordingly (for it was almost a natural consequence), on the 7th of May, 1718, an explosion took place, and the steeple was destroyed. Instead of restoring so comparatively useless an appendage, "the expense whereof," says the quaint Maitland, "was estimated at the sum of £600 sterling," the town council decided on building a new church at the western end, which it was judged convenient to shorten by erecting a partition wall at the second pillar, so that both churches should be of an equal length. Thus a new place of worship was erected for little more than the cost of a new steeple. This excellent specimen of economical "church extension" was completed in 1721. In this state the church remained until its destruction by fire on Sunday the 19th of last month.

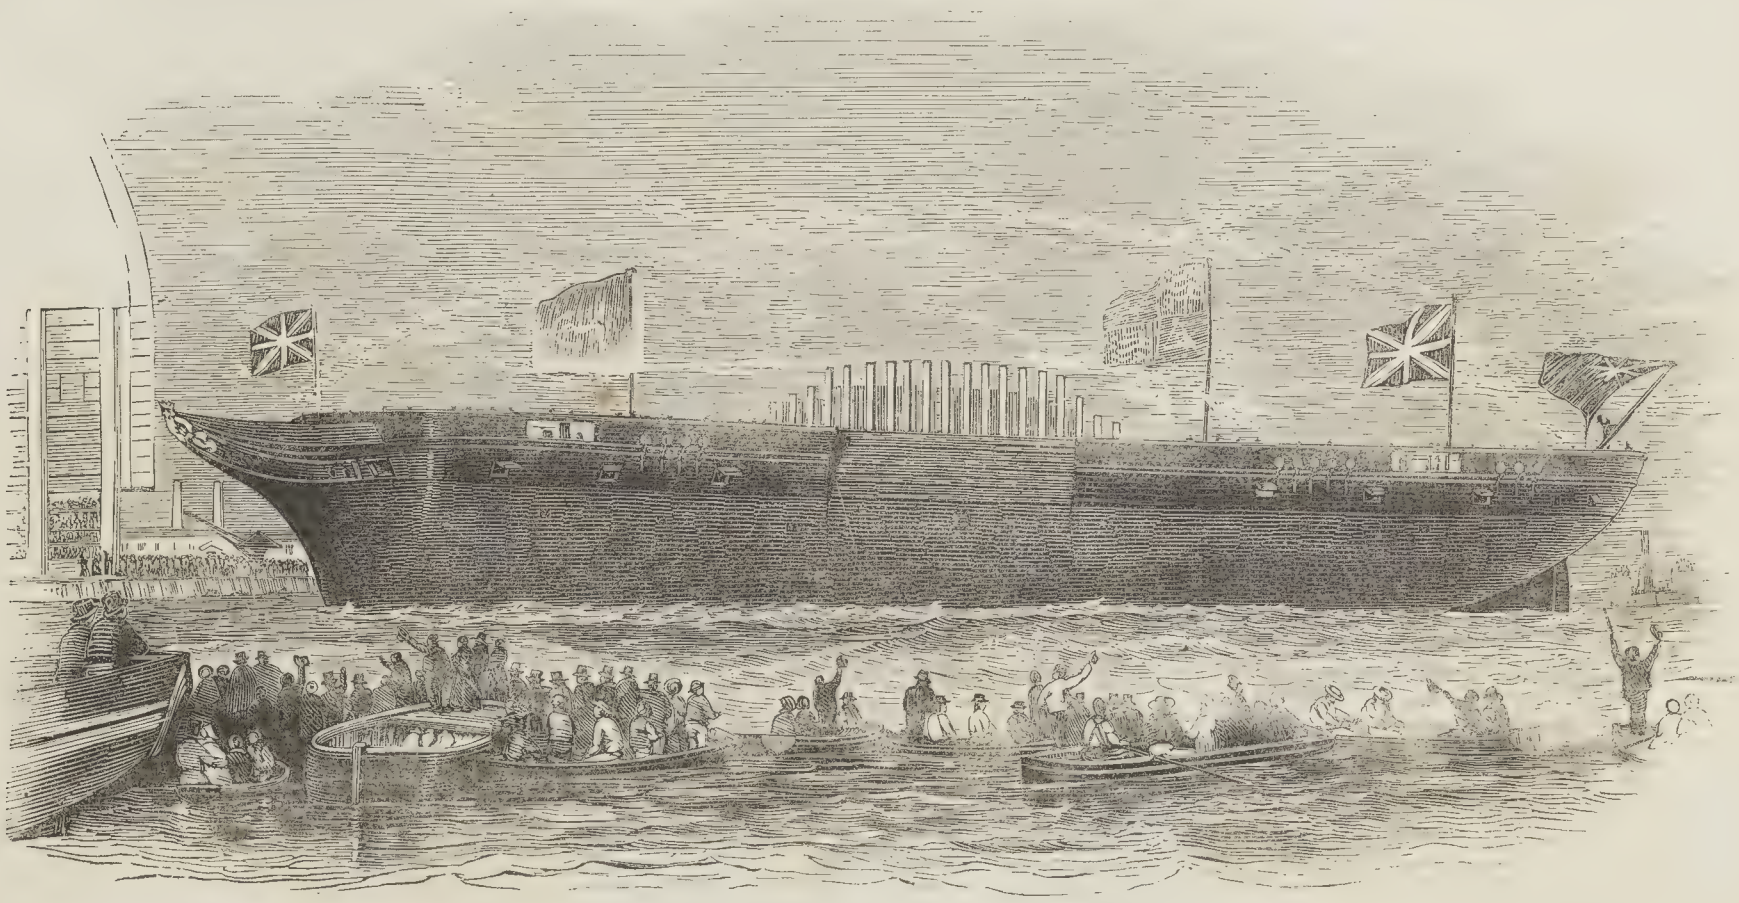
Let us now return for a moment to the church-yard, which is without exception one of the most interesting we ever inspected. It is filled with monuments, some of them interesting from the illustrious ashes they contain, and others for the beauty and elegance of their architecture, or for the quaintness of their sculptures and inscriptions. Amongst the former class we may enumerate the remains of Allan Ramsay the poet, Adam the architect, to whom and his brothers the British metropolis owes that splendid range of buildings, the Adelphi; Robertson the historian; Hugh Blair the author of sermons. It also contains the family-vault of Archbishop Sharpe, who was murdered by Hackman, but who was himself interred at the seat of his primacy, St. Andrew's; besides the vaults of many of the first families in Scotland, where the most interesting monument is that called the "martyrs," raised to several men who fell victims to religious persecution in the 17th century. Of the remains of more modern celebrities those of Henry Siddons (whose tomb has been recently opened to receive the remains of his wife) must not be forgotten.

We present two drawings of monuments. The first (No. 1) is that erected to "Mary Mac Math, by her loving husband, Francis Kinloch," who was Lord Provost of Edinburgh in 1674. The other contains a handsome effigy of—according to the inscription—"that most learned man, Mr. John Bayne, of Pitcarley, in Fifeshire, a famous Writer to the Signet, who died on the 18th of January, 1681, aged 60 years." His fame must have been purely local, for we never met with his name except on his handsome tomb. In his hand is a sort of bottle, which may be an ink-horn. Though this be one of the most striking monuments in the ground, it is hidden behind a thick wall.

The recent unhappy disruption in the Scottish Church has so thinned the congregations of the establishment, that no difficulty was found in providing for the spiritual wants of the worshippers of the Old and New Greyfriars, in neighbouring churches. It is indeed a question whether they will be rebuilt. They were, it appears, insured by the city authorities to the extent of £4000.

When entire, they formed a mass of masonry far from ornamental to the city, though, in their present state, they make a very pretty ruin. The New Church is much more seriously damaged than was first imagined. It is not a little remarkable that only one thing wholly escaped the flames, and that was—strange to say—a heap of coals!

LAUNCH OF THE TERRIBLE,



On Thursday afternoon, at a quarter to two o'clock, this mighty ship was launched from her Majesty's dock-yard at Deptford, and glided as cheerfully into its destined element as a duckling from its shell. Hundreds of people were in the monster, and thousands around on land and shore saluted her majestic descent into the "unstartled water:" for never did sea-bird dip its breast within a summer wave with more elegance and quiet, than did this graceful "leviathan of the deep." She, we understand, is constructed upon a model of Mr. Oliver Lang's (master-shipwright at Woolwich), and is said to be so compactly built, that she could swim by her ribs alone, if they had not their external coating. The Royal Albert, now building at Woolwich, is constructed on a similar plan. The dock-house in which this mighty ship was built, was fitted up with various galleries and platforms, from which a capital view was afforded to admiring crowds. In the awful interval of suspense, we could not forbear perpetrating the following:—

Oh! thou dread Engine of destructive war,
Arm'd as thou art
To deal awide and far
The horrors of man's hate
To many a distant, unoffending part
Of this great globe—oh! let thy mission be Where'er thy wings may flee
A cause to bless, not desolate!
Be thou a halcyon bird of ocean
Floating on the gentle motion
Of the calmest wave or billow
That ever did a mermaid pillow!
Doom'd where'er thy course may rove
To be the Messenger of Peace and Love!

Scarcely had we concluded our rhapsody, when Old Father Thames received one of the gentlest birds that ever floated on his breast. Why call her Terrible? Gentle would be more appropriate. It is true she was not armed—her engines were not aboard. The dimensions of the Terrible are as follow:—

Length from figure-head (which, by-the by, is a very ugly thing) to taff-rail, 246 feet; length of the keel for tonnage, 196½ feet; extreme breadth, 42½ feet; depth of hold, 27½ feet; burden of tons, 1848.

The day was very fine, and perhaps a more beautiful or graceful launch was never seen. The Terrible, instead of a Fury, bathed herself like a Nymph, and seemed to be delighted with her new element.

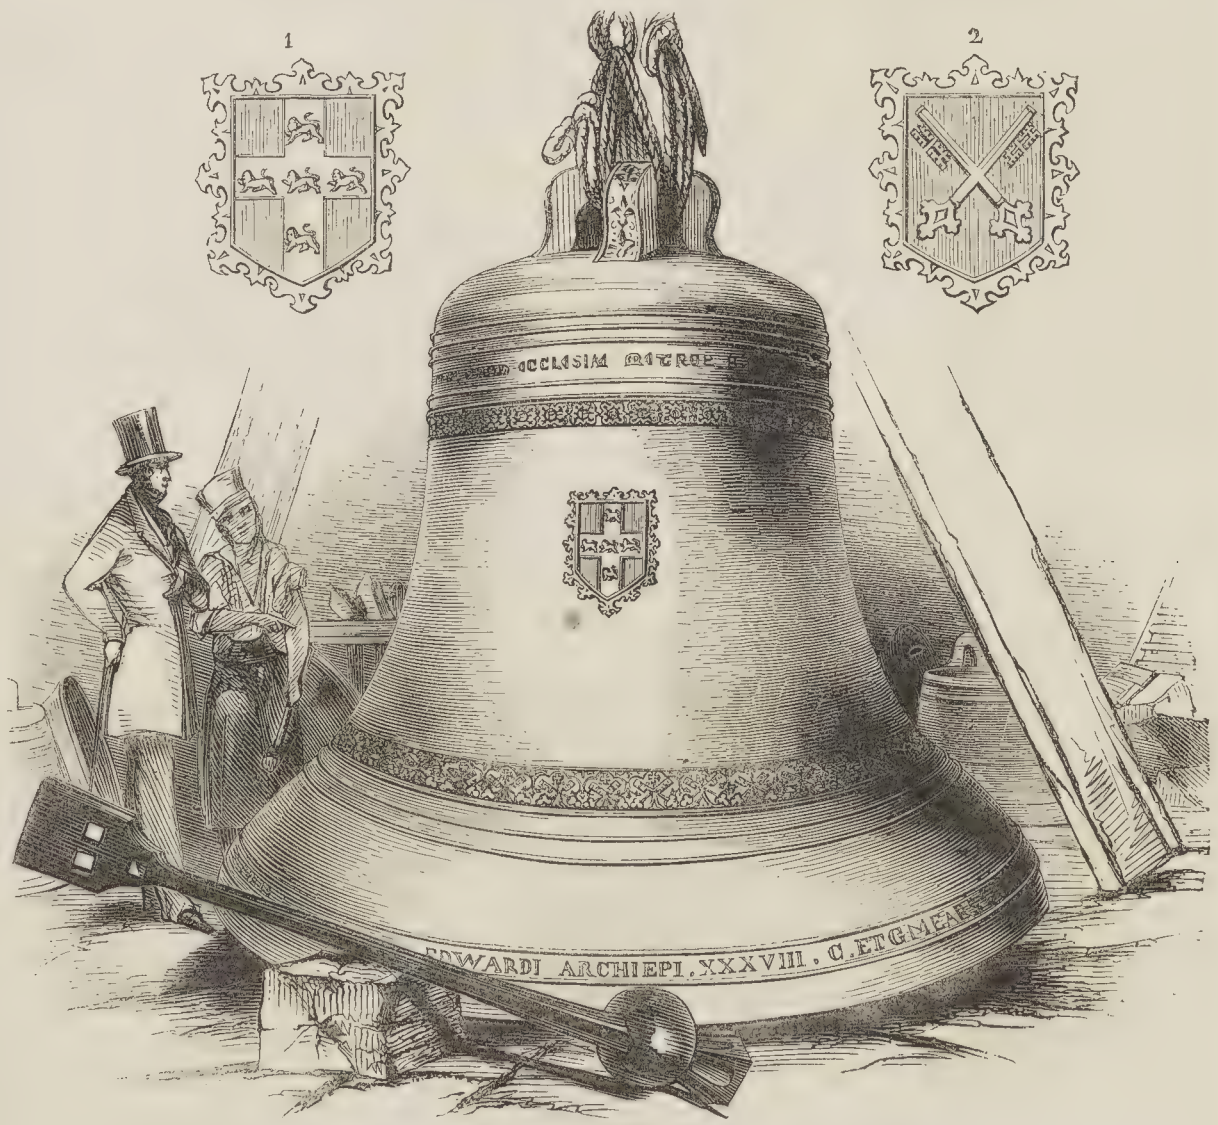
THE INCOME TAX.

AS SIR Robert Peel is by no means one of those who "wear their hearts upon their sleeve," but up to the last moment keeps his intentions pretty well to himself, the period preceding the "financial statement" of this year, has been one of unusual speculation. Every interest that had a peculiar burden to complain of or a special impost to endure, (as which of them has not?) has been calling by no means inaudibly, on the Minister for relief. The landed interest has many grievances, but as one must be selected from the rest, it has taken the malt tax and urges the policy of its repeal. The manufacturers come forward with complaints of the duties on raw cotton and other materials, small in amount, but in the keen competition of nations in the race of commerce, adding the feather weight to their burdens which keeps them—not behind, perhaps—but something less in advance. Then are heard the allegations of all the branches of manufactures subjected to the excise, which Dr. Johnson long ago described as "a hateful tax," and time has not lessened the causes of the Doctor's aversion, but rather increased them. The Soap manufacturers have met, under the sanction implied by the presence of many Members of Parliament, including an ex-Minister among them, and shown forcibly enough that the duties are in their effects on the article itself, mischievous, increasing cost, deteriorating quality, and preventing improvement; that with respect to the people they amount to a tax on one, at least, of the virtues—that of cleanliness. The Glass and Paper makers have nearly as much cogency of fact and argument on their side, when they advance the same claim to relief; the exciseman's supervision confines every step of the necessary processes to the old path, and with its hands tied by Acts of Parliament and Board orders, modern enterprise cannot freely employ modern science, skill, or discovery, though ever so much disposed to do so. An improvement in any branch would be a private gain and a public benefit; but the Excise makes it a crime, and at best it has to be driven to consent to it by much trouble and loss of time. Then there are all the different importing interests—the Tea trade, the Sugar interest, the Timber interest, all have some claim of modification or remission of a tax or taxes to prefer, and they do it loudly enough. The cries that surround the Premier are much like the many voices, and all of woe, that greeted Dante, as he crossed the threshold of his Inferno.

Diversi lingue, orribili favelle,
Parole di dolore, accenti d' ira.



All this the Minister hears, indeed, but hearing heeds not; his position has accustomed him to such sounds, and it is not his duty to select one class in preference to another, but to do that which shall be, or at least appear to be, the best for all. And in fact if he would select, where could he begin? It is true that the revenue of the country at the present moment exceeds its expenditure, but not to so great an amount, nor raised by such a means as would justify the large sacrifice which the remission of any one of these duties and imposts would occasion. It must be recollected that the whole of our present surplus springs exclusively from the Income Tax. Without it the deficiency of the revenue, as compared with expenditure, is very little less than under the unpropitious financial régime of the Whigs. The prosperity does not arise from the natural overflowing of the stream of national wealth but from the quantity that has been drawn from the reservoir. The indirect taxation levied on imports and articles of consumption has not risen to the level of the public expenditure. There is still a deficiency which has to be made up by a direct drain on the wealth of the people by means of individual contributions.

Under such circumstances, any great reduction of taxes is not to be expected; a modification of some of the import duties, especially those where it will be perfectly safe—the unproductive ones—may be granted. But a continuance of the Income-tax for another limited period will be the condition of the boon. Abolish more, and the Income-tax will be made perpetual.

As yet this is not the case; that it should be renewed for another fixed term surprises no one, for everybody expected it, and the act of the Queen's Minister is but a carrying out of the intimation conveyed in the words of the Queen's Speech. The necessity for it has not ceased, and its success as a means of raising money is at once a great temptation to renew it, and a difficulty in the way of giving it up. It has succeeded but too perfectly, and we fear it will be long ere our Government will learn how to do without it.

But at the present juncture the people can insist on one thing which they have every right to demand, and that is, that a proper distinction be made between real property and the casual, uncertain, and fluctuating possession which is income only, and cannot be sold, transferred, or bequeathed. The most objectionable thing in the principle of Sir Robert Peel's measure, is the placing both on the same level, and forcing them each to contribute in the same proportion. To a Property-tax there can be but few objections; all the laws and the machinery of the State are kept up for its protection, and that it should pay towards the expences of the Government in proportion to the benefit it derives from it, is only just. A tax on property has been called a war tax—for what reason, except that in England it was first imposed in a time of war, we can hardly see; its justice would seem to recommend it at any time. It is easily collected, and produces a larger amount in proportion to the expence of levying it than any other tax whatever. But the tax on Income is different in almost every point. It requires endless trouble and vexatious inquiries, and causes an enormous amount of falsehood and evasion, both among those who do pay it and those who do not. Giving far more vexation, it brings in a much less amount than the property-tax. It places on the same footing the poor clerk or professional man struggling along on a small and barely sufficient income, and the more fortunate individual with property to the amount of thousands in land or the funds. One may be made a beggar by the stroke of disease or calamity; the other, with the exertion of common prudence, is safe. One toils and wastes his life itself in his struggle for an income; the other sits still, and has it poured into his lap. One can sell his property, or leave it to his children after him; the other has not even a life interest in what he earns; and if he is obliged to live up to his income, can lay by nothing, while at his death, all ceases with him. Among tradesmen, clerks, and the lower ranks of the professions, how many and many a tale of woe has not, on the death of the head of a family, far too painfully proved how great is the difference between property and income? Why, then, tax them the same—why make the weak and the strong carry an equal burden? It may be easily borne by the one, but it helps to crush the other to the earth.

Now is the time for action, and if the people exert themselves with anything like the spirit they show on occasions when there is far less at stake, they may procure a modification of the tax that will be something more equitable. Powerful as Sir Robert Peel is, a proposition made by him is but a plan to be confirmed or rejected by the House of Commons, and not the decree of a despot, to be received at once with a submisive "to hear is to obey." There is far too little independence in the Legislature, and too great a disposition to receive without dispute or examination what the Minister proposes. But this apathy may be quickened from without; this Parliament is verging to its natural dissolution, and there is no very distant prospect of having to meet the whole constituent body on the hustings. Here is the lever the people have in their hands, of power enough to move whole mountains of indifference, if it be properly applied. Now is the moment; what is proposed is not settled; a scheme propounded is not a statute enacted; let the people protest against so much of it as they think unjust, and they may save themselves the infliction; let them be passive or indifferent, and they must abide the consequences. They may grumble, but they will, at the same time, have to pay.

THE MONSTER BELL FOR YORK MINSTER.

THE MONSTER BELL FOR YORK MINSTER.

This bell, recently cast by Messrs. Mears, of Whitechapel, may be justly termed the King of Bells in England, exceeding as it does in weight, Tom of Oxford, by seven, and Tom of Lincoln, by five, tons.

The inhabitants of York and Yorkshire being desirous of urnishing the noble Minster with a bell equal in size and magnificence of tone to some of the continental bells; and being stimulated in that good spirit by the munificent bequest of the late Dr. Beckwith of the peal of twelve bells, recently cast, have subscribed the sum necessary for this great Bourdon. The Dean and Chapter have also, at an outlay of £2000 and upwards, restored and strengthened the south western tower for its reception at the Minster.

The height of the bell is eight feet, its diameter is eight feet four inches, and the thickness at the sounding bow is seven inches. The ornaments are suitable, and of a character and style similar to the details of the principal parts of the cathedral. The arms of the cathedral and city are on each side of the bell. It is intended to be swung with two wheels, one on each side of the axle; and its tone, when swinging, will be excessively grand and powerful. The foundry at which this bell has been produced has been the birthplace of the great bell of Montreal, Tom of Lincoln, and St. Paul's bell.

It is intended by the committee to exhibit the "Great Peter," as it is called, in London; and arrangements are making for the purpose, which will be duly notified to the public. The proceeds from such an exhibition are to be devoted to the purchase of a clock and quarter bells, to be placed in the same tower with the large bell.

The following additional details may be interesting:—The metal took 12 days to cool, from the 18th of January, when it was poured into the mould, to the 30th ult. The clapper is not yet put in, but this will weigh between three and four cwt.

The inscription is in Lombardic characters, as follows—Round the top:—

"In sanctæ et æternæ Trinitatis honorem
Pecunia sponte collata, Eboracenses
Faciendum curaverunt in usum
Ecclesiæ metrop. B. Petri, Ebor."

Round the rim:—

"Anno Salutis MDCCCXLV. Victoriæ, Regina VIII.
Edwardi Archiepi XXXVIII.
C. et G. Mears, Londini, Fecerunt."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Secret Service Money Bill, upon which another trial of the strength of the Guizot Cabinet will take place, was presented to the Chamber of Deputies on Monday by M. Duchatel, the Minister of the Interior.

The Débats and other Ministerial papers speak in a confident tone of the support of the bill by a large majority.

It is stated by the Paris papers that the Duke de Broglie will shortly repair to London to confer with Dr. Lushington upon the subject of the right of search. The Constitutionnel says:—"We have been assured that the question of the right of search will not be the only one examined by the plenipotentiaries, and that two other questions will occupy much more their attention, namely, the emancipation of the slaves in the French colonies, and the annexation of Texas."

The quantity of snow which fell in Paris on Monday, rendered it extremely difficult for carriages to proceed through the streets. A number of blacksmiths were to be seen during the day offering their services to prepare the shoes of the horses, which found it impossible to avoid falling in consequence of the frozen snow.

The French Government continue to display vigour in pursuit of the hordes of miscreants, murderers, and thieves, with which Paris is notoriously overrun. On Saturday last a considerable military force, placed under the direction of three commissaries of police, surrounded two public establishments on the Boulevard du Temple—the Café du Puy-de Dôme, and the Caveau—the haunts of malefactors and receivers of stolen goods. Upwards of 200 individuals were arrested, and marched to the Prefecture of Police, in bands of twenty and thirty at a time.

In the Chamber of Peers on Monday, Count Daru gave notice of a proposition to repress the unlimited speculation which has for some length of time been carried on in railroad shars. It is intended that henceforward no subscription shall be opened for the construction of any railroad which has not been authorised by the Chambers. The minimum of the first deposit must amount to one-fifth of the price of each share, and any violation of this regulation to be punished by the application of the 419th article of the Penal Code.

The Chamber of Deputies have rejected M. St. Priest's proposition for a uniform rate of postage in France from the 1st January, 1846.

SPAIN.

It appears, by our accounts from Madrid, that the fever of Railway speculation has reached even to Spain. The Spanish Government has granted a concession of a line from Madrid to Cadiz to M. Emile Gandron, the representative of a French company. Branch lines to Toledo and Jerez are included in the grant, which is for 99 years. The capital necessary for this undertaking will be 480,000,000 reals, of which the Belgian Bank has taken one-third. The works will commence in about two months, and the line is to be completed in eighteen months. Mr. Kelly, on behalf of an English company, has obtained the approbation of her Majesty for a line from Madrid to Aranjuez, and has left for London to complete his arrangements.

Madrid has been thrown into a state of excitement, by the detection of a member of the Chamber of Deputies in the act of stealing plate at General Narvaez's ball. The Chamber has, by a majority of 105 to 18, voted the expulsion of M. Quintanella, the member for Seville, the person in question.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.—The LORD CHANCELLOR read her Majesty's answer to the address, which was as follows:—"This renewed assurance of your loyalty and devoted attachment is received by me with sincere satisfaction. I derive confidence from your cordial support in my endeavours to promote the happiness and contentment of my subjects."

FINANCIAL STATE OF THE COUNTRY.—Lord MONTEAGLE, in moving for some financial returns, alluded to that portion of the Queen's speech relating to the subject, and gave his opinion that it would be adviseble to continue the Income-tax temporarily. Had it not been for that measure, there would, he said, be a deficiency in the revenue. The surplus, which was entirely created by the Property-tax, exceeded three millions. But it was only a temporary tax, and the result, consequently, was, that so far from there being any excess or surplus of revenue over the permanent taxation of the country, there was, in fact, an actual deficiency, for the Property-tax produced five millions, and the deficiency previous to its imposition having been two millions, if the tax was repealed the original deficiency would still exist. Then, with regard to the circumstance of the tax as a means of relief to other taxation, that question involved the consideration of the permanent continuation of the tax, for unless the taxes to be repealed were so badly selected as to lead, and at no remote period, to an increased revenue, the deficiency would still continue.—The Duke of WELLINGTON did not object to the returns, which were ordered.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The house sat for a short time only, and the business was unimportant.

In answer to a question from Mr. HUME, Mr. B. BARING declined, on the part of the Government, to produce the correspondence between the Board of Control and the Board of Directors of the East India Company, relative to Lord Ellenborough's recal.

THE STATE OF THE CHURCH.—Lord EBRINGTON presented a petition from the Rev. Dr. Carwithen, Rector of Stoke Climsland, in the diocese of Exeter, complaining of the confusion into which that diocese had been thrown by recent pastoral letters from the Bishop. Petitioner stated that he felt himself bound by his ordination oath and the canon law not to commit the slightest deviation from the rubric, and that, if he did so deviate, he was liable to prosecution on the information of any layman. He prayed that the house might procure a calm and temperate review of the Book of Common Prayer, Rubrics, and Canons of the Church of England.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

THE BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—The Marquis of NORMANBY deprecated the system which had prevailed of introducing important measures to the House of Lords late in the session, and expressed a hope that some new arrangement would be made. The noble marquis asked in which house the most important bills would originate.—The Duke of WELLINGTON said that most of the measures referred to were such as could only originate in the House of Commons, but promised that the Government should bring forward in their Lordships' house such bills as could originate there at as early a period of the session as possible. The noble duke then said that no persons were more desirous than her Majesty's servants were that the inconvenience referred to should be remedied. A regular mode of proceeding in reference to the introduction and progress of bills in Parliament was a matter of absolute necessity.—Adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE RAILWAY ACT.—Mr. WALLACE moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the Railway Act of last session. Mr. Wallace condemned the proceedings of the Railway Committee of the Board of Trade. He said that no less than two hundred and forty-eight railway companies had given notice of their intention to come before Parliament, and the decisions of the committee, so far as they were made known, had, he said, gone in a direction contrary to the interests of the public. They were not sanctioning new lines of railway, but condemning them, thus depriving the public of all advantages they might derive from competition. Though he could not speak to the reasons, the fact was that they were discouraging competition, and thus depriving the people of this country of a free trade in railway conveyance, without which they must virtually become the slaves of the whole of the railway directors of Great Britain and Ireland.—Lord HOWICK could not go the length of voting for the repeal of the bill of last year, but he agreed that the subject was one of the greatest importance, and that every means within the power of the Legislature should be taken to secure to the public cheapness and facility of railway transit. Lord Howick entered into the subject at considerable length, and alluded to the feverish speculations which had been lately carried on in railway shares. He had been credibly informed that gambling in shares was at present going on, not in London alone, but in Liverpool, Manchester, and other places, to an extent that was absolutely frightful and demoralising to the country. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord insisted that regulations ought to be adopted in order to lower railway fares. It was clear, from the premiums now offered for shares, that the different companies could afford to execute their lines of railway, and to convey the public at cheaper rates. What was the fact? Suppose that a bill passed for the construction of a direct line of railway from London to York. The construction of that line would cost from five to six millions sterling. But the shares they knew had already risen in value from forty to fifty per cent. It was plain, therefore, that persons were to be found in this country who were willing to pay seven millions and a half for that which only cost in actual outlay five or six millions. Of course they calculated that, though the cost of the railway was only five millions, they would, from the rates of charges which they contemplated enforcing, derive such a profit as would reimburse them for the outlay of seven millions-and-a-half, (hear, hear)—and of course it followed that they could afford a very large reduction of their fares if their profits were to be calculated upon the capital actually invested in the execution of the work. He was, therefore, clearly of opinion that they ought not to defer railway legislation—that whatever difficulties there might be in the way, however overwhelming they might be, still they must go on. Lord Howick suggested that Government should undertake a new survey of all the rail ways now projected, and which had already been surveyed by the Board of Trade.—Sir R. PEEL protested against any precipitate condemnation of the Rail way Board, which had been created under the sanction of the house, and which some gentlemen wanted neverheless to abolish before it had made its first report to Parliament. That Board had been censured for publishing its decisions in the Gazette. So far from thinking their conduct in that respect censurable, he thought that after they had come to a decision they were bound to publish it. In the course of two or three days the report of the Board of Trade on the first class of railways would be published. That would enable the house to judge of the principles upon which they acted; and surely it would be advisable for hon. gentlemen to postpone their judgment till they had perused that report. He hoped that the house would not abandon the principles on which it had hitherto proceeded with regard to railway bills until they were convinced that those principles were erroneous. They had been told that 240 railway bills were to be presented to the house in the course of the present session; but he had no doubt that discussion would considerably diminish that number. The wisest course would be to appoint a committee to consider the subject, under the assumption that there would be an unusual number of such bills. An hon. friend of his had procured the assent of the house to a committee on private bills, which consisted of persons the most conversant with the conduct of private business. He hoped that committee would not apply itself in the first instance to the consideration of private bills generally, but would proceed to that of railway bills before all others, and would reflect on the manner in which the house should deal with the 150 such bills that were likely to come before it. The report of such committees, if the members would give continuous attendance, would have weight with the house; and, if so, the evil would not be of that magnitude as to induce them to despair of overcoming it. Supposing there were 200 such bills, why should they not sacrifice their time to the consideration of them? If they could not get members to serve spontaneously on such committees, they must adopt the principle adopted in election committees, and compel them to serve in some way or other. Sir R. Peel, in conclusion, objected to Lord Howick's suggestion.—Mr. WAKLEY alluded to a report that Mr. W. O'Brien, the brother of a gentleman who had been secretary to Sir James Graham, and who is a member of the Railway Board, was stated to have made very considerable profits by certain early information which he had procured respecting the report on a branch line connected with the South-Eastern Railway. Statements of that kind ought not to go forth without being investigated.—Sir J. GRAHAM vindicated the conduct of his two relatives, the Messrs. O'Brien. Mr. Gladstone, without any application from him (Sir James Graham), had thought fit to appoint one of them, who had served him (Sir James) faithfully as his private secretary, to a situation in the Board of Trade. Mr. Gladstone had made it a condition with his relative, on giving him that appointment, that any connection which he might have with any railway speculation should be dropped, and that any shares he might possess should be sold forthwith. He (Sir James) was informed that his relative had complied with this condition, and had sold his shares in October last. The name of O'Brien appeared, however, in the list of names appended to one of the schemes now before the house, because an act of Parliament required that the original holder of shares should sign the deed of partnership, although he had transferred his scrip. He (Sir James) had afterwards taken Mr. O'Brien's brother as his private secretary; but, as large emoluments were offered to that gentleman to undertake the management of their line by one of the railway companies, he (Sir James) determined not to stand in the way of his permanent employment on the railway. He contended that, neither directly nor indirectly, had his relative had any communication with the Board of Trade on the subject of their report. Sir James Graham added, in regard to himself, that he had never held a railway share in his life.—Mr. WALLACE ultimately withdrew his motion.

THE LAW OF SETTLEMENT.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM moved for leave to bring in a bill to consolidate and amend the laws relating to parochial settlement and the removal of the poor. This bill had been circulated during the recess, and the alterations he now proposed to make in it were principally the giving up of a birth settlement, acting retrospectively, and also the right of irremovability after a five years' residence. He also proposed to work the most important change of substituting union for parochial settlements, thereby reducing the number of restrictions from 14,500, the number of parishes, to 620, the number of unions.—After a short discussion leave was given to bring in the bill.

The house adjourned at a quarter past twelve.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE.—The Sergeant at Arms appeared at the Bar, and stated that another action had been commenced against him at the suit of Thomas Howard. It was one of trespass, and was grounded on Thomas Howard's detention in his custody by order of the house.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that, from the information he had received, he was disposed to take the same course as that adopted in 1843. He should move that the communication of the Sergeant be printed with the votes, and then give notice of a motion on the subject.

THE PORTLAND VASE.—Mr. CHRISTOPHER said it appeared by the police reports that this valuable work had lately been broken. It would be much to be regretted if there were no possibility of inflicting a greater penalty than a fine of £5 on the person who destroyed this valuable work of art, and if this were the case, there could be no doubt the law was in a most unsatisfactory state. He wished to call the attention of Ministers to this subject, and to ask his right hon. friend whether the matter had received his consideration, and whether it was his intention, by legislative means or otherwise, to take steps for preventing the occurrence of any so great outrage in future?—Sir R. PEEL said that the trustees of the British Museum were to meet on Saturday next for the purpose of considering this very important subject. The result of that meeting would probably be some communication to her Majesty's government of their opinion on the subject.

Sir ROBERT PEEL, in answer to Mr. BOUVERIE, replied that there were no negotiations pending with the Brazils relative to any alteration in its tariff, those at present under discussion having reference only to the usual treaties of navigation and commerce.

Mr. RICARDO and Mr. MILNER GIBSON hoped that the Government would abandon their fruitless policy with respect to differential duties, especially on sugar.

Sir ROBERT PEEL, in reply to Lord JOHN RUSSELL, said he would not press for a decision on the resolution he had to propose on Friday, after making his financial statement; but he trusted that no long delay would take place between the statement of his plans and the decision of the house upon them.

The house having resolved into a Committee of Supply, a formal vote was moved, which elicited some conversation upon financial matters.—Mr. WILLIAMS submitted that, from the present abundant state of the finances of the conntry, a reduction upon the interest of Exchequer Bills from 1½d. to 1¼d. might be made. He would venture to suggest that the Exchequer would benefit much by this reduction in the rate of interest.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, it should not be forgotten that there was a great difference between sums lent for short periods at small rates of interest, and stock, which might be considered as of a more permanent character. Since the honourable gentleman had last spoken on the subject, the premium had varied eight, nine, and ten shillings; and he was not, therefore, to argue that because the premium was now of a very high amount, it necessarily followed that the interest on Exchequer bills could be reduced. The resolution, which was for a vote of £18,404,500 Exchequer Bills having been agreed to, the house adjourned, having sat an hour and a half only.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

THE BOARD OF TRADE AND THE RAILWAYS.—Lord DALHOUSIE brought under the consideration of the house the report of the Railway Department of the Board of Trade relative to the South Western Railway schemes. The noble earl entered into a long defence of the Railway Board, and answered the insinuations made against it, but as his statement was very similar to that made in the House of Commons, it is unnecessary to give it. The noble earl also repeated the declaration given in the House of Commons, that the reports issued by the board were never intended to be of a conclusive character; they were merely intended to be laid before Parliament, and there to be used as it in its wisdom might think fit and proper.

The house rose at an early hour.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

THE PRIVILEGE QUESTION.—On the motion of the SOLICITOR GENERAL, it was agreed "That Sir William Gosset, Kt., the Sergeant at-Arms, attending this house, have leave to appear and defend the action brought against him by Thomas Howard."

STATE OF THE NAVY.—Sir C. NAPIER moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the manner in which the money vested since 1835, for the construction of ships, had been expended, and if the ships constructed are an improvement of the old "system." The gallant member made a searching examination into the state of the naval department, criticised various vessels, and impugned the general system pursued at the Admiralty.—A lengthened debate followed, in which the principal speakers were, Sir G. Cockburn, Mr. C. Wood, Mr. Corry, Captain Pechell, and Mr. Wakley.—The Government opposed the return, and on a division there were 32 votes for the motion, and 93 against it; majority against it, 61.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.—Mr. C. HOPE moved for leave to bring in two bills, one to enable the Commissioners of the Hospital to improve certain property in Greenwich, and the other to enable them to lease certain coal mines and construct a private tram road near Berwick-on-Tweed. The last measure caused some opposition, but leave was finally given to bring in the bills.

RAILWAYS.—In Committee on the Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill, Mr. CORRY moved the insertion of a clause prohibiting the construction of any line of railway along the banks of the sea, without leave of the Lords of the Admiralty. The consideration of the clause was finally postponed till Monday next.

The house adjourned at half-past eleven.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock.

The Marquis of NORMANBY presented a petition in favour of the Health of Towns Commission, and inquired if the Government had any intentions to bring in a measure to ameliorate the present evils, and also to do away with burial clubs.

The Duke of BUCCLEUCH replied that the Government had it under consideration, and would probably propose some measure attaining the advantages proposed by the noble marquis.

After a few words from Lord Campbell, the Marquis of NORMANBY gave notice that he should move, on a future day, for a return of the order appointing the Deputy-Inspector of Ireland, in the room of the late Mayor of Galway.

The house then adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

After the presentation of several petitions, Mr. T. DUNCOMBE gave notice that on Tuesday next he should submit a motion to the house on the subject of the Post-office. He should move for a select committee to inquire into the manner in which the business of the Post-office was conducted, and he should also move that the Report of the Secret Committee of last year be referred to that Committee.

Colonel SIBTHORP gave notice, that after Easter he should take the sense of the house on the subject of the propriety of reducing the duties payable on Fire Insurances.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH TURKEY.—Dr. BOWRING inquired of Sir R. Peel whether any effective measures had been taken to place British subjects of her Majesty, trading to the Levant, on a level with other subjects trading to that part of the world, in accordance with the terms of the commercial treaty concluded between this country and the Ottoman Empire.—Sir R. PEEL expressed his dissatisfaction at the manner in which the treaty had been carried out, and stated that negotiations were pending on the subject.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—The following hon. members were sworn in to serve on Election Committees:—Lord Sandon, The O'Conor Don, Sir George Grey, Lord G. Somerset, Mr. Wilson Patten, and Mr. Locke.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.—Sir R. PEEL moved the order of the day for a Committee of Ways and Means.—On the question that the order of the day be read, Mr. ROEBUCK wished to give notice that he should take the earliest opportunity of asking the right hon. gentleman opposite when he would lay on the table of the house the correspondence between the American Government and our representative there on the subject of the Oregon territory.

THE BUDGET.

The Order of the Day for going into Committee of Ways and Means was then read, and the chair was taken by Mr. Greene.

Sir ROBERT PEEL then rose, and after remarking upon the importance and anxiety attending the subject he was about to discuss, continued:—I will, in the first instance, begin by referring to that estimate of finance and expenditure of the country which was taken by my right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he last brought the subject under the consideration of the house. My right hon. friend, speaking at the latter end of April, 1844, calculated that the revenue for the current year—that is, the year ending the 5th April, 1845—would amount to the sum of £51,790,000, and the expenditure at £48,643,000, leaving an estimated surplus of £3,147,000. That calculation, however, was disturbed on the one hand by an estimated reduction of taxes to the amount of £400,000. I allude to the wool duties and to the duty on glass, which were removed at a subsequent period of the session, but on the other hand credit was taken, or a demand was made, for £400,000, on account of the China expenditure, which vote it is not necessary to refer to, as that will not affect the calculation, because there is a saving on the one hand balancing the reduction on the other. My right hon. friend stated at the same time, that in consequence of the postponement of the payment of £700,000 the surplus would be reduced, and that the real surplus would be £2,373,000. That estimated surplus was, in point of fact, in making the account of the 5th of January last, very considerably exceeded. It will appear by reference to the document of the state of finance and expenditure of the 5th, of January last there was a surplus of £3,357,000. Instead of £51,790,000, the sum calculated upon by my right hon. friend, the amount of net receipts of revenue on the 5th July last, was £54,003,000. The increase of revenue arose chiefly from the increase of receipts from the Customs. Instead of £21,500,000 of Customs revenue, as estimated by my right hon. friend, the actual receipt was, on the 5th of January, £22,500,000. The Excise, which was taken by my right hon. friend, at £13,000,000, produced on that day, £13,308,000. There was some money received under the treaty with China, amounting to £385,000, for which my right hon. friend had not taken credit, but the result was, on the 5th of January last, an income of £54,000,000, instead of the estimated income of £51,795,000. The expenditure on the 5th of January, 1845, had been, on account of Debt and Consolidated Fund, £32,862,000, and on account of the payment then made for the army and navy and other public services, £17,784,000, making a total expenditure of £50,646,000, and leaving a surplus, as it appears on that account, amounting to £3,357,000.—(Hear, hear, and cheers.) At the same time, although that is the actual account, as appears on the 5th January, yet the house will be naturally anxious to have an estimate of the account, as it will probably appear on the 5th of April next. For the period of which I am speaking, I am of course bound, in a matter of this kind, to give an estimate, rather than a positive statement, but certainly I have every reason to apprehend that the balance, comparing the actual receipts of revenue within the year on the 5th of April next, with the expenditure, will amount to a sum of above £5,000,000 for the year. I do not wish, however, to deal to-night with the intricacies of accounts. I wish to state to the house what is our real practical position with respect to finance severed from all questions of annual account; and I think that I am justified in stating that such has been the improvement of the revenue, apart from the property tax, that the surplus which I have stated—viz., a surplus of at least £5,000,000—will be the surplus of the revenue of this year as compared with the last. Of course a portion, and a very considerable portion, of the revenue is derived from the income-tax, which has produced £5,190,000. If it had not been for the receipt of the amounts from various casual sources, and for the receipt on account of the income-tax, the revenue, which in that case would be derived from ordinary permanent sources, would not quite equal the expenditure. The best course which I can now take is, to submit to the house the estimate which has been prepared by my right honourable friend and myself, of the probable receipt of revenue in the next year. I have no right to assume that this house will sanction the continuance of the income-tax; and, therefore, it will be better that I should, in the first place, estimate the revenue, supposing the house should determine not to continue the income-tax. We are disposed to estimate the receipt from the Customs in the year ending the 5th of April, 1846.—I will lay before you the best estimate I can form of the probable receipt up to the 5th of April next year, and I am now going to address myself to the prospects of the coming year—that year which will terminate on the 5th of April, 1846, as I before stated—the receipt from the Customs in this year, on the 5th of April, may be taken at £22,500,000. There has been a very large receipt on account of the duty on the import of foreigd corn; but independently of that, the revenue from the customs has been very large. The experience of past years would induce us not to calculate upon a succession of one produtive year after another. Looking, therefore, to the probability that the corn duties of the next year would not be equal to what they were last year, which was very productive in the Customs' revenue, I am not inclined to take the estimate of the Customs' revenue for the next year at more than £22,000,000; and then the Excise revenue, which was estimated at £13,000,000 for the past year, reached £13,300,000; and, therefore, I feel warranted in estimating that branch of revenue for the next at thirteen millions and a half, because for some time there has been a progressive increase in the Excise revenue; and we find that the Excise revenue always recovers slowly from depression. I therefore feel that I am warranted in estimating the Excise revenue for the year ending the 5th of April, 1846, at £13,500,000. The stamp-duties produced in the last year £7,100,000; and the taxes—that is to say, the land-tax and the assessed taxes—produced £4,200,000. Then, with respect to the Post-office, from the increase in the revenue of that department since last year, and the facilities which have recently been made for the increase of foreign correspondence—I feel warranted in estimating the revenue of the Post-office for the next year at £700,000, for the actual produce of last year was £691,000. (Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.) The Crown lands produced £1,500,000; and I will take them at that estimate. As to the miscellaneous sources of revenue, I am inclined to take them at nearly the same amount which they actually produced during the past year—that is £250,000. Now I have been here speaking of the ordinary permanent sources of revenue, and the net amount of my estimate on these is £47,900,000. Besides, I calculate that during the coming year we shall receive £600,000 on account of China. So that, even if the house should refuse its sanction to the continuance of the income-tax, I think that I should be entitled to take credit for the half-year's produce of that tax—viz., for £2,600,000, which will come into the receipts of the year ending the 5th of April, 1846. Therefore, with this £2,600,000, and £600,000 on the account of China, I am warranted upon calculating a clear revenue of £51,100,000, even if the house should refuse to continue the income-tax. On the 5th of April, 1846, the charge for debt will be, funded and unfunded, £28,458,000; the charge on the Consolidated Fund, £2,400,000, making a total of £30,850,000 on account of the debt. The estimated debt voted last year amounted to £17,700,000; the total charge, therefore, assuming the present system to remain unaltered, would be £48,557,000. Deduct that sum from the total revenue, that is £48,557,000 from £51,150,000, still the surplus on the 5th of April, 1846, will be £2.543,000. If you were to deduct from the revenue of next year the receipt of the income-tax and the casual and temporary receipt from Chinese money, and assume that to be the amount of revenue on the following year, ending the 5th of April, 1847, and taking the expenditure to be the same, in that case there would be a small deficiency of revenue as compared with the preceding year. The question is, whether or not we are justified in a demand for an increased expenditure on account of the public expenditure, and I feel that it is but right to satisfy the house what our intentions are in making this demand. I do not hesitate to admit that no financial prosperity—no surplus revenue—relieves the Government from the paramount obligation of considering whether it is consistent for the public interest, that a saving can be made in the public expenditure. (Hear, hear.) I feel that there is the same stringent obligation upon her Majesty's Government to avoid increased expenditure, when there is a surplus of five millions in the Treasury, as when there is no surplus at all. (Hear, hear.) At the same time, permit me to say that I am greatly afraid that the public are under a very erroneous conception with regard to what was really necessary for the public expenditure, what that public expenditure actually was, and the means by which it could be safely reduced. It is generally supposed that all portions of the public expenditure which does not consist of payments for the continuance of the several public departments, is unnecessary and useless, but such is not the case. If we take the amount of the revenue for the past year, which was £48,243,000, it will be found to consist of the following charges:—£28,450,000 on account of payments toward the public debt. The sum paid to the naval and military half-pay amounted to £4,991,000. The charges fixed on as necessary for the Consolidated Fund were £1,878,000. In these charges I include the provision necessary for defraying the expenditure of the judicial establishment. (Hear.) There are, besides, included in the whole amount of the sum that I have stated, as that which will be required for the public services this year, not only the whole sum levied as public taxation, but various other sums. The sum of £35,309,000, required for the purposes I have already mentioned, if deducted from the £48,000,000, the amount of the total sum required for the public expenditure, will leave a sum of about £13,000,000 for the public service, in respect of which, it is supposed, some reduction may be made. (Hear, hear.) After deducting the amount due to the public creditor, what then remains to be disposed of to meet the expenditure of the Executive Government? The total amount of that would not exceed £12,933,000. Among the other charges which have received the attention of Parliament, is the charge for the Civil List. And here I may be permitted to say, that any Executive Government that would have a due regard to the exercise of a wise and judicious economy, would not hesitate to follow the example which has been set them by the control exercised over her own expenditure by the Sovereign. A settlement was made of the Civil List on her accession to the throne. On the occasion of her marriage no addition was made to that Civil List. (Cheers) During the year three powerful sovereigns have visited this country, but I am not required, on the part of her Majesty, to press for the extra expenditure of one single shilling—(immense cheers)—on account of these unforeseen causes of increased expenditure. Now, with regard to the charges for the collection of the revenue, it should be borne in mind that the extent of the revenue establishment is not merely to secure an efficient collection of the money due to the state, but that it is of the utmost importance that every facility should be given for the transaction of commercial business. It is our duty to reduce those establishments, as far as it is consistent with public convenience. I do not vindicate the retention of a single useless officer. But it would be a delusion and a fallacy to expect that you can generally reduce the public burdens by any diminution of the salaries of the officials employed. At the same time it may be said that those great public establishments for which a vote is taken every year—such as the army, the navy, and the ordnance of the country—may admit of some reductions. I, first of all, will state the estimate we propose for the expenditure on account of the army. Now it is impossible to determine whether that expense is justifiable or not, without adverting to the extent of the colonial empire of this country. The main expense on account of the army is the extent of your colonial possessions. It may be said it is not our advantage to defend our colonial empire, but I deal with the fact that you have colonies—that you must provide a competent force for each, and that having a competent force you must have some supply for the relief of them. Sir, I should be unwilling—though I know our colonies are expensive—to give up that policy which led to the foundation in different parts of the globe of dependencies animated by the spirit of Englishmen, and speaking the English language, For the service of these forty-five colonies you have an infantry force of 112 battalions, amounting to 92,000 rank and file. After referring to the necessity for shortening the period of regiments abroad, Sir R. Peel continued. We propose no increase in our military establishments, but at the same time, we do not think it would be desirable to recommend to the house to diminish the military force of this country. Consequently, we propose that the vote for the army estimates in the present year shall be a vote of £6,600,000, the amount of last year's estimate. I now proceed to call the attention of the house to the state of the navy, and the demand we shall feel it our duty to submit to the house for an increase in the estimate for it. We shall propose, in the course of the present year, an increase in the number of men serving in the navy, of about 2,500 more than those that are now actually employed, and of about 4,000 more men than those voted last year, on the grounds of our extended colonial empire, and the new commercial interests connected with it Within the last few years three great naval stations have grown up. There is the coast of Africa, the Pacific, and the China seas. Not, indeed, that an increase is wanted for any purpose of war or oppression, but our commerce is greatly extending on the west coast of South America, and it is impossible to deny that the presence of a British vessel has a great effect in maintaining relations of peace.—(Hear, hear.) I am sure that upon those three stations alone there has been an increase in the men employed at such a distance from this country of not less than 6000 men. You are to observe, too, that the very dispersion of your naval force has an effect like that produced by the dispersion of the army. The necessity of having your naval force dispersed over the habitable globe, does, in fact, diminish the efficiency of the naval complement at home.—(Hear, hear.) We purpose, therefore, with perfect confidence in the justice of the requisition, to increase the naval force of the present year to four thousand men. The expense caused by that increase will be about £184,000. Last year this house sanctioned a vote for two basins for the construction and repair of steam-vessels—one at Portsmouth, and another at Deptford. I shall therefore propose this year to take a vote for proceeding with the formation of those basins which the house sanctioned last year. The vote I propose to ask for is £187,000. I shall also take a vote for the purpose of enabling us to maintain the steam navy in a respectable condition suited to a peace establishment. Now, on account of the naval service, and of the ordnance connected with the navy, there will be an increase in the estimates of nearly one million.—(Considerable sensation, much murmuring, and whispers in all parts of the house.) The works connected with the ordnance department have not been recently pursued with sufficient vigour, and we must, at all events, keep those fortifications and works which exist in an ordinary state of repair. The estimate I now present of the total expenditure of the present year is as follows:—The charge for the Debt, £28,395,000, the charge for the Consolidated Fund, £2,400,000, making a total of £30,795,000. The vote of supply for the army, £6,678,000, for the navy, £6,936,000, for the ordnance, £2,142,000, for the miscellaneous estimates, £3,200,000 being together, £18,895,000, and added to the charge for the debt of the Consolidated Fund, £49,695,000, for the revenue of next year I will take £51,100,000. The charges for the present year, £49,690,000. And even with this increased expenditure, there would be a surplus on the 5th of April, 1846, of between one and two millions. I have thus attempted to lay before the house the present financial condition of the country, and estimated the revenue to the 5th of April next, and for the year ending the 5th of April, 1846; and I have also laid before the house what amount of expenditure her Majesty's Government, with a provident care for the public interests, shall feel it their duty to recommend to the house. The next question that arises is — and it is a most important one — in what manner this increase of expenditure is to be provided for? We are now induced to propose a continuance of the property-tax for a further period, and before I am led to ask the assent of this house, or any gentleman in this house, to that proposal, I feel it is absolutely necessary that I should explain, as I shall now proceed to do, what are the views of her Majesty's Government with respect to the appropriation of the surplus revenue, which will be placed at their disposal, after fully providing for every exigency of the public service. I know well, as the noble lord opposite stated the other night, that it is impossible to give an opinion upon the question, abstractedly, can the property-tax be continued or not, without knowing what are the measures in respect of relief from taxation, which would follow as a consequence of its continued imposition. Let me assume for the present that the house has granted the continuance of the property-tax. I will then give a short estimate of the revenue arising from it, together with other sources. Suppose the property-tax to be continued, the estimate of the revenue for the next year on the 5th of April, 1846, aided by the £5,200,000 of the property-tax, will be £53,700,000, and as long as the other sources of the revenue remain equally productive, and as long as the property-tax is continued, £53,700,000, subject to a reduction of £600,000, will be the amount of the revenue. This £600,000 is the amount received as China money; it will be received for one year more, but for the purpose of calculating the revenue, I had better strike it out altogether. The revenue for the year, then, on the 5th of April, 1846, will be £53,100,000. The charge for the debt, and on account of the different branches of the public service will be £49,690,000; so that there would be left, as long as the income-tax should be continued, and deducting the Chinese money, a net revenue of £3,409,000. That is the surplus that will remain if the house should acquiesce in the proposal which I shall make to increase the expenditure on the navy, and if they shall also determine that the income-tax shall be continued. Now it is a most important matter for consideration, in what mode that surplus, or any part of that surplus, shall be employed for the relief of taxation. What are the inducements in the way of the increased efficiency of the public service, and of the diminution of taxation, which I hold out to the House of Commons as a motive to induce them to consent to the continuance of the income-tax? I should not propose to the house the continuance of the income-tax unless I had the strongest pesumption, that it will be competent to the House of Commons, by continuing the income-tax, to make such arrangements with respect to general taxation as shall materially add to the comforts even of those who shall be called on to contribute to the income-tax.—(Hear, hear.) When the question is, having a considerable surplus, to determine how that surplus can be most efficiently employed, the question becomes one worthy of the most important and serious consideration. We do not propose to maintain any material surplus of revenue over expenditure, confident that, whatever may happen, this house is determined to maintain the public credit. (Loud cheers.) We have determined to recommend extensive reductions in those taxes which, in our opinion, press more onerously on the community than the income-tax. I first propose to submit to the consideration of the house, what are the views of her Majesty's Government in respect to a reduction upon the duty on sugar. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear," from both sides of the house.) The house will recollect that upon this subject last year, an arrangement of a temporary character was made, by which sugar, the produce of settlers who used free labour, was admitted into competition with sugar, the produce of foreign free labour. The amount of a discriminating duty proposed, by which to admit foreign sugar, the produce of free labour, was 10s. 6d.; and her Majesty's Government now propose to admit to general competition sugar upon the terms to which allusion was made last session. (Hear.) We also propose the admission to competition of sugar, the produce of free labour in our colonies, upon the same terms as sugar, the produce of free labour in those foreign countries with which we now have what are called those "reciprocity treaties" that have heretofore been made. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) The discriminating duty proposed to be established last session was, on free-labour British plantation sugar, 24s., and 5 per cent., and that upon free-labour foreign sugar, 34s. and 5 per cent.; which would produce, upon the former, a total amount of duty of 25s. 3d, and on the latter of 35s. 9d. But, in the reductions proposed last year, it was proposed to establish a higher discriminating rate of duty on free-labour foreign sugar than we conceived bore a fair proportion to colonial free-labour sugar. Therefore her Majesty's Government came to the conclusion that the circumstances under which the foreign countries producing sugar by free labour, and those of the colonies, were not such as would render such alteration expedient. We stated at the same time that a classification, if it were possible, which would apply to our own sugar as well as foreign sugar, might be well worthy of consideration. We propose, therefore, with regard to all sugars, except the produce of our own colonies, to make this reduction. In respect of brown Muscovado sugar, which is now subject to a duty of 25s. 3d., we propose to make a reduction of 11s. 3d., and to reduce the duty to 14s. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) With regard to Muscovado sugar, that reduced duty will apply to all British plantation sugar—to sugar the produce of the Mauritius—to sugar, the produce of our West Indian Colonies; and with regard to the produce of those districts in British India, with regard to which a different rule now applies, we propose, in the case of those districts, to retain the same relative proportionate duty, and that duty shall be 18s. This is applicable to those countries of India which are permitted to import sugar. We propose that the amount of protective duty shall not exceed 9s. 4d., and the duty on free labour sugar will, therefore, be 23s. 4d. Of course, in countries with whom existing treaties are in force, we cannot deprive them of that which is their right. With regard to white, or clayed sugar, or sugar which by some process is made equal to clayed sugar, we propose that the duty on British Plantation East India Sugar shall be reduced from 25s 3d. to 16s. 4d., and that the duty on sugar imported from India, or those parts of India from which sugar may be imported, shall be 21s. 9d., and that the duty on free labour foreign sugar—that is clayed—shall be 28s., thus retaining the whole amount of discriminating duty which last year was 10s. 6d., but applying it in a different manner, giving 9s. 4d. protection on Muscovado sugar, and increasing the protection to 11s. 4d. on white sugar. The amount of discriminating duty would remain the same as it was last year. The duty on molasses we propose to preserve in the same proportion. We propose on refined sugar that it should be imported at a duty of 14s. instead of 18s. 8d., and that double refined sugar should be imported under a duty of 21s., the 14s. including the 5 per cent. We consider that the effect of the reduction upon sugar will be, on the whole, a reduction of duty, so far as duty is connected with price, amounting to 1¼d. per lb., or not quite so much as 1¼d. But if you add other charges that accompany a high rate of duty, we think the full effect of the reduction of the duty will not be much short of 1½d. per lb.—(Cheers.) We propose to adopt, as a general rule, the abolition of export duties on all articles of this nature, and from the application of that rule we do not propose to except coal for consumption. (Hear, hear, and cheers from the Opposition.) I am bound to say, also, that the revenue derived from coal has not equalled our expectations. We calculated upon an amount of revenue, after the reduction, of about £160,000, whereas the net revenue received in the last year has not exceeded 120,000. I do not think that there could be a greater argument against monopoly than the combination amongst the proprietors of coal mines. (Hear, hear.) I trust, therefore, that this voluntary abandonment by the Government of the tax which has been so much complained of by these proprietors will be met by them in a corresponding spirit. We have arrived at the opinion that it would be desirable—retaining the power of examination—retaining the power of ascertaining the quantity and weight—we think, in making a great reform of this kind in the rest of the Customs' duties, it would be better to abolish duties altogether than to maintain them. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear," from the Opposition benches.) Retaining a small portion for the purpose of ensuring vigilance on the part of the Custom-house officers in ascertaining the weight and quantity seems desirable. (Hear, hear.) Upon the whole, not being very confident of the correctness of our calculations, we do feel it our duty to advise the house to try the experiment which we made last year with respect to foreign wool, and to admit those articles to which I shall presently refer without any duty. The articles on which we propose to abolish the duties will be those generally which are the raw materials of our manufactures. The total number of articles that will be absolutely swept away from the tariff will be no less than 430. These will include those fibrous materials, such as silk, hemp, and flax, which would be admitted at a nominal duty; yarns twisted, of different kinds. I propose also to abolish the duty on furniture woods. A great demand is growing up in this country for our cabinet-making—(Laughter)—which it was highly advisable to encourage. (Laughter.) The amount of duty at present levied on this article is very low, and we think the same rule may be applied to it. On animal and vegetable manures the duty will be entirely abolished. We propose to remove the duty on ores, and minerals, with the exception of copper ore, with respect to which an arrangement was made in 1842, which had worked exceedingly well. The duties on iron and zinc in the first stages of manufacture would be abolished, and on all dye-stuffs and on drugs universally, with the exception of some that were very obnoxious. There are some other articles with respect to which, on other considerations, this total removal of duty will not take place. I do not propose materially to interfere with the general principles which we have applied to the timber duties. With regard to the great article of foreign timber, there has been recently a large increase in the import of Baltic timber—that import is increasing, and, I confidently hope, that, eventually, the increase will be found to be not far short of what I had estimated it at. The amount received for timber duties during the course of the last year is not far short of £950,000. There is one particular article, in relation to the timber duties, which rests on special grounds, and which takes it out of the general category of the timber duties—I mean the article of staves. I think the coopers have made out a case of peculiar hardship, entitling them to an exemption from duty on an article, which, in point of fact, should be considered as an article of raw material.

Mr. LABOUCHERE.—Do you remove the duty altogether?

Sir ROBERT PEEL.—Yes, we take it off altogether. It amounts to £32,000. I think the loss on these articles will be £320,000. I now come to that article, which is the most important to the prosperity of the country. I come now to cotton-wool—(Hear, hear)—and the duty upon it. The present duty on cotton-wool is, so far as the revenue is concerned, 5-16ths of a penny a pound. That duty is applicable to the whole amount of cotton-wool imported, and is about one-fifth of the total amount, and is only available for the purpose of manufactures. Of course, in respect of the manufactured cotton of the United States, we labour already under great disadvantage, from the ready access which the people of that country possess to the raw material, and they are competitors of ours in all the coarser descriptions of cotton. Therefore, we conceive that to repeal the duty upon this article, and abolish it altogether, will be followed by the very best results.—(Cheers.) The estimated loss which the revenue will sustain by the abolition of this tax—taking into account the amount of the revenue received upon it last year, will not be less than £680,000. (Hear, hear, hear.) Her Majesty's Government did not intend to recommend to the house any further alterations in the duties upon any other articles of this description. The particular branch of duty I am now referring to, though the attention of the Government may not have strictly been called to it, I will undertake, before I sit down, to demonstrate, is one more entitled to reduction than many of the objects I have hitherto adverted to. (Cheers and laughter.) The duty to which I refer is the duty on the free transfer of property, or rather what is called the auction duty. (Hear, and cheers.) This auction duty is a duty which is leviable on each part of the United Kingdom. The present Commissioners of Excise reported, there years since, to the Treasury, that with the auction duty there was more trouble, and more intricate questions arose on account of attempts at evasion, and questions about exemption—there was more trouble with respect to this auction duty than the whole of the excise revenue remaining. There is no duty, I think, which is so objectionable in principle as a duty on the transfer of property. Every auctioneer is, under the existing law, compelled to take out a license. Now I propose, instead of the principle of requiring separate licenses, to enable auctioneers to dispose of every description of property, by taking out one license—I propose to fix the amount of that license at £15—thus enabling the auctioneers who take it out to deal in every description of property. I think it is probable that the number of auctioneers will be increased by the reduction of the duty. With respect to the article of glass, I must say that it is one which has especially occupied my attention. There is no Excise duty on the manufacture of glass in France, in Belgium, or in Bohemia. And in Bohemia the manufacture of glass was brought to the very highest state of perfection. We have particular facilities in this country for the manufacture of glass, we have a great command of labour and of coal, and we should be able not only to enter into competition with foreign countries, but we should be able to beat them. What is the fact? That there being now no duty on glass in Belgium, Bohemia, and France, there is no necessity for interfering with the process of manufacture. What has taken place in this country? A great import of foreign glass into the bonded warehouses of this country, and that foreign glass thus brought into bonded warehouses is afterwards exported, being liable to no duty; and after all this the exporters beat us, not only in foreign countries, but even in our own colonies. If we permit this article to be manufactured duty free, it is very hard to foresee to what perfection the manufacture of that beautiful fabric may be brought, considering how much it admitted of the application of capital and skill. I believe that this country may supply almost all the world with glass, or at least enter into active competition with other countries for supplying it. Now a case has been made out for the remission of the window duty. But take the case of glass, and see what a much greater effect the reduction of the duty on glass will have on the comfort of the labouring classes than a reduction of the window-duty. It is estimated that in Great Britain there are 3,500,000 houses; of these not more than 500,000 are charged with the window-duty; therefore, there are 3,000,000 of houses which require glass to be used in them, and which, by the removal of the tax, would benefit by the whole amount of the remission. Then if we look to the improvement of art, what a great encouragement it will give to the art of engraving if we reduce the duty on plate glass. Then if we look to the consideration of health, of what immense importance is the article of glass. Nothing prevented the passage of heat like glass. The passage of heat through a single plate of glass, compared with its passage through two plates of glass, having a larger between them, was as ten to one. All parts of the United Kingdom will be benefitted by it—Ireland, Scotland, and England, will be equally benefitted. Ireland will derive a direct benefit from the reduction of the duty on glass, and I do not see any reason why Ireland should not become the seat of a successful glass manufacture. This reduction will give to the people of Ireland, as well as the people of Great Britain, the command of an article essential to their convenience and comfort. I hope that the house will acquiesce in the recommendation of her Majesty's Government, and select glass as one of the articles on which the Excise duty ought to be entirely abolished. The loss to the revenue from the reduction of the duty on glass would amount to £640,000. I will now recal to the recollection of the house the estimate I made of the amount of revenue, assuming that the income-tax will be continued—I estimated that a surplus revenue, in case the income-tax is continued, would be available on the 6th April, amounting to £3,490,000. I shall now recapitulate the estimate of the reductions which would arise from the reduction or repeal of the different duties which I enumerated.

The estimated loss of sugar, then, is	£1,300,000
The estimated loss on coal is	183,000
The loss on the duty of minor articles imported, being the raw materials of manufactures	320,000
The estimated loss on cotton-wool	680,000
The estimated loss on auction-duty	250,000
The estimated loss on glass	640,000

I include the loss on staves in the £320,000.

The total loss to revenue—I am now speaking of the immediate loss—(hear, hear)—if our reductions are sanctioned by the house, would be	£3,338,000 very nearly absorbing the actual surplus from the income-tax of £3,490,000. I stated before, that in proposing the continuation of the income-tax, we proposed it for the purpose of having a large surplus revenue, but I thought it right to appropriate the surplus, after defraying the recurring expenditure of the country, to the removal of those burdens which pressed most heavily on the industry of the country; and I conceive that the amount of reductions made fulfil that part of the pledge. Now, observe that I have taken no credit for the ultimate saving that will be certain to result by the reduction of the duty upon glass, for I do contend for it, that the result will be a very material saving. Observe also, that I have taken no credit for the increase of consumption that must follow the removal of the heavy duty on the articles of manufacture. This is an experiment, certainly, and I do not hesitate to say it is a bold experiment. But, looking at the result of the experiment we made last year—looking at what is now the state of the Customs' revenue after the reduction that has been made—seeing that the Customs' revenue on the 5th of January, 1845, presents a surplus as compared with that of the same period last year, of a sum not less than £1,305,000—(Hear, hear)—after deducting the loss of £122,000, which arose from cotton wool last year, and a sum of £61,000 on sheep's wool—the reduction on the revenue, after making this great experiment, will be £1,305,000. (Cheers). I have already stated that I intend to call upon the house to continue the Income-tax for a further limited period, because I have the most confident persuasion that the reductions made on the articles I have mentioned will be followed by the most beneficial results. (Hear, hear.) Remember this—that during its operation, the revenue has so prospered, that the receipts in the present year, independent of the income-tax, almost amounted to the expenditure of the country. Of course we might have avoided making this experiment—we might have applied the surplus of the present year without making increased taxes; but we propose the income-tax, not for the supplies of the year, but for the purpose of enabling us to make this great experiment.—We do not ask that the income tax should endure for a longer term than three years—for a less period I hope the house will not see the necessity for its continuance. At the expiration of three years I have a confident belief that that will have occurred which has now occurred, and that it will be compentent for you to dispense with the income tax altogether. I have such a confidence in the elasticity of the resources of the country, that, before three years shall have elapsed, the revenue will have increased to such a degree as will enable you to dispense with the tax altogether. Remember this, that the principles on which we have gone, we have gone on advisedly. We have, in every case, repealed the tax. Whatever may be the decision of the house, at any rate we shall have the consolation of knowing that we have not sought popularity by evading the question of continued taxation. (Hear, hear.) But it is our object, while we establish the principle, at the same time viewing the state of society, and the magnitude of the interests involved—the consequences upon those interests, of a hasty and rash interference—our avowed object is to realise the utmost degree of good, without the disturbance or alarm of interests, which cannot be disturbed, and which cannot be alarmed, without paralysing the industry of the country. Sir, I submit, therefore, this proposal on the part of her Majesty's Government to the judgment of this house. We have adopted it after careful consideration. We recommend it on the deliberate conviction that the sanction of it by this house will conduce to the extension of industry and the encouragement of enterprise, and that the result of that extension of that industry and the result of the encouragement of that enterprise to all classes of the country, whether directly connected with commerce or industry, be they manufacturing, be they agricultural, or be they not connected with any particular department of industry, our conviction is, that by the adoption of this proposal, industry and commerce will be immediately benefitted, and that indirectly every class in this great community will find its welfare promoted.

The right hon. gentleman sat down amidst great cheering from the Opposition benches. He spoke for three hours and a quarter.

The question having been put,

Sir ROBERT PEEL said he did not wish the house to affirm any proposition that night; but he trusted that they would see the great importance of proceeding as early as possible to the consideration of the various proposals. He hoped they would be in a condition to pronounce, on Monday, on the general outlines. Of course, the affirmation of the resolution would not bind the house, but its adoption would enable them to proceed at once to take the sense of the house with respect to the proposed alterations.

Several hon. members then spoke, all of them giving their general approval of the plan, and the further discussion was then postponed till Monday. The adjournment then took place at nine o'clock, till Monday.

LORDS.—MISCELLANEOUS BUSINESS.

BAIL IN ERROR IN CRIMINAL CASES.—The Lord Chancellor has announced his intention to bring in a bill immediately with the intent of admitting bail in error in criminal cases. As it was not his opinion that the common law right of challenge to the array was taken away by any alteration lately made in the jury law, he did not at present purpose to bring forward any bill on the subject, but he promised to look attentively into the matter.

INTRODUCTION OF LORD STANLEY.—Lord Stanley having been summoned by writ to the House of Lords, under the title of Lord Stanley, of Knowsley, was introduced on Thursday by Lords Redesdale and Wharncliffe, and took the oaths and his seat.

COMMONS.—MISCELLANEOUS BUSINESS.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS.—Lord Duncan, for the 20th of February, to move for a committee of the whole house, with a view to the repeal of the window-tax, unless forestalled by the promised statement of the First Lord of the Treasury.

COMMITTEES ON RAILWAY BILLS.—On the motion of Lord GRANVILLE SOMERSET, a select committee was nominated to inquire into the best mode of constituting committees on Railway Bills in the present session of Parliament, and of the most expedient manner in which Railway Bills, having relations to similar objects, may be brought under the consideration of the same committee.

RAFT OF GAMBIER ISLANDERS

THE GAMBIER ISLANDS.

The following document has just been communicated to the Chamber of Peers, and the Chamber of Deputies, by the French Minister of Marine: it relates to the conduct of France with regard to this interesting group of Islands in the Pacific, and shows their present actual condition.

"The French Catholic missionaries established during the last ten years in this small archipelago have obtained complete success amongst the chiefs and the inhabitants, whom they instruct and direct without any obstacle, with the object of improving their morals, and by the most pacific treatment.

"This state of affairs, which was perfectly known at the departure of Captain Bruat for Oceania, suggested the observation on the instructions which had been given to him on the 28th of April, 1843, that these islands were most favourable for receiving the protectorate of France.

"It was in consequence of these instructions, and on the occasion of the frigate la Charte having anchored off one of those islands, that the commander of this frigate was present on the 16th of February, 1844, at a declaration made by the principal chiefs assembled, in order to manifest their intention to place themselves and their territory under the protection of the French authorities.

"This act was not followed by any military occupation, nor by the installation of any administrative agent. The French missionary M. Liausse, has been acknowledged as the chief of this small society.

"The instructions addressed by Admiral Mackau to Governor Bruat, dated the 16th of July, 1844, recommend him formally to abstain from any act which might engage the King's Government beyond what has been already accomplished.

"It appears indispensable to wait for the conclusion of the difficulties existing in other places before any decision can be adopted relative to this simple acknowledgment of the French authority.

"The group of the Gambier islands possess a good harbour, and are but thinly inhabited. The Methodist missionaries have not endeavoured to penetrate there, and have, consequently, left the inhabitants free without contesting the influence of the French missionaries."

These islands were minutely surveyed by Captain Beechey, who relates many attractive traits of the islanders, in his very popular "Narrative of a Voyage to the Pacific and Behring's Strait." Several of the Islands have a fertile appearance, especially the largest, on which is situated Mount Duff, the east peak of which is in lat. 23 deg. 7 min. 58 sec.; long. 134 deg. 55 min. 31 sec., W. The Captain gives a circumstantial account of his interview with some of the natives, who approached the ship's boats in katamarans, or rafts, carrying from 16 to 20 men each.

"We were much pleased," says the Captain, "with the manner of lowering their matting sail, diverging on different courses, and working their paddles, in the use of which they had great power, and were well skilled, plying them together, or, to use a nautical phrase, keeping stroke. They had no other weapons but long poles; and were quite naked, with the exception of a banana leaf cut into strips, and tied about their loins; and one or two persons who wore white turbans." They timidly approached both the ship and the barge, but would upset any small boats within their reach; not, however, from any malicious intention, but from thoughtlessness and inquisitiveness. Captain Beechey approached them in the gig, and gave them several presents, for which they, in return, threw him some bundles of paste, tied up in large leaves, which was the common food of the natives. They had some knowledge of iron, but had no idea of the use of a musket. They tempted the Captain and his crew with cocoa-nuts and roots, and invited their approach by performing ludicrous dances; but, as soon as the visitors were within reach, the scene was changed to noise and confusion. A scuffle ensued, and on a gun being fired over their heads, all but four instantly plunged into the sea." The whole of the details of this and succeeding interviews are very amusing. One of the rafts is engraved from Captain Beechey's work.

Captain Beechey states the average height of the Gambier Islanders to be 5ft. 9in.; they are, generally speaking, well-made, their limbs round, without being muscular, and their figure upright and flexible. Tattooing is very extensively practised, in which respect, as in the arrangement of the lines, they much resemble the Marquesas. This general practice in the south seas, when judiciously executed, besides having its useful effects, is highly ornamental. In the Gambier Islanders there was a greater display of taste than Capt. Beechey saw or heard of anywhere else, not excepting at the Marquesas: but the Nukahivers, as well as the Otaheitans, and others, attend principally to device; whereas the Gambier Islanders dispose the lines so as materially to improve the figure, particularly about the waist, which, at a little distance, has the appearance of being much smaller than it really is. Whether this was accidental or designed, Captain Beechey had no opportunity of learning.

RANAVALONA, QUEEN OF MADAGASCAR, IN HER STATE HOWDAH.

The ship Philip Dean has brought news from Buenos Ayres to the 26th of November, whereby we learn that great dissension had occurred among the authorities of Monte Video, which indicated the probability of a speedy surrender of the city to the Buenos Ayrean army, commanded by Oribe. The life and soul of the Government was Pasteco y Obes, who had left it. By this conveyance we have received a translated copy of a decree of the Government of Corrientes, confiscating all the Argentine property, of which they had possessed themselves. Corrientes, by this decree allows the navigation of the rivers by neutrals, but Rosas will not allow it, except to the Paraguays with their own flag, and even this permission, it was anticipated, he would soon interdict under some pretext or other. The Paraguay trade was at a dead stand, and likely to remain so, in consequence of the decree in question.

The Dee has arrived at Southampton with the West India mails. The papers are destitute of interest. The Honduras Observer says that an earthquake was experienced at the Belize on the night of the 25th November. It was a continuous vibratory motion, commencing slowly, and increasing in violence. It lasted about twenty seconds.

From Mexico we learn, by these papers, that Santa Anna was in retreat for Vera Cruz, and a rumour prevailed that he would ultimately take shelter on board one of her Majesty's ships. This seems not improbable, if it be true, as reported, that his troops were fast deserting him. The existing Government was popular, and active measures were being adopted to fortify Vera Cruz, and save it from the threatened attack of the ex-President. Martial law had been declared in the city. General Paredes was fast following Santa Anna, and it is probable that the next mail will bring intelligence of a collision between the opposing parties.

NEW DOME—BETHLEM HOSPITAL.

Various improvements, from the design of Mr. Sydney Smirke, have lately been made at this ancient establishment, which are calculated both to extend its benefits, and enhance the comfort of the inmates. Two new wings, for the employment of convalescent lunatics, have been added to the rear, and other minor alterations carried out.

The most important feature, however, now connected with the Hospita is the new dome, of which the above is an illustration. This dome is about 150 feet in height, from ground to summit; and the diameter 37 feet. The whole is composed of brick and stone, covered with copper, and finished in such a manner as is calculated to materially improve the general appearance of the structure.

DOME OF BETHLEM HOSPITAL.

The form of the dome is octagonal, resting upon a square base, which rises above the pediment of the portico. On each of the eight sides are circular openings with stone dressings, which are for the ventilation of the new chapel beneath.

THE REV. DR. WOLFF.

Intelligence of Dr. Wolff has been received to the 10th of January, at which date, as already stated, he was at Erzeroom, endeavouring to recruit his strength for the journey over the mountains to Trebizonde. At Tehran the doctor was received in the kindest manner dy Colonel Shiel, her Majesty's Envoy, who sent a Government golam to meet him. He left Tehran in a tuckrawan (a sort of litter), and by easy stages reached Tabris. Here the judicious treatment of Dr. Casolani enabled him, after some days' repose, to proceed by a similar conveyance towards Erzeroom. On reaching the Turkish frontier, owing to the immense accumulation of snow, he was obliged to proceed on horseback; and, after great bodily suffering, he reached Erzeroom, on the the 4th of January, completely exhausted. As soon as her Majesty's commissioner, the kind-hearted Colonel Williams, R.A. heard of the doctor's approach, he rode as far as the last pass to meet him, and escorted him into the town. Dr. Wolff is too ill to write to any one, and cannot move from the sofa; it is, however, hoped that the kind attentions of Colonel Williams, which have really been beyond all praise, will enable him to proceed, in about a fortnight, to Trebizonde.

A paragraph having gone the round of the papers stating that Dr. Wolff never was in personal danger at Bokhara, and that he could have left when he pleased, and as such a statement was probably intended to weaken the sympathy every Englishman must feel for this noble-minded man, who exposed himself to such horrible sufferings in attempting the release of two British Envoys, Captain Grover thinks it right to state that Dr. Wolff was in the greatest danger during the whole period of his stay at Bokhara, that guards were placed round his bed, and that he was indebted for his escape to Mirza Kouli Khan, the Persian Ambassador, who refused to leave Bokhara without him.

THE QUEEN OF MADAGASCAR.

The blockade by a British man-of-war of the extensive and beautiful island of Madagascar, has invested its daring and cruel Queen with a fresh European interest. The subjoined engraving exhibits Ranavalona in her state palanquin, as she ordinarily appears on public occasions; and will give to strangers a good notion of the barbaric splendours of her half civilized court. Her Majesty, it may be remembered, usurped the Malagasy throne on the first of August, 1828, having been one of the inferior of the twelve Queens who constituted the domestic establishment of King Radama. Soon after her assumption of the supreme power, she discovered herself to be the friend of the ancient superstitions of the island, the enemy of the English whom she expelled, and the determined opponent of all social improvements—a policy she continues to maintain. This is, of course, deeply to be regretted, as there are few parts of the globe which are entitled, either by their geographical position, their national advantages, or the moral and social features of their inhabitants, to higher commercial or national considerations than Madagascar.

The island occupies, in regard to Africa, a position analogous to that of Great Britain in respect to the European Continents—though the Mosambique Channel, which separates it from the main land, is of vastly greater dimensions than the British Channel; it extends through the finest part of the torrid, into the temperate zone; it lies directly across one of the most frequented of commercial routes—that between Europe and India, being many days sail from the Cape of Good Hope on the one hand, and the islands of Bourbon and Mauritius on the other; it presents a geographical surface of 225,000 square miles, being nearly three times the size of Great Britain, and is, in all points of view, too important to be long destined to a savage and solitary existence. We shall be glad to learn—what in all probability will be the issue of the quarrel—that a few cannon-balls at Foule Point, will bring us into relations of amity with the Queen and her fruitful fields.

THE ROYAL PAVILION, BRIGHTON.

The visit of her Majesty and the Court to this superb watering-place, suggests the presentation of the annexed engravings of the Royal Palace; the history of which may be thus briefly told.

It is now about 60 years since George IV., then Prince of Wales, purchased a villa on the north-western side of the Steine, and at that time, nearly in the centre of Brighton; which was transformed into a "Marine Pavilion," under the superintendence of Henry Holland, Esq., one of the architects of Carlton House. It consisted of a circular, temple-like edifice, with a domed roof: attached to it were two wings, of two stories each, with verandahs; the south wing having been the villa purchased by the Prince.

This plain, unostentatious structure, did not long satisfy the taste of its Royal occupant; and his Royal Highness's favourite architect, the late Mr. Nash, accordingly produced a design more in accordance with the Prince's love of the gorgeous; from which was erected the present "Pavilion," of brick stuccoed, with the exception of the minarets.

In its external architecture, the Pavilion assumes the characteristics of the Oriental style, and domes, cones, and minarets spring from its roofs to a considerable height. The pretensions of the design to Orientalism are, however, set aside by Mr. Daniell, who resided some years in the East, and who observes: "If the architect aimed at an imitation of Oriental architecture, it is to be lamented that he trusted so implicitly to conjecture, for there is not a feature, great or small, which at all accords with the purity, grandeur, and magnificence, that characterise the genuine Oriental style."

THE PAVILION.—GARDEN FRONT.

The principal or eastern front of the Pavilion is shown in our first illustration; with the north-west portion of the Steine, and Chantrey's bronze statue of George IV., a grateful tribute of the inhabitants of Brighton to the illustrious Arbiter Elegantiarum, who may be said to have founded the prosperity of this magnificent town. This garden-front of the Palace consists, in effect, of three pavilions, connected by two ranges of building. The central part projects semicircularly, and is surmounted by a vast dome, presenting the appearance of an inverted balloon, partially filled, and tapering upwards into a pinnacle to the height of 130 feet; and flanked, on each side, by a lofty minaret. This part incloses the rotunda, or saloon, the longest diameter of which is about 55 feet. On the north and south the saloon opens into apartments, measuring about 50 by 20 feet; externally projecting in two bows on each side, crowned by domes of similar shape to that in the centre, but of smaller dimensions. These unite with the wings, which are of square form, and are each surmounted by a lofty cone, rising between four minarets, which are of Bath stone, as are also the central pinnacles, which are still more elevated than the former. The south wing contains the banquetting-room, and in the north is the music-room. Adjoining the latter is a smaller building, of square form, surmounted by a dome and minarets, similar to those already described. All the domes have vertical divisions, and are otherwise ornamented; and the fronts of the wings and central part are screened by projecting arcades of lattice-work. Near the south wing is a large red brick building, formerly the Castle Tavern, which was purchased by George IV.; and the ball-room, a rectangle of 80 by 40 feet, with recesses, has been converted into a chapel, as an appendage to the Palace.

The opposite or western front of the Pavilion is nearly similar to the garden-front, but has a centre projecting rather more, with a neat square portico, supported by pillars. This side contains the vestibule, hall, Chinese gallery, and various drawing, reading, breakfast, and other rooms.

Northward of the Pavilion are the stables, an incongruous mixture of Moorish or Hindoo and other styles of architecure. Nevertheless, from their extent and elevation, the pile has an imposing air. It is circular in plan, approached by four lofty arches; the circle inclosing an area of about 250 feet in circumference, surmounted by a vast glazed dome, in which so great is the quantity of lead and glass that it attracts and retains the heat so powerfully, that the extensive archways do not suffice to ventilate the stables surrounding the area. Adjoining is a tennis-court and a riding school; in the latter, 200 feet long, and 50 feet broad, her Majesty and Prince Albert occasionally take exercise. Very few horses are lodged in this expensive pile, the building of which cost upwards of £70,000.

The entrance-gates to the Pavilion are north and south. The southern entrance opens into Castle-square, and is divided by minarets into three divisions, the centre having a handsome archway.

The northern entrance, built for William IV., in 1832, and shown in the second illustration, is, comparatively, of faultless proportions. It is crowned with a dome in the style of the central one of the Pavilion, and rises from a tower, having at each angle a substantial turret, crowned with a smaller dome; the wings are finished with light fluted minarets. The form of the arch, with the lion and regal crown at its point, is graceful and pleasing, and the embellishments throughout are in a chaste style. Nevertheless, the entrance is disproportionably important to the Palace itself.

The interior of the Pavilion is a succession of overwrought gorgeousness, and frittered ornament: nevertheless, there are some chastely-embellished apartments of redeeming beauty. The entire Palace has been elaborately described by the architect, Mr. Nash, in a work devoted to the purpose, with several illustrations. The offices, as might be expected from the taste of the Royal founder, are adapted for luxurious accommodation: the kitchen is a marvel of completeness, and the wine cellars are walled with China tiles.

The grounds of the Pavilion are retired; the east front opens to a lawn of about 300 feet in extent; on the north, are shrubberies; on the west, pleasure-grounds, and a grove of elms; and, on the south, the Chapel Royal, and other buildings. The whole of the demesne comprises between seven and eight acres; the principal part of which was obtained by purchase, and the rest by grants from the inhabitants of Brighton.

Our third illustration shows the Pavilion, and the view of the town westward; with the Junction-road, and the lofty pile of the Town Hall buildings, &c.

THE COURT AT BRIGHTON.
